TO THE MOST REVE-REND FATHER IN GOD,
 GEORGE BY THE DIVINE PROVI-DENCE, LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTER-BURY, PRIMATE AND METROPOLITANE OF all ENGLAND, one of his Majesties most Honorable Priuie Councell: and his very good Lord.

MOST REVEREND,
That duetie which emboldned me at my first looking, and leaping out of the Dungeon of obscuritie, to interrupt your more serious affaires, with the view of these my labors; Hath (by your Gracious acceptance of me and them) encreased together with the worke, and encouraged mee the second time (thus seconded by manifold helpes of Bookes and Relations of others, and by a second care and labour of mine owne) to obtrude this first Part of my intended Pilgrimage vpon your Grace. Both then, and now, no worth thereof, but your worthinesse hath caused this presumption. For to whom should I rather present my firstfruites,

fruits, then unto the High-Priest, That hee might shake them before the Lord, to make them acceptable? Neither is any meeter to Patronise a Historie of Religion, then he, to whose Person Religion giueth, and from the same mutually receiueth, Patronage. And therefore I, the meanest of Lewi's sonnes, doe here againe offer vnto your Grace, ASIA, AFRICA, AMERICA, and that in their withered and fouler hue of passed out-worne rites, or present Irreligious Religions, not washed with the purer streames of sacred Baptisme. EUROPE challengeth a roome in this kind by her selfe: nor would Christian Historie vouchsafe these Strangers her holy companie, and therefore hath enioyned me a second Pilgrimage, and Perambulation ouer the World, to trace her footsteps, and obserue euery where her Planters, Corrupters, and Reformers.

Great is this burthen of a twofold World, and requires both an Atlas and an Hercules too, to vndergoe it. The newnesse also makes it more difficult, being an enterprize neuer yet (to my knowledge) by any, in any language, attempted; conioyning thus Antiquitie and Moderne historie, in the observations of all the rarities of the World, and especially of that soule of the world, RELIGION. Yet haue I aduentured, and (I speake it not to boast, but to excuse my selfe, in so haughtie designes) this my first Voyage of Discoverie, besides mine owne poore stocke laide thereon, hath made mee indebted, to aboue a thousand Authours, of one or other kinde, in I know not how many of their Treatises, Epistles, Relations and Histories, of diuers subiectes and Languages, borrowed by my selfe, besides what (for want of the Authors themselves)

I

*Or the benefits of greater Libraries, or sufficient conference with men more skilfull: my Braine might haue yeelded a fairer issue, a more compleate and better-armed Minerua. But besides the want of these, the daily cares of my Family, the weekly duties (in Preaching and Catechising) of my Ministerie, the grossenes of the Aire where I liue, whicb (some say) makes a duller wit, I am sure, a sicklier body, may pleade excuse for me. Howsoeuer; I shall thinke my selfe happie in your Graces Examination and Censure, if it bee not Impietie in mee to offer to intercept, and with interposition of these lines a while to Eclipse your Gracious aspect and influence vnto our Church and State. And though your Grace cannot, for more necessarie imployments, and needes not, as knowing them better alreadie, afforde your Precioustime to these things of baser worth: Yet if your Recreations shall vouchsafe them as Remembrancers, out of my labours to refresh yours, I shall bee more then sufficiently recompenced. Others may hence learne by that most laborious, though not most learned Argument of Induction, two lessons fitting these times, the Vnnaturalnesse of F A C T I O N and A T H E I S M E: That law of Nature hauing written in the practise of all men (as wees here in the particulars doe shew)

And if I liue to finish the rest, I hope to shew the Paganisme of Antichristian Poperie, and other Pseudo-Christian heresies, and the Truth of Christianitie as it is now professed and established in our Church, vnder the Great Defender of the Faith: for whose long Raigne, and your Graces prosperous seruice vnder so Religious a Soueraigne, I heartily pray vnto the King of Kings, and chiefe Shepheard of our Soules, I E S U S C H R I S T.*

TO THE READER.

ND now, READER, The PILGRIME comes vnto thee, the second time, with whom he dares bee somewhat bolder. Being, I know not by what naturall inclination, addicted to the studie of Historie, my heart would sometimes object a selfe-loue, in following my priuate delights in that kinde. At last, I resolued to turne the pleasures of my studies into studious paines, that others might againe, by delightfull studie, turne my paines into their pleasure. I here bring Religion from Paradise to the Arke, and thence follow her round about the World, and (for her sake) obserue the World it selfe, with the seuerall Countries and Peoples therein; the chiefe Empires and States; their private and publique Customes; their manifold chances and changes; also the wonderfull and most remarkeable effects of Nature; Euents of Diuine and Humane Providence, Rarities of Arte; and whatsoeuer I finde by Relations of Historians; as I passe, most worthie the writing. Religion is my more proper aime, and therefore I insist longer on the description of whatsoeuer I finde belonging thereto; declaring the Religion of the first Men; the corrupting of it before, and after the Floud; the Iewish obseruations; the Idols, Idolatries, Temples, Priests, Feasts, Fasts, Opinions, Sects, Orders, and sacred Customes of the Heathens; with the Alterations and Successions that haue therein happened, from the beginning of the World hitherto.

This Worke I diuide into foure parts. This first exhibiteth, Relations and Theologicall discouerie of ASIA, AFRICA, and AMERICA: The second, when God will, shall doe the same for EUROPE: The third and fourth, in a second visitation, shall obserue such things in the same places, as I hold most remarkeable in the Christian and Ecclesiasticall Historie, and that according to the same method; which is squared in the Whole by order of Place, going still out of one Countrie into the next, in each particular part and seuerall Countrie, by the order of Time, deducing our Relations, so farre as wee haue others foot-prints to guide vs, (though not exactly naming the day and yeare, and determining questions in Chronologicall controuerfies, yet in some conuenient sort) from the Ancient times, and by degrees descending to the present.

If thou demandest what profit may be hereof; I answer, That here students of all sorts may finde matter fitting their studies: The naturall Philosophers may obserue the different constitution and commixtion of the Elements, their diuers working in diuers places, the varietie of heauenly influence, of the yearelie seasons, of the Creatures in the Aire, Water, Earth: They which delight in state-affaires, may obserue the varietie of States and Kingdomes, with their differing Lawes, Politiques, and Customes, their Beginnings, and Endings. The Diuine, besides the former, may here contemplate the workes of God, not in Creation alone, but in his Iustice and Prouidence, pursuing sinne euery where with such dreadfull plagues; both bodily, in rooting vp and pulling downe the mightiest Empires; and especially in spirituall Iudgements, giuing vp so great a part of the World vnto the efficacie of Errour in strong delusions, that hauing forsaken the Fountaine of liuing waters, they should digge vnto themselues these broken Pits that can hold no water; deuout in their superstitions, and superstitious in their deuotions; agreeing all in this, that there should be a Religion, disagreeing from each other, and the TRUTH, in the practise thereof.

Likewise our Ministers may be incited vnto all godly labours in their function of preaching the Gospell, seeing otherwise, for outward and bodily ceremonies, the Turkes and Iewes (in their manifold deuotions in their Oratories euery day) and other Heathen would conuince vs of idlenesse. And let me haue leaue to speake it for the glorie of God, and the good of our church; I cannot finde any Priests in all this my Pilgrimage, of whom we haue any exact Historie, but take more bodily paines in their deuotions, than is performed by not-preaching Ministers, especially in Countrie-villages, where on the weeke daies they cannot haue occasion, or companie, for publique praiers: and therefore if they only reade the Seruice on holy daies, and neuer studie for more (which I would it were not the idle practise of some) euen the Heathen shall rise vp in iudgement against them. I subscribe with hand and practise to our Liturgie, but not to such Lethargie: whose darkenesse is so much the more intollerable, in this Sunne-shine of the Gospell, wherein wee haue a gracious King, so diligent a frequenter of Sermons; and Reuerend Bishops (notwithstanding other their weightie Ecclesiasticall employments) yet diligent Preachers.

The studious of Geographie may somewhat be helped in that kinde: not that we intend an exact Geographie, in mentioning euery Citie with the degrees of Longitude and Latitude, but yet limiting euery Countrie in his true situation and bounds; and performing happily more then some, which take vpon them the title of Geographers, as their chiefe profession: and more then any, which I know, hath done in our language.

He which admireth and almost adoreth the Capuchine, Iesuite, or other Romanists, for selfe-inflicted whippings, fastings, watchings, vowes of obedience, pouertie, and single life, and their not sparing their limmes and liues for their will-worships, may see, in all these, the Romanists equalled by Heathens, thens, if not out-stripped even by the reports of the Jesuites and other their Catholiques. Bodily exercise profiteth little, but Godliness is profitable unto all, 1. Tim. 4. 8. and hath the promise of this life and that which is to come.

Here also the Reader may see most of their Popish Rites, deriued out of Chaldaean, Egyptian, and other Fountaines of Paganisme; as in the later taske we shall haue more occasion to shew. Here euery English-man may see cause to praise God continually for the light of his truth, communicated to vs: whereas it is (in comparison) but a small part of the World, that soundeth the sacred name of IESVS; and of those that profess it, how infinite are the sects and superstitions? God hath shewed his Word vnto our IACOB (THE DEFENDER OF HIS FAITH) his Statutes and his iudgements vnto this ISRAEL of Great Britaine. He hath not deild so with euery Nation, neither haue the Heathen, nor scarcely, if scarcely, any other Christian Nation, so much knowledge of his iudgements. And yet how seditious are some? how prophane, are others? how vnthankfull the most? That beastly Sinne of Drunkennesse, that biting Sinne of Vsurie, that Deuillish Sinne of Swaggering, rustling in, deformitie of clothes, like monstrous Chimæras, and barking out a multitude of oathes, like hellish Cerberi, as if men could not bee Gallants, vnlesse they turned Demills. These are the payments wee retorne vnto the Lord, in stead of prayers for, and loyaltie to his Majestie; peaceableness and charitie to each others; modestie and sobrietie in our selues.

For the forme, I haue sought in some places, with varietie of phrase, in all, with varietie of matter, to draw thee along with mee in this tedious Pilgrimage. Some names are written diuersly, according to the differing Copies which I followed, which thy discretion will easily conceiue. I doe not in euery question set downe my censure; sometimes, because it were more then needes; sometimes because of the difficultie. I mention Authors sometimes of meane qualitie, for the meanest haue sense to obserue that which themselves see, more certainly then the contemplations and Theorie of the more learned. I would also acknowledge the labour of the meanest. I haue laboured to reduce Relations to their first Authors, setting their names to their Allegations: the want wherof hath much troubled me, whilst the most haue out their Authours, as if their owne assertion were sufficient authoritie in things borrowed. I haue (to my great paines) contracted and Epitomized whole Volumes (and some very large) into one Chapter; a thing vsuall through these Relations. Where I haue found plentiful discourse for Religion (my chiefe aime) I am shorter in other Relations; and where I haue had lesse helps for that discouerie, I insist more on the wonders of Nature; and discoueries by Sea and Land, with other remarkable accidents. These Rarities of Nature I haue sometimes suted in a differing phrase and figure of speech; not that I affect a fantastical singularitie; but that these diuine workes might appeare in Robes, if not fitting their Majestie, yet such as our Word-Robe did willingly without any great affectation or studie, affoord: not without example of the Scripture, which vseth to bring in the more Creatures, speaking and performing, (as it were) other personall offices; nor without this effect, to make the Reader stay a while with obseruation and wonder; besides that, varietie of it selfe is delightfull.

TO THE READER.

If any mislike the fulnesse in some places, and the barrenesse of wordes in others; let them consider, we handle a World, where are Mountaines and Vallies, fertile habitations, and sandie desarts: and others steps, whom I follow, hold mee sometimes in a narrower way, which elsewhere take more libertie: I touch here and there a Controuersie; both for illustration of Historie; and in season, and out of season, to shew my affection to the truth.

Now if any man thinke, that it were better these rotten bones of the past, and sinking bodies of the present Superstitions were buried, then thus raked out of their graues; besides that which hath beene said, I answer, That I haue sufficient example in the Scriptures, which were written for our learning to the ends of the World, and yet depaint vnto vs the vgly face of Idolatrie in so many Countries of the Heathens, with the Apostasies, Sects, and Heresies of the Iewes; as in our first and second booke is shewed: and the Ancient Fathers also, Iustin, Tertullian, Clemens, Irenaeus, Origen, and more fully, Ensebius, Epiphanius, and Augustine, haue gone before vs in their large Catalogues of Heresies and false Opinions. And what doth more set forth the glorie of Gods grace, then in pardoning; his power, then in reforming; his justice, then in giuing men vp to such delusions? Are not these the Trophees and glorious victories of THE CROSSE OF CHRIST, that hath subuerted the Temples, Oracles, Sacrifices, and Seruices of the Deuill? And maist not thou see herein, what Man is, and thou thy selfe maist bee, if GOD leaue thee to thy selfe? Reade therefore, with praises vnto GOD, the father of thy light; and prayers for these Heathens, that GOD may bring them out of the snare of the Deuill; and that Christ may bee his saluation to the ends of the World. And let me also obtaine thy prayers in this my Pilgrimage, to be therein directed, to the glorie of GOD, and good of my Countrie. Euen so LORD IESVS.

Now if any bee offended because his Booke (which not long since hee bought) wanteth much of that which this Edition offereth; I answer, that I then gaue what I had, and what my poore obscure state, with little helpe of Bookes or Intelligence from others, could afford: And finding better entertainment then I could deserue or desire, many Reuerend, Noble, Learned, approning and almost applauding the Pilgrime, notwithstanding his ragges and rudenesse; I could not but acknowledge it a great, both recompence and preferment, laudari & laudatus viris, and was thereby encouraged to endeavour vnto somewhat more praise-worthie. Which when I had thought to haue assaied in my promise for Europe: the quick sale of the former threatening a second impression some yeares before I could (without better furtherance) be readie to ioyne Europe therewith; thereby also being growne into acquaintance with many studious in this kinde, whose Bookes and Relations might much further mine: I was easily perswaded to this reuiue, and haue presented you your Pilgrime, with many, not stringes and laces alone for ornament, but large peeces of new cloth to supply his former defects and rents: and he which was then a new-borne Infant, is now with time grown greater. These things, in Nature and vse are necessarie and commendable, and here could could not be effected without my great cost and paines, which might rather merit Elogies then Apologies: yet shall I hold my selfe recompenced beyond expectation, if some lick itomack disgorge not some curse on mee, for being so painfull to bring him better intelligence. But for them to whom this worke is principally intended, either their wealth will make it insensible; or their discretion, easily pardonable. And how much more doth it cost some in wrangling fees for a peece of an Acre or Tenement, then here for the greatest part of the World? Neither yet doth the Pilgrime turne Stationer to sollicite buyers, or to construe the Title of his worke * to the purchasing thereof: and happily that, which they haue already, may more then suffice many ignorant or idle owners, to whom that cannot be worse, because this is better. But I would gladly giue contentment to the studious, especially such, whose weaker state (the Pilgrimes owne case) cannot rise and grow better with the impression: For their sakes I would haue printed the Additions by themselves; but that being so many and so manifold for kinde and number, it would haue seemed a loose bundle of shreds and ragges: which being thus sowed together in fit places, make the Pilgrimes weedes more handsome, and lesse harsh. With them is left me this excuse, even that which accuseth me, Want; which had it not before hindred me, I might iustly be censured for a Wanton, so suddenly to obtrude on the world such after-births. What is here added cannot be expressed in an Epistle: but the whole Booke is the Epistle thereof; every part and limme whereof, hath new blood infused, and additions annexed, as occasion of better Intelligence hath offered it selfe: wherein I haue made my selfe indebted to some hundreds of Authors, written or printed, which before I had not made vse of, as in the Catalogue of their names will appeare. Neither mean I hereafter to trouble the World with any such reuiue in this Argument of ASIA, AFRICA, and AMERICA; but leaue it (if any thing offer it selfe) to my second discouerie of Christianitie in those parts: meane-while purposing by Gods helpe to fit my selfe for my Visitation (in this kinde) of EUROPE, for which I againe desire thy praiers, the best requitall of my paines.

The Catalogue of the Authors.

Have here mustered in thy view, Courteous Reader, those Authors which from mine owne sight I haue mentioned in this worke. Some of them, I confesse, are of no great note, and some are noted for notorious counterfeits: but all are of some use, and meet to be here placed, that they may haue their due share of thankfulness for their worthy and great industrie (wherein those deserve a place, though otherwise obscure, who by their Navigations and Discoveries haue made the world known to it selfe) others, that they may be knowne to be lies and mere Changelings. I was the rather induced to giue thee a Table of their names, because nothing in the Impression hath escaped more faultie, then the misse-naming of Authors, of which I thought good here to giue notice. I acknowledge that Ramusius and M. Hakluit, in their Books of Voyages, haue bene two Libraries unto me of many Navigations and Discoveries bene mentioned: and now in this Edition I haue bene much beholden to M. Hakluit for many written Treatises in this kinde. In this, and all kinds, Sacred, Profane, Learned, Vnlearned, Ancient, Moderne, Good, and Bad, I haue toyed my selfe to benefit thee. Some of their names might haue bene added in the former Impression, but through hast were omitted: and many more might be added, which are cited in this Worke. But because I haue borrowed them on others credit, and not seeme them my selfe (and many for other causes) I haue not here mentioned them. The Letter E signifies that we haue but a fragment of the said Author, and P. brands him for a counterfeite.

CHAP. I.

*Of God, one in Nature, * three in Persons, the Father, Sonne, and Holy Ghost.*

THE Poets were wont to lay the foundations and first beginnings of their poetickall Fabriques, with inuocation of their Gods and Muses, although those workes were futable to such work-men, who according to their names were Makers, of those both Poems and Gods. I, as far short of their learning, as beyond them in the scope of my desires, would so farre imitate their manner, in this matter which I intend; that although I enuie not to some their foolish claime of that Poeticall (not Propheticall) inheritance, to make my Maker: and my matter, as in a Historie (nor a Poem) must bee made to

In the next place, I hold it not vnfit briefly to expresse somewhat of him, which indeed and thoroughly can neuer be expressed. For the wisest of the Prophets hath said of him and to him, that the Heauens and Heauens of Heauens, are not able to containe him: and the chiefe, or at least he which was not inferiour to the chiefe of the Apostles, as rauished with such alheight, and swallowed in such a depth, cried O Altitudo, O the deepnesse of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God! how vnsearchable are his iudgements, and his wayes past finding out! As for my selfe, I may most fitly borrow the words of Agur, Surely I am more foolish than any man, and haue not the vnderstanding of a man in mee: For I haue not learned wisdom nor attained to the knowledge of holy things. Yea indeed, who hath ascended vnto Heauen, and descended? Who hath gathered the Winde in his fist? Who hath bound the Waters in a garment? Who hath established all the ends of the World? What is his name, and what is his Sonnes name if thou canst tell? Tell this mysterie we cannot. And yet so farre as hee hath told vs by his Word and Workes, we may. Of the one the next words testifie: Euery word of God is pure: Of the other else-where The Heauens declare the glorie of God: and The inuisible things of him, that is his eternall power and God-head, are seene by the Creation of the World, being considered in his workes. God hath not (therefore) left himselfe without witnesse, who besides the testimonie of Nature, written in our hearts, hath added those of the Scripture and of the Creature, that this threefold Cord might not bee easily broken, and by the mouth of two or three witnesses, we might learne plainly that he is, and in some measure what he is. That there is a God: Heauen and Earth, Angels and Devils, Man and Beast, Reason and Sense, Greeke and Barbarian, science in the most, in the rest conscience, as a thousand witnesses all that wee see, and which we see not, say and proclaime, that all may see, and in manner palpably feele his present Deities; in whom we liue, moue, and haue our being. This is a common notion, and impression, sealed vp in the minde of euery man: a remnant of integritie after the fall of Adam, a substance or blessing in the dead Elme, sparkles of fire raked vp vnder the ashes, which cannot die whiles the soule liueth. What a one he is; is not so deeply ingrauen in Nature, whose owlsh eyes are dazled with the brightnesse of this light: But when heere we might renew the question: What is his name, and what is his Sonnes name? he himselfe answereth in Scripture by attributing to himselfe such names, whereby we may know him as the Creator from all Creatures, as the true God from all false Gods: and so farre as is meet and necessary to our saluation, Hee then that dwelleth in light inaccessible, whom no man hath seene, nor can see as he is, in this our infancie, hath manifested himselfe vnto vs as through a glasse darkly, that we may with Moses haue some glauncing view of his hinder parts.

These names and diuine attributes I meane not with large explications heere to expresse, as not so fitting my abilitie, or purpose, & being by others learnedly done alreadie: Yet to say a little, where the tongues of men and Angels cannot say enough: the Scripture attributeth, or hee in Scripture attributeth to himselfe, names, in regard both u Of this name Iehoua see Drusy Tetragram. Ar. Montan. ante Naturæ hiflor. p. 37. & P. Gala. l. 2. Drufius thinkes that Galatinus was first Authour of this pronouciation Iehoua; Cassation writeth it Ioua: the most both Jewes and Christians, before forbore to name it: The Massurites ascribed to it no points of it owne, but of Adonai, and when Adonai goeth before or after it of Elolium. It is holden that only the High-Priest, and that in the Temple, & on the day of Expiation might pronounce it, which to a private man the Jewes esteemed the losse of eternal life. Steuchus thinketh that none can interpret it, and Paulus Burgensis, that none can Translate it; the Chaldeans, Arabians, Grecians, Latines, and the effable) " name of God, is not therefore onely reuealed vnto vs that we may know him in himself & of himself to be, * Yesterday, to day and the same for ever, which is, which was, which is to come: but also as the Creator, of whom, in whom, and for whom are all things: and as the redeemer, which is knowne by his name Iehoua (as himselfe * interpreteth it) by giuing a reall being, and accomplishment to his promises. In which one name (as in others of like signification) is expresse the simplicity, Immutability, Infinitenesse, Blessednes, Eternitie, Life, Perfection and other Attributes of God. When he calleth himselfe Strong, therein is declared his almighty power, whether wee vnderstand it actually in producing and preserving all things in heaven and earth; or absolutely, whereby he is able to doe euen those things which in his wisdom he doth not; whereby he is able to do all things which either * in themselves (as implying contradiction) or with him (as imperfections) are not impossible, both those kinds not excluding, but concluding the power of God, which because he is Almighty, * cannot lie or denie himselfe.

What should I speake of his wisdom, whereby all things are open in his sight, both himselfe, and his Creatures, past, present, or to come, and that not as past or future, but with one, eternall, perfect, certaine, immediate, all of knowledge, which in regard of second causes are necessarie or contingent, or in effect but meere possible, and neuer actually subsisting. Truth is in him as a root, from whence it is first in the being; next in the vnderstanding; thirdly in the writing or saying of the creature. True he is in himselfe, in his workes ordinary, and extraordinary, and in his word reuealed by the Prophets and Apostles. What should I adde of his goodnesse, grace, love, mercie, Iustice, and other his attributes and names not yet mentioned? as Adonai which signifieth the Dominion of God due to him, by Creation, by purchase, by mutuall couenant: Saddai, which signifieth his all-sufficiency, and others. Yea in one Chapter Petrus Galatinus rehearseth threescore and twelue names of God out of the Rabbines workes, multiplied and diuersified in teine sorts, which make in all seuen hundred and twentie names. To dilate of these at large would aske so many large Commentaries, and yet euen then should we still finde this God incomprehensible; of whom wee may, in respect of our capacitie, rather say what he is not, than what he is, whose goodnesse is not to be distinguished by qualitie, or his greatnesse discerned by quantitie, or his eternitie measured by time, or his presence bounded by place: of whom all things are to be conceived, beyond whatsoeuer we can conceiue.

The Persons, which communicate in this Diuine Nature, are three: This is their owne witness of themselves; There are three which beare record in Heaven, the Father, the Word, and the Spirit and these three are one. This mysterie was manifested in the baptisme of Christ, and in our baptisme in the name of the Father, Sonne, and Holy Ghost. The Angels vnto this glorious Trinitie sing their Holy, Holy, Holy: the Scripture it selfe applying that which there may be interpreted of the Father, both to the Sonne Io. 12. 41. and to the Spirit, Act. 28. 25. These with other places doe also signifie their personall distinction. The creation was not onely the Fathers worke, but also of the other persons, as appeareth by that nowne plurall ioined to a verbe singular in the first word of Moses, and other like plurall appellations, Es. 44. 24. and Es. 54. 5. 2. Sam. 7. 23. and many such places. The Apostles applie the couenant, worship, and workes of God mentioned in the Old Testament, to the Sonne and Holy Ghost in the New Testament it selfe vñ in steade thereof The Lord. Montanus readeth it Iehue; and affirmeth that it was knowne both to the common Israelites and to the neighboring nations, &c. but see themselves: I name it after the modern vse for distinction. Zanchie and Gyraldus, obserue that the name of God in all nations is Tetragrammaton of foure letters. In Dutch and English, they therefore double the last consonant. *Vid. R. Mos. l. 1. c. 60. P. Ric. ad præc. off. 20. fit, both for the Authour, matter, maner, and other circumstances; Reason it selfe thus farre subscribing, as appeareth in her Schollers, (the most of the Heathens and Philosophers in all ages) That this World was made by a greater then the World. In prouving this, or illustrating the other, a large field of discourse might be ministred: neither doe I know any thing wherein a man may more improue the reuenues of his learning, or make greater shew with a little, decking and pruning himselfe, like Æsops

Iay, or HORACE his Chough, with borrowed feathers, than in this matter of the Creation, written of (after their maner) by so many Jewes, Ethnicks, Heretikes, and Orthodoxe Christians. For my part it shall be sufficient to write a little, setting downe so much of the substance of this subiect, as may make more plaine way, and easier introduction, into our ensuing Historie: leauing such as are more studious of this knowledge to those which haue purposely handled this argument, with commentaries vpon Moses text: of which, besides many moderne writers (some of which haue almost oppressed the Presse with their huge volumes) there are diuers of the Primitiue, middle, and decayed times of the Church: a cloud indeed of Authors, both for their number, and the varietie of their opinions, the most of them couering rather then discouering that truth (which can be but one) and more to be beleued in their confuting others, then prouing their owne assertions. Their store through this disagreeing is become a sore and burthen, whiles we must consult with many, and dare promise to our selues no surer footing: yet cleauing as fast as we can to the letter, imploring the assistance of the Creators spirit, let vs draw as neare as we may to the sense of Moses words, the beginning whereof is, In the beginning God created the Heauen and the Earth. Wherein (to omit the endlesse and diuers interpretations of others, obtruding allegoricall, anagogicall, myrticall senses on the letter) is expressed the Author of this worke to be God, Elohim; which word, as is sayd, is of the plural number, insinua-ting the holy Trinity, the Father as the fountaine of all goodnesse, the Sonne as the wisedome of the Father, the Holy Ghost as the power of the Father and the Sonne concurring in this worke. The action is creating, or making of nothing*, to which is required a power supernaturall and infinite. The time was the beginning of time, when as before there had neither beene time, nor any other creature.

The worke is called Heauen and Earth; which some interpret all this bodily world here propounded in the summe, and after distinguished in parcels, according to the fixe dayes seuerall workes. Some vnderstand thereby the First matter; which others
s apply onely to the word Earth, expounding Heauen to be that which is called Em-pyreum, including also the spirituall and super-celestiall inhabitants. Againe, others, whom I willingly follow, extend the word Heauen to a larger signification, therein comprehending those three Heauens, which the Scriptures mention: (one whereof is this lower, where the birds of the Heauen doe flie, reaching from the Earth to the Sphere of the Moone: the second, the visible Planets and fixed Starres, with the first Moueable: the third, called the Heauen of Heauens, the third Heauen and Paradise of God) together with all the hoast of them. By Earth they vnderstand this Globe, consisting of Sea and Land, with all the creatures therein. The first verse they hold to be a generall proposition of the Creation of all Creatures, visible and inuisible, perfected in<sup>k</sup> fixe dayes; as many places of Scripture testifie: which, as concerning the visible, Moses handleth after particularly, largely, and plainly, contenting himselfe with briefe mention of those inuisible creatures, both <sup>l</sup> good and <sup>m</sup> bad, as occasion is offered in the following parts of his Historie. In the present, <sup>n</sup> he omitteth the particular description of their Creation, lest some (as Jewes and Heretikes haue done) should take occasion to attribute the Creation to Angels, as assistants: or should, by the excellencie of that Nature, depainted in due colours, be carryed to worshipping of Angels: a superstition which men haue embraced, towards the visible creatures, farre inferior both to Angels and themselves.

Moses proceedeth therefore to the description of the first matter, and the creatures thereof framed and formed. For touching those inuisible creatures, both the Angels and their heauenly habitation, howsoever they are circumscribed, and haue their proper and most perfect substance, yet according to the interpretation of Diuines, <sup>o</sup> their nature differeth from that of other creatures, celestiall or terrestriall, as not being made of that first matter, whereof these consist. Let vs therefore labor rather to be like the Angels in grace, that we may be like vnto them in glory, than prie too curiously into their <sup>p</sup> Nature (to our vnderstandings in manner supernaturall) and endeavour more, in heeding the way which leadeth to that Heauen of the Blessed, than busie our wits too busily in descrying or describing it. Onely thus much wee may obserue thereof, that it is beyond all reach of our obseruation: in regard of substance not subiect to corruption, alteration, passion, motion: in quantitie, <sup>q</sup> many dwelling places, most spacious and ample; in qualitie, a Paradise, faire, shining, delightful, wherein no euill can be present or imminent; no good thing absent; a meere transcendent, which eye hath not seene, nor eare heard, nor the heart of man can conceive. Where the <sup>r</sup> Tabernacle of God shall be with men, and he will dwell with them, and shall be <sup>s</sup> all in all vnto them; where the pure in heart shall see him, and euen our bodily eyes shall behold that most glorious of creatures, the Sunne of righteousness, and Sonne of God, Christ Iesus.

Embracing these things with Hope, let vs returne to Moses his description of the sensible World; who sheweth, that that Heauen and Earth, which now we see, were in the beginning or first degree of their being, an Earth without forme and void, a darkned depth and waters: a matter of no matter, and a forme without forme; a rude and indigested Chaos, or confusion of matters, rather to be beleueed than comprehended of vs. This is the second naturall beginning. For, after the expressing of the matter, followeth that which Philosophers call a second naturall Principle, <sup>t</sup> Priuation, the want of that form, of which this matter was capable, which is accidentally a naturall principle, required in regard of generation, not of constitution, here described by that part next vs, Earth, which was without forme, as is said, and void. This was the internal constitution: the externall was, darknesse upon the face of the deepe. Which Deepe compriseth both the earth before mentioned, and the visible heauens also, called a Depth, as to our capacity infinite, and plyant to the Almighty hand of the Creator: called also Waters, <sup>u</sup> not because it was perfect waters, which was yet confused, but because of a certaine resemblance, not onely in the vniformity thereof, but also of that want of stabilitie, whereby it could not abide together, but as the Spirit of God moued vpon these Waters, to sustaine them; and <sup>x</sup> as the Henne sitteth on her egges to cherish and quicken, as Hierome interpreteth the word, so to maintaine, and by his mightie power to bring the same into this naturall order. Here therefore is the third beginning or Principle in Nature, That forme, which the Spirit of God, the third person in Trinitie (not ayre or wind, as <sup>y</sup> some conceiue, being things which yet were not themselves formed) by that action framed it vnto, and after more particularly effected.

This interpretation of the Spirit mouing vpon the Waters, agreeth with that opinion which some attribute to the Stoikes, That all things are procreated and governed by one Spirit, Which Democritus called the soule of the world, Hermes and Zoroaster, pretatur R. Moyses. Maim. l. c. 37. is of that minde: but l. 1. c. 31. he findeth the foure elements in these foure words here mentioned: Earth, Spirit, Deepe, and Darknesse.

Mens agitat molem & magno se corpore miscet.*

That is,

Heaven first, and Earth, and Watric plaines,
Bright Moone, of Starres those twinkling traines,
The Spirit inly cherisheth,
Loues, moves, great body nourisheth;
Through all infus'd this All containes.

The first creature which receiued naturall forme was the light, of which God said, Let there be light ; a lightsome and delightfome subiect of our Discourse, especially hauing lately passed such a confused and darke Chaos. But here (I know not how) that which then lightened the deformed matter of the vnformed world, hath hidden it selfe : some <sup>a</sup> interpreting this of the Sunne, which they will haue then created ; some <sup>b</sup> of an immateriall qualitie, after receiued into the Sunne and Starres ; some <sup>c</sup> of a cloud, formed of the waters, circularly moued, and successively lightning eyther hemisphere, of which afterwards the Sunne was compact ; from which they <sup>d</sup> differ not much which thinke it the matter of the Sunne, then more diffused and imperfect, as the waters also were earthie, and the earth fluible, till God by a second worke perfected and parted them. And (to let passe them which apply it to Angels or men) others <sup>e</sup> vnderstand it of the fiery Element, the essentiall propertie of which is to enlighten. Yet are we not here passed all difficulties, whiles some <sup>f</sup> (perhaps not vnjustly) would perswade the world, that Fire, as it is ordinarily in Schooles vnderstood of a sublunarie element, is with worse then Promethean theft stolne out of heauen where it is visible, and imprisoned in this their elementarie world : whereas Anaxagoras, Tbales, Anaximenes, Empedocles, Heraclitus, Plato, Parmenides, Orpheus, Hermes, Zoroaster, Philo and others, the fathers of the Chaldean, Egyptian, Iewish and Græcian learning, account the <sup>g</sup> heauens and heauenly bodies to be æthereall fire, to which our sense also will easily subscribe. And Patritius affirmeth that Ocellus Lucanus, one of Pythagoras his scholars, was first author of that former opinion, from whom Aristotle borrowed it, if it be not stealth rather, whiles he concealeth his name. Diuers <sup>h</sup> late Philosophers also seeme to haue conspired to burne vp that fierie element, or rather to aduance it about this sublunarie region into the Æthereall throne. Let the Philosophers determine this when they do other doubts : in meane while let vs, if you please, vnderstand this Light of the Fire, whether æthereall or elementarie, or both, or neyther, as in diuers respects it may be. For neyther was this Light then (as it seemeth) locally seperated from that confused masse, and by expansion (which was the second dayes worke) eleuated into her naturall place : and after that ; it possessed the Sunne, Moone and Starres, faith our sense, which thence receiue Light, and there in the æthereall region seeth new Starres and superlunarie Comets, compact of æthereall substance (as the most diligent <sup>i</sup> Observers haue recorded) both procreated and perishing : so that that which before was neither ethereall nor elementarie, whiles there was neyther æther nor element perfected, after became æthereall-elementarie, as being happily the matter of the Sunne and Starres of old, and of these later<sup>a</sup> appearances; and also filling the æthereall world in the higher and lower regions thereof, both above and beneath the Moone, with the Light here mentioned, and that vigorous heate, which is an affect or an effect thereof, procreateth, recreateth and conserveth the creatures of this inferiour world. No marvel if the Philosophers are still dazzeled and darkened in this light, not yet agreeing whether it be a substance or quality, corporeall or incorporeall; when the Father of lights himselfe thus convinceth vs of darkenesse; Where is the way? (saith he) where light dwelleth? And, by what way is the light parted? And if we cannot conceiue that which is so evidently seene, and without which nothing is seene and euident: how inaccessible is that light wherein the Lights of this light dwelleth? Euen this light is more then admirable; <sup>a</sup> life of the earth, ornament of the heauens, beaurie and smile of the world, eye to our eyes, ioy of our hearts: most common, pure, and perfect of visible creatures; first borne of this world, and endowed with a double inheritance of earthly and heauenly inheritance, shining in both; which containeth, sustaineth, gathereth, seuereth, purgeth, perfecteth, reneweth, and preferueth all things; repelling dread, expelling sorrow, <sup>b</sup> shaking the wicked out of the earth, and lifting vp the hearts of the godly to looke for a greater and more glorious light; greatest instrument of Nature, resemblance of Grace, type of Glory, and bright glasse of the Creators brightnesse.

* Such as the new stars Fire is one of the 4. elements of the world, but not placed beneath the Moone. Patrit. Pancof. l. 1. & 4. hath 4 infinite eternal, limpi-ous clement; Space, Light, Heate, and Moisture. i. Job. 38. 19. Lucis incomium

This Light God made by his Word, not vttered with sound of syllables, nor that which in the beginning (and therefore before the beginning) was with God and was God: but by his powerfull effecting (calling things that were not as though they were) and by his calling or willing causing them to be, thereby<sup>m</sup> signifying his will as plainly, and effecting it as easily as a word is to a man. That vncreated superessential light, the eternall Trinitie, commanded this light to be, and approued it as good, both in it selfe and to the future Creatures: and seperated the same from darkenesse (which seemeth a<sup>n</sup> meer priuation and absence of light) disposing them to succcede each other in the hemisphere; which by what motion or reuolution it was effected the three first dayes, who can determine? Fond it is to reason a facto ad fieri, from the present order of constitution to the principles of that institution of the creatures, whiles they were yet in making, as Simplicius and other Philosophers (may I tearm them, or Atheists?) haue absurdly done in this and other parts of the creation. And this was the first dayes worke:

THE SECOND DAYES WORKE.

IN the second God said, Let there be a firmament. The word Rakiah translated firma- ment, signifieth<sup>o</sup> expansum or expansionem, a stretching out; designing that vast and wide space, wherein are the waterie cloudes here mentioned, and those lights which follow in the fourteenth verse, by him placed in expanso: how soeuer some<sup>p</sup> vnderstand it onely of the ayre. Most probable it see- meth that Moses intendeth the seperation of those waters here below, in their ele- mentarie seat, from those above vs in the clouds; to which David alluding, sayth: He hath stretched out the heauens like a curtain, and laid the beames of his chambers in the waters. This seperating of the waters is caused in the ayrie region, by the æthereall, in which those forces are placed which thus exhale and captiuate these waters. That mat- ter beforeendued with lightning qualitie, was now in this second day (as it seemeth) attenuated and extended above and beyond that myrie heape of earthie waters; and both the æther and ayre formed of the same first matter, and not of a fit essence, which some haue deuised to establish the heauens eternitie, both twinnes of the Philosophers braines. And wherein doe not these differ from each other touching the celestiall nature; roundnesse, motion, number, measure, and other difficulties, most of which are by some denied? Diuersitie of motions caused the auncients to number eight Orbes; Ptolemie on that ground numbred nine; Alphonsus and Tebitinus ten; Copernicus finding another motion, reuiued the opinion of Aristarchus Samius of the earths mouing, &c. Others which therein dissent from him, yet in respect of that fourth motion haue added an eleuenth Orbe, which the Diuines make vp euen twelue by their Emphyreall immoueable heauen. And many denie this assertion of Orbes, supposing them to haue beene supposed rather for instructions sake then for any reall being. And Moses here saith expansum, as David also calleth it a Curtaine, which in such diuersitie of Orbes should rather haue beene spoken in the plurall number. The Siderius Nuncius of Galileus Galileus tells vs of foure new Planets, Jupiters attendants, obserued by the helpe of his Glasse, which would multiply the number of Orbes further. A better Glasse, or neerer sight and site might perhaps finde more Orbes, and thus should wee runne in Orbem in a circular endlesse maze of opinions. But I will not dispute this question, or take it away by auerring the Starres animated, or else moued by Intelligentie. A learned ignorance shall better content me, and for these varieties of motions, I will with Lactantius, ascribe them to God the Architect of Nature and co-worker therewith by wayes Natuall, but best knowne to himselfe. Neyther list I to dance after their pipe which ascribe a muscalle harmonie to the heauens.

THE THIRD DAYES WORKE

And thus were the æthereall and ayrie parts of the world formed: in the Third day followeth the perfecting of the two lowest elements, water and earth, which as yet were confused vntill that mightie word of God did thus both diuorce and marry them, compounding of them both this one Globe, which he called drye land and seas. I call it a Globe with the Scriptures, and the best Philosophers, for which respect Numa built the Temple of Vesta round. Neyther yet is it absolutely round and a perfect sphere, but σφαίροειδης rather, as Sirabo affirmeth, hauing (saith Scaliger) ισοχόρως, ἰσοχόρως, depressed vallies, extended plaines, swelling hillockes, high-mounting mountaines, long courses of riuers, and other varieties of Nature and Art, which all in so huge a maze rather beautifie the roundnesse, then take it away. The Eclipse of the Moone later scene in the East then in the West, the round shadow of the earth which darkeneth it, the rising of the Sunne and Starres sooner in the East then West, the vnequall eleuation of the Pole, and the Northerne constellations appearing to vs, the Southerne continually depressed: all these obseruing due proportions, according to the difference of places and countreies; yea, the compassing of the earth by many Mariners, argue the round compasse thereof, against Patritius his deformitie, or that deformitie which other Philosophers haue ascribed thereto. The equalitie or inequality of dayes, according to the neerenesse or farnesse from the Equinoctiall, holding proportion as well by Sea as Land (as doth also the eleuation of the pole) and not being longer where a quarter of the world is Sea, then if it were all earth, doe confute the opinion of the plainenesse of the water, and those former absurdities. Even all the pretended deformities by hills, dales, waters, compared<sup>1</sup> with the Diameter of this Globe, is not so much as the inequality in an apple, or a carved bowle, or quilted ball, which yet we call round. And this diuersitie serueth not onely for ornament, but for more largenesse of habitation, variety of ayre and earth, and for pleasure and profire. Thus doth this Globe swell out to our vse, for which it enlargeth it selfe: and seemeth large to vs, being in respect of the vniuerse lesse then little. How much thereof is couered with waters? How much not at all discouered? How much desert and desolate? And how many millions are they which share the rest of this little among them? And yet how many thousands glorie of the greatnesse of their possessions? All this Globe is demonstrable<sup>2</sup> to be but a point, and in comparison nothing to that wide wide Canopie of heauen, a mans possession but a point and as nothing to the earth, a man of possessions but a point and in a manner nothing to his possessions; (as Socrates<sup>3</sup> said sometimes to Alcibiades) few can shew their landes in an vniuersall Mappe, where a whole Region occupieth a small roome: and yet how couetous, how proude is dust and ashes of dust and earth, notwithstanding the little we haue while we liue, and that lesse which shall haue and possesse vs in a prison of three cubits being dead? Well did one<sup>4</sup> compare this our grosser and drossier world to an Ant-hill, and men the inhabitants to so many Pilimires in the variety of their diuersified studies, toiling and turmoiling themselves therein. Scipio seemed ashamed of the Romane Empire<sup>5</sup>, as seeming but a point of the earth, which is selfe was but a point. And yet how ready are many to sell heauen for earth? That largenesse and continuance beyond all names of time and place, for this momentanie possession of almost nothing, although they haue hell and diuell and all in the bargain? Let this morall obseruation entertaine our Reader, perhaps tyred in these rigid disputes: and now let vs returne to the naturall disposition and constitution of this Globe, in which the earth was couered with variety of Plants and fruits, which had bene before couered with slimie waters.

God commanded, and the waters which yet oppressed, and by their effusion and confusion did tyrannize, rather than orderly subdue, and gouerne this inferiour myrie masse, were partly receiued into competent channels, and there also gathered on swelling heapes, where, though they menace a returne of the olde Chaos, both by their noyse and waues, yet hath God stablished his commandement vpon it, and set barres and doores, and said, Hitherto shalt thou come and no further, and here shall it stay thy proude waues. Otherwise, The Deepes which then couered it as a garment, would now stand a-boue the Mountaines. At his rebuke they flee, who with fetters of sand (to shew his power in weakenesse, with a miracle in nature) chaineth vp this enraged Tyrant, that the creatures might haue a meete place of habitation. Thus did not onely the drie Land appeare, but by the same hand was enriched with Hearbs and Trees, enabled in their mortall condition, to remaine immortall in their kinde. And here beginneth Moses to declare the creation of compound bodies; hitherto busied in the Elements.

THE FOURTH DAYES WORKE.

NOW when the Lord had made both Plants, Trees, and Light, without the influence, yea, before the being of Sunne, Moone or Starre, he now framed those fierie Balls, and glorious Lights, whereby the Heauens are beautified, the Ayre enlightened, the Seas ruled, and the Earth made fruitfull. Thus he did the fourth day, after those other things created, least some foolish Naturalist should binde his mighty hand in Natures bands, seeing these Lights now become the chiefe officers in Natures Court. That shining before dispersed, was vnited in these bodies, whether by refraction of those former beames, by these solide Globes, or by gathering that fierie substance into them, or by both, or by other meanes, I leaue to others coniectures. Many are the dreames of Philosophers, some esteeming them fire; some earth, others cloudes, and others stones, fired: Heraclides and the Pythagoreans deemed each starre a world. it was because the Sun thus honored his birth-day. Jssac Leuitz, a *Plat. de plac. They are commonly holden Round, simple, lucide bodies, the most compact and condensate parts of their Orbs, or of that æthereall region, of, and in which they are: bright flames not of this our fire which deuoureth and consumeth (for the whole Ocean would not serue the Sunne alone for a draught, nor the Earth with all her store for a breakefast) but quickning and nourishing. Let vs a little consider of their Greatnesse, Swiftnesse, Number, Influence.

For the first, Ptolomey measured the Sunnes greatnesse 166½ times as much as the whole terrestriall Globe: Copernicus whom Scaliger calleth Alterum ani nostri Ptolomeum 162. Tycho Brabe 140. The Moone is holden by Ptolomeus 39. times lesse then the Earth, by Cop. 43. by Tycho 42. Albatognini and Alfraganus haue added their opinions of the rest, therefore diuiding them into fixe ranks or formes of differing magnitudes: wherein as they some what differ from each other, so much more fit Tycho Brabe that learned Dane, whose costs & pains in this science are admirable. But Salomon (wiser then they all) had foretold that the heauens in height, & the earth in deepenesse, and the kings heart, none can search out: that is, exactly and absolutely, as appeareth in the differing opinions, both of the earths circuit and diameter, and of the altitude of the heauens, and consequently of the quantitie of the starres, which must presuppose the former. They agree not in the order of the Planets, nor how many semi-diameters of the earth the heauen is eleuated, which after Ptolomeys Hypotheses are 30006. after Tychos reckoning 14000. Hence it is, that the quantitie and the swiftnesse is much more after the former, then after this later opinion, which doth better salue the incrediblenesse thereof, then faining a Giant-like labor (as Ramus calleth it) of the earths continuall rolling.

The number<sup>k</sup> of the starres some haue reckoned 1600. others 1022. and Tycho Brabe more. Galileus his glasse hath made them innumerable, in descrying infinite numbers otherwise not visible to vs, and especially the Galaxia full of them. Yea God himselfe propounds it to Abraham<sup>l</sup> (whom Iosephus calls a great Astronomer) as a thing impossible to number them. It is his owne royall prerogatiue, <sup>m</sup>he counteth the number of the starres, and bringeth out their armies by number, and calleth them all by their names. The end why God placed them in the firmament Moses expresth, to separate the day from the night, and to be for signes, and for seasons, and for dayes, and for yeares, and for lights in the firmament of the heauen to giue light vpon the earth. Their influence & effects are in Scripture<sup>n</sup> mentioned: neither can any iustly deny the same in the elements and elementarie bodies: the Stoicall Fate, the Caldean, Iewish, and Arabian fancies are now disclaimed euen by those<sup>o</sup> learned, which maintaine in our dayes Iudiciall Astrologie, or commend the same. Neither can it agree with Christian religion to subiect the will of man to any externall naturall force, nor with reason in matters contingent and casuall to make them naturall Arbiters: nor will I easily beleeue that particular euents can be foretold from generall causes, especially in the affaires and fortunes of men. Where the numbers, substances, faculties, actions of these starres are weakly or not at all knowne vnto vs (as hath bene shewed) it is like as to say how many and what kinde of Chickens a Henne will hatch, when we see not all, nor scarce know any of the Egges vnder her. The swiftnesse of the heauens wheele, p which euen in the moment of obseruing is past obseruing; the vanitie of our Oracle Almanacks, which commonly speke doubtfully or falsely of the weather; the infinitnesse almost of causes concurring, which are diuersly qualified; the weakenesse of those q foundations on which this Art is grounded; the force of heredetarie qualities descended from parents, of custome and education in forming mens manners; the disagreements of the Astrologers among themselves, the new from the old, and all from the truth, as Experience in all ages hath shewed. And lastly, the prohibition of the same by Scripture, Fathers, Councels, Lawes; yea the learnedst of the Chaldeans and other Astronomers themselves (as Ensebius<sup>u</sup> reciteth of Baranes, and Rab. Moses ben Maimon, having read all the Arabians workes hereof, answereth the Jewish Astrologers,) are strong arguments against the Starre-gazers predictions. But let Picus Mirandula his 12. bookes against Astrologie, and Ioseph Scaligers preface before Manilius be well weighed of such as dote on; no doubt of this Genethliacall ridiculous vanitie, if not a impious villany, as those authors and others prouie it, not by the errors of some Chiefcaines and Champions onely, but of the Art it selfe, and the whole Senate of Iewish Saracenicall and Christian Astrologers together hatching a lie. The signes and constellations which Astronomers obserue in and on each side the Zodiaks, would be too prolix in this discourse already tedious: as likewise those alterations which some haue obserued in some starres.

But those two great lights, the two Eyes of the heauens, the greater light to rule the day, and the lesse to rule the night, (which is called great, not so much for the quantitie wherein it is lesse then many starres, as for the operation and seeming to the sense) do command mine eyes to take more speciall view of their Beauties. How willing would I be (like Phaeton) to mount the chariot of the Sunne? which commeth forth as a Bridegroom out of his chamber and reioyseth like a mightie man to runne his race; King of starres, enthronized in the mids of the planets, heart of the world, eye of the heauens, brightest gemme of this goodly ring, father of dayes, yeares, seasons, meteors; Lord of light, fountaine of heate, which seeth all things, and by whom all things see, which lendeth light to the starres and life to the world; high steward of Natures kingdome, and liuest visible image of the liuing inuisible God.

And dazled with this greater light I would reflect mine eyes to that reflexion of this light in the sober, silver countenance of the silent Moone; which (whether it haue any natieue shining, though weake, as Zanchius and Bartolinus hold; or whether it be an ethereall earth,<sup>u</sup> which mountains and vallies, and other not elementary elements, compact of the dregs of the ethereall parts; or whatsoever else reason, fancie, or phrensie haue imagined thereof) is Queene of the Night, attended with the continuall dances of twinkling starres, Mother of moneths, Lady of seas and moisture, constant image of the worlds inconstancie, which it neuer seeth twice with the same face; and truest modell of humane frailty, shining with a borrowed light, and eclipsed with euery interposition of the earth. But I am not Endymion; nor so much in Lunae fauour, as to be lulled asleepe in her lap, there to learn these mysteries of Nature, and the secrets of that happy marriage betwene these celestiall twinnes. And it is high time for me to descend from these measures of time; the lampes of the world, and to behold the neerer workes of God before our feet in the aire and waters which God on the fift day created. But the principall rarities to be obserued in these creatures, we shall disperse our scattered discourses through this worke, as occasion shall be offered; as likewise touching the beasts both wilde and tame, and the creeping things created the sixth day. Thus was the Aire, Water, and Earth; furnished with their proper inhabitants,

Sanctius his animal mentisq; capaxius alia,

After he had thus prouided his cheare,<sup>z</sup> he sought him out a guest, and hauing built and furnished his house, his next care was for a fit Inhabitant. Of this, Moses addeth, Furthermore God said, Let vs make Man. But this will aske a longer discourse. In the

meane time we have this testimonie of Moses of the Creation of the World, whose sense, if I have missed or misted in these many words, I craue pardon. And although this testimonie might suffice a Christian, which must liue by faith, and not by sight: yet to preuent cauillers, we haue other witnessess both of reason and authoritie; That this World had a beginning, and that the builder and maker thereof, was God. For, doth not Nature both within and without vs, in the admirable frame of this lesse or that greater World, in the Notions of the one; and the Motions of the other, in the wise and mightie order and ordering of both, leade men vnto a higher and more excellent Nature, which, of his goodnesse, wee call G o d? When wee behold the whole World, or any part of it, in the Elements such agreement, in such disagreement: in the heavenly motions such constancie, in such varietie: in these compound bodies, Being, Liuing, Sense, Reason; as diuers degrees, diuersly communicated to so many formes and rankes of Creatures: Wee can no more ascribe these things to chance, than a Printers Case of letters could by chance fall into the right composition of the Bible which he printeth, or of Homers Iliads; to vse P. Tulles similitude: neither can any ascribe the Creation to the Creature, with better reason, then if by some shipwrack, being cast on a desolate Iland, and finding houses, but seeing no people therein, he could esteeme the Birds, or Beasts, (all the Ilanders he seeth) to be the framers of these buildings: But thou maiest thinke it eternall; Thou maiest as well thinke it to be God, Infinite, Vnchangeable, in the whole and in all the parts. Doth not the Land by seasons, the Sea by ebbing and flowing, the Aire by succeeding changes, the Heauens by motions, all measured by Time, proclaim that they had a beginning of Time? Are not Motion and Time as neare Twinnes, as Time and Eternitie are implacable enemies? Nay, how canst thou force thy minde to conceiue an Eternitie in these things, which canst not conceiue Eternitie? which canst not but conceiue some beginning, and first terme or point, from whence the motion of this wheele began? And yet how should we know this first turning of the Worlds wheele, whose hearts within vs moue, be we vnwitting or vnwilling, the beginning whereof thou canst not know, and yet canst not but know that it had a beginning, and together with thy bodie shall haue an ending? How little a while is it, that the best & Stories in euery Nation, shew the cradle and child-hood thereof? Their later receiued Letters, Arts, Ciuilitie? But what then, say they, did God before he made the World? I answer, that thou shouldest rather thinke Diuinely of Man, then Humanely of God, and bring thy selfe to be fashioned after his Image, then frame him after thine, This foolish question some answer according to the foolishnesse thereof, saying; He made Hell for such curious Inquistrors. * Aliud est videre, aliud ridere, saith Augustine. Libentius responderim nescio quod nescio. Qua tempora fuissent, qua abs te condita non essent? Nec tu tempora tempore precedis, sed celsitudine semper presentis aternitatis, &c. Before all things were, G o d only was, and he vnto himselfe was in stead of the World, Place, Time, and all things, hauing all goodnesse in himselfe: the holy Trinitie, delighting and reioycing together. To communicate therefore (not to encrease, or receiue) his goodlinesse, he created the Wor d, * quem Graci uoxior, (saith Plinie) nomine ornaments appellant, nos a perfecta absolutaq; elegantia Mundum. But for this matter, it is also of the wisest and most learned in all ages confessed, as their testimonies, alleaged by Iustin Martyr, Lactantius, and other Ancients, and especially by Philip Morney, doe plainly manifest. To him therefore, to Vines, and others which haue vndertaken this taske, by reason, and by humane authoritie, to conuince the gaine-sayers of our faith, let such resort, as would be more fully resolu'd in these curious doubts. As for all such * strange and phantasticall or phreneticall opinions of Heretikes, or Philosophers, which haue otherwise related of this mysterie of the Creation, then Moses, they neede not confuting, and for relating these opinions we shall finde fitter place afterwards. I will here adde this saying of Vines to such vnaturall Naturalists, as vpon slight and seeming naturall reasons, call these things into question. * Quam stultum est de mundi creatione ex legibus huius Naturae statuere, cum crea- tio illa naturam antecesserit? Tunc enim natura est condita quando & mundus, nec aliud est natura quam quod Deus insit; alioquin minister esset Deus natura, non Dominus. Hence was Aristotle's Eternitie, Plinius Deities ascribed to the world, Democritus, Leucippus, and Epicurus, their Atomi, the Stoikes Eterna materia, Plato's Deus, exemplar & materia, as P. Ambrose termeth them, or as 9 others, vnum or bonum, Mens & Anima (a Trinitie without perfect Vnitie) the Manichees two beginnings, and an endlesse world of errors about the Worlds beginning, because they measured all by Natural axiomes. Orpheus, as Theophilus the Chronographer, cited by Cedrenus; alleageth him, hath his Trinitie of Αἰδῆς & Νέχρη & ΜΗΤΙΣ, φῶς, ζῆν. ΔΟΤΗΡ: to which he ascribeth the Worlds Creation: but the Poets dreames are infinite, which might make and marre their Poeticall Worlds at pleasure.

CHAP. III.

Of Man, considered in his first state wherein he was created: and of Paradise, the place of his habitation.

hitherto we haue spoken of the framing of this mightie Fabrike, the Creation of the visible World, leauing that inuisible to the spirituall Inhabitants, which there <sup>a</sup> alway behold the face of the heavenly Father, as not daring to prie too far into such mysteries, aduancing our selues in those things which we neuer saw, <sup>d</sup> Rashly pusi up with a fleshy minde.

This whereof wee treat they neede not, as finding all sufficiency in their All-sufficient Creator: The inferiour Creatures (which hitherto haue beene described) know it not, but content <sup>b</sup> themselves with themselves, in enioyning their naturall being, mouing, sense. Only man, in regard of his bodie, needeth it, and by the reasonable power of his soule can discerne and vse it: Man therefore was last created, as the end of the rest, <sup>c</sup> an Epitome and Mappe of the World, a compendious little other world, consisting of a visible and inuisible, heavenly and earthly, mortall and immortall Nature, the knot and bond of bodily and spirituall, superiour and inferiour substances, resemble both the <sup>d</sup> worke and the worke-man: the last in execution, but first in intention, to whom all these Creatures should serue, as meanes and prouocations of his seruice to his and their Creator.

Man may be considered, in regard of this life, or of that which is to come: of this life, in respect of Nature or Grace: and this Nature also sustaineth a two-fold consideration, of integritie and corruption: For <sup>e</sup> God made man righteous, but they sought to themselves many inuentions. His first puritie in his Creation, his fall from thence by sinne, his endeavour to recover his former innocencie by future glorie, either in the by-ways of superstition, which Nature (a blinde guide) leadeth him into, through so many false Religions; or by the true new and lining way, which God alone can set him, and doth conduct him in, is the subiect of our tedious taske; the first two more briefly propounded: the two last historically and largely related.

In that first state, his Author and Maker was Iehoua Elobim, God in the pluralitie of Persons and vnitie of Essence; the Father, by the Sonne, in the power of the Spirit: whereunto, he did not only vse his powerfull word as before, saying; let there be Man, but a consultation, let vs make Man: not that he needed counsaile, but <sup>f</sup> that he in this Creature did shew his counsaile and wisdom most apparantly. The Father, as first in order, speaketh vnto the Sonne and holy Ghost, and the Sonne and holy Ghost in an vnspokeable manner speake and decree with the Father; and <sup>g</sup> the whole Trinitie consult and agree together, to make Man: which <sup>h</sup> for Mans instruction, is by Moses vttered after the manner of Men, The manner of his working was also in this Creature, singular; both in regard of his bodie, which, as a Potter his clay, hee wrought and framed of the dust into this goodly shape; and of his soule, which he immediately breathed into his nostrils.

Thus hath Man cause to glorie in his Creators care, in himselfe to be humbled, hauing a bodie framed not of solid earth, but of the dust (the basest and lightest part of the basest and grossest element, <sup>k</sup> So vaine a thing is man) his soule of nothing, lighter then vanitie, in the infusion created, and in the Creation infused, to bee the dweller <sup>l</sup> in this house of clay, and habitation of dust, yea not a house, but a <sup>m</sup> taberna- <sup>n</sup> cle, continually in dissolution. Such is the Maker and matter of man. The forme was his conformitie to God, after whose Image he was made. Christ onely is in full resemblance, the <sup>n</sup> Image of the inuisible God, <sup>o</sup> the brightnesse of his glorie, and the ingraued <sup>o</sup> forme of his Person. Man was not this Image, but made ad imaginem, according to this Image, resembling his Author, but with imperfection, in that perfection of humane Nature.

This Image of God appeared in the soule properly, secondly in the bodie (not as
 the instrument of the soule, and lastly in the whole Person. The soule in regard of the spirituall and immortall substance, resemblenth him which is a Spirit, and euclasting, <sup>r</sup> which seeth all things, remayning it selfe vnseene, and hauing a nature in manner incomprehensible comprehendeth the natures of other things: to which some adde the resemblance of the holy Trinitie, in this, that one soule hath those three essentiall faculties of Vnderstanding, Will, and Memorie, or (as others) of Vegetation, Sense, and Reason. In regard of gifts, and naturall endowments, the soule in the vnder-standing part receiued a Diuine impression, and Character, in that knowledge, wher-by she measureth the heauens, <sup>t</sup> bringeth them to the earth, listeth vp the earth to heauen, mounteth aboue the heauens to behold the Angels, pierceth the center of the earth in darkenesse to discern the infernall regions and legions, beneath and aboue them all searcheth into the diuine Nature: whereby, <sup>u</sup> Adam was without studie the greatest Philosopher, (who at first sight knew the nature of the beasts, the originall of the Woman) and the greatest Diuine (except the second Adam) that euer the earth bare. The will also, in free choyce of the best things, in <sup>v</sup> righteous disposition to-
<sup>w</sup> wards man, and true holinesse towards God, was conformed to his will, for whose wils
<sup>x</sup> sake it is, and was created. The body cannot so liuely expresse the vertue of him that made it, but as it could, in that perfect constitution, (<sup>y</sup> so fearfully and wonderfully <sup>z</sup> made) and as the organ of the soule, whose weapon it was to righteousness, had some shadow thereof. The whole Man in his naturall Nobilitie beyond, and Princely dominion ouer the other Creatures (that we mention not the hope of future blessednesse) sheweth after what Image Man was created, and to what he should be renewed.
 The end whereunto God made Man, is God himselfe, who hath <sup>a</sup> made all things for <sup>b</sup> himselfe: the subordinate end was Mans endlessse happinesse, the way whereunto is religious obedience.

Moses addeth, <sup>c</sup> He created them male and female, thereby to shew, that the Woman in Oeconomically respect is <sup>d</sup> the Image and glorie of the Man, being created for the Man, and of the Man, but in relation to God, or the World, She as a Creature was also framed after the same Image. As for that monstrous conceit of the Rabbins, that the first man was an Hermaphrodite, it deserueth not confusion: or mention. The order of the Womans creation is plainly related. God <sup>e</sup> finding not a meete helpe for
 steric signified that deadly sleepe of the heavenly Adam on the Crosse, whose stripes were our healing, whose death was our life, and out of whose bleeding side was by Diuine dispensation framed his Spouse the Church. This may be part of the sense, or an application thereof, as <sup>g</sup> some say to this mystrie; or the signification rather of the <sup>h</sup> thing it selfe here declared, then of the words, which properly and plainly set downe the history of a thing done, after the literall sense to be expounded.

According to this sense Moses expresseth the Creation, the making and marrying of the Woman. The Maker was God, the matter a ribbe of Adam, the forme a building, the end to be a meete helpe. The Man was made of dust, the Woman of the Man, to be one flesh with the Man, and of a ribbe, to be a helpe and supporter of him in his calling, which requireth strength: neyther could any bone be more easily spared in the whole bodie, which hath not such variety of any other kinde: nor could any place more designe the Woman her due place; not of the head, that shee should not arrogate rule; not of the feet, that the husband should not reckon her as his slaue, but in a meane betweene both, and that neere the heart, in which they should (as in all Diuine and Humane Lawes else) be fast ioyned. The building of this bodie of the Woman, was in regard of the Progeny, which was in that larger roome to haue the first dwelling. The soule of the Woman is to be conceived<sup>f</sup> as the soule of the Man before mentioned, immediately infused and created by God, herein equall to Man.

Being thus made, she is married by God himselfe vnto Adam, who brought her vnto him, to shew the sacred authority of marriage, and of parents in marriage: A mutuall consent and gratulation followeth betweene the parties, lest any should tyrannically abuse his fatherly power. And thus are two made one flesh in regard of one originall, equall, right, mutuall consent, and bodily coniunction. And thus were this goodly couple glorious in nakednesse, not so much in the ornaments of beauty, which made them to each other amiable, as of Maiestie, which made them to other creatures dreadfull: the Image of God clothing that nakednesse, which in vs <sup>g</sup> appeareth filthie in the most costly clothing. God further blessed them both with the power of multiplication in their owne kind, and dominion ouer other kindes; and gaue them for food <sup>h</sup> euery beaue bearing seed which is vpon all the earth, and euery tree wherein is the fruite of a tree bearing seede. He doth (as it were) set them in possession of the creatures, which by a Charter of free gift he had conueyed to them, to holde of him as Lord Paramount.

But least any should thinke this but a niggardly and vnequall gift, whereas since the flood more hath been added, and that in a more vnworthinesse through mans sin: let him consider, that since the fall<sup>i</sup> the earth is accursed, whereby many things are hurtfull to mans nature, and in those which are wholesome there is not such variety of kindes, such plenty in each variety, such ease in getting our plentie, or such quality in what is gotten, in the degree of goodnesse and sweetnesse to the taste and nourishment: which had they remained in this sickely and elder age of the world, wee should not need to enuie Cleopatra's vanitie, or Helioabalmus his superfluity and curiosity. And had not man sinned,<sup>k</sup> there should not haue needed the death of beasts to nourish his life, which without such stay should haue bene immortall: the vse whereof was after graunted rather to supply necessity when the Flood had weakened the Earth, then to minister a greater abundance then before it had; and least of all to satisfie the greedy and curious appetites of more then beastly men.

Liberrall and bountifull was Gods allowance, which yet as man abused in eating the forbidden fruite; so whether any sinfull man did transgresse by eating the flesh of beasts, as iniquity increased, it is vncertaine. And yet it is likely, that when the earth was<sup>l</sup> filled with crueltie, as men escaped not beastly butcherie, so beasts escaped not butcherly inhumanitie; and men that stay not now for commission to eate mans flesh, would then much lesse aske leaue to feede on beasts. Then did the godly Patriarches liue many hundred yeares<sup>m</sup> without such fooode, whereas now we reach not to one with this helpe, that I speake not of those which by abuse heereof are as cruell to themselves, (in shortning their dayes by surfeits) as to the creatures, making their bellies to become Warrens, Fish pooles, Shambles, and what not, saue what they should be? Had not man bene diuellish in sinning, hee had not bene beastly in feeding, nay the beasts had abhorred that which now they practise, both against their Lord and their fellow-seruants. <sup>n</sup> The Wolfe should haue dwelt with the Lambe, the Leopard should haue lien with the Kid, and the Calfe, and the Lion, and the fat beast together, and a little Childe might leade them. <sup>o</sup> And this in the time of the Flood appeared, when all of them kept the peace with each other, and dutifull allegiance to their

Prince in that great family and little moueable world, Noahs Arke.

The place of Adams dwelling is expressed by Moses; And the Lord God planted a Garden Eastward in Eden, and there he put the man whom he had made, Gen. 2. 8. Marvell it is to see the confusion which sinne bringeth, which appeareth not onely in the body, soule, diet, and other prerogatiues of our first parents; but in this place also, then a place of pleasure, a Paradise and Garden of delights: after, a place prohibited, and kept by the blade of a sword shaken: now the place cannot be found in earth, but is become a common place in mens braines, to macerate and vex them in the curious search hereof. Some doe conuert this Historie into an allegorie, as did the Manichees and the Originists, confuted by Methodius, as Epiphanius witnesseth. Hierome in Dan. 10. saith, that seeking for shadowes in the truth, they ouer-turne the truth it selfe. Umbras & imagines in veritate querentes, ipsam conantur euertere veritatem, ut flumina & arbores et paradysum putent allegoria legibus se debere subruere. Such mysticall Mist-all and Misfe-all Interpreters are our Familists in these times, by vnreasonable and vnreasonable allegories, raising mists ouer the Scripture-sense, which thereby they misse and cannot finde. Augustine relateth three opinions, that allegoricall, which hee confuteth: the literall, and that which followeth both the one and the other as himselfe doth. The Hermians and Selencians are said to denie, that there was any such place: and the naked Adamites accounted their Church to be Paradise. Others are as prodigall, and ascribe hereunto all the Earth, which was a Paradise till sinne brought in a curse. Thus holdeth Wolfgangus Wissenburg, Goropius also and Vadianus are of like minde, That mans exile was but the alteration of their happy condition, that the fiery sword was the fiery Zone, &c. A great while it went for currant that it was a pleasant region, by a long tract of Sea and Land separated from our habitable world, and lifted vp to the circle of the Moone, whereby it was out of the reach of Noahs flood, as truly perhaps as Patricius and others haue found another world in the Moone, with men and beasts therein of greater stature and longer life then here with vs. Thus hath Petrus Comestor and Strabus and many trauelers in old times haue trauelled with this conceit of their fooles paradise, & brought forth a lie, as appeareth by their Legends, That Saint Brandon sailed thither from Ireland, is as true as that he met Indus in the way released from his paines, (as he was alway from Saturday to Sunday Euen-song:) or that they made fire on a fish (supposing it to be an Iland) as that Legend telleth. It should seeme the man in the Moone called him, & shewed him the way to this Paradise, or that Dinias, which (according to the relations of Antonius Diogenes) traueilling beyond Thule, went so farre North that he came to the Moone, which seemed a shining earth, where hee saw many strange sights as credible as the former: or else great Lucifer himselfe, who (as a later traueler reporteth) hath lately bequeathed a Lieutenancy to Ignatius and his Colony of Iesuites in the New Hell, in that New-found-world of the Moone; the care of the foundation whereof he committeth to that Iebusiticall societie. But let vs descend from this Lunaticke Paradise.

Others place it Eastward, in the highest top of the earth, where the foure Riuers mentioned by Moses haue their originall, whence they runne, and are swallowed vp of the earth, and after rising in diuers places of the world, are known by the names of Nilus, Ganges, Tigris, Euphrates. Hugo de S. Viſtore and Adrichomius are of this opinion; yea, the great Cardinall Caietane and Bellarmino place Henoch and Elias in earthly Paradise, yet liuing there vntill the time of Antichrist, which wood he cannot see (being in the midst of it) for trees. But the discouery of the World by Trauelers, and description thereof by Geographers, will not suffer vs to follow them (to the want of which Art, I meane Geographie, such fantasies may be imputed) whereby also is confuted the opinion of them which place it vnder the Equinoctiall circle, as Durandus and Bonauentura.

Others account so much to Paradise as those foure Riuers doe water, euen the chiefe part of Africke and Asia: and some confine it in streighter limits of Syria, Arabia and Mesopotamia, as if Adam had beene so couetous as his posteritie, or so laborious p Ambrose in his long Treatise de Paradiso leaeneth too much this way, and Philo Iudeus also.

borious as to husband so large Countries. The false interpretation of those Rivers to be Nilus, Ganges, &c. was the cause of this error; the <sup>d</sup> Septuagint translating in stead of Sichor (which is Nilus) Gibon the name of one of these streames.

& Iere. 2. 18.

Moses as it were of purpose by an exact Chorography and delineation of the situation, doth meete with those errors, and with other the like, which I doe not heere relate. Neyther is their opinion to be followed, which drowne all altogether in the deluge, seeing that after that time Moses wrote this. Franciscus Iunius in his readings on Genesis hath largely and learnedly handled this matter, and added a Map also of Heden in which it stood, and the course of the Rivers with the Countries adiacent. In him the Reader may finde satisfaction. He sheweth out of Curtius, Plinie, and Solinus, the miraculous fertilitie of that part of Babylonia, which Ptolomy calleth Auranitis or Andanitis, easily declined from Heden, the name giuen by Moses, mentioned after Moses time, 2. Reg. 19. 12. and Es. 37. 12.

Iunius Ge. 2.

For the foure Rivers he sheweth them out of Ptolemy, Strabo, Plinie, Dion, Marcellinus, &c. to be so many diuisions of Euphrates, whereof Babarsares or Neharsares is Gibon, that which passeth through Babylon, is for the excellency peculiarly called Perath or Euphrates; Nehar-malca or Basilius, Pishon; Tigris, <sup>f</sup> Chiddekel. For the fiery sword he obserueth out of Pliny, lib. 2. c. 106. a certaine miracle of Nature in Babylonia, where the ground is seen burning continually about the quantity of an acre. But this place will not serue to dispute this point. If those Rivers doe not now remaine, or haue altered cyther channell or names, it is no new thing in so olde a continuance of the world. It is more then probable, that here in these parts Paradise was, although now deformed by the Floud, and by Time consumed and become a Stage of Barbarisme.

f Tigris is both
River and a smaller, which runneth out of
Euphrates into

Neyther hath the place alone beene such a pitched feld of Opinions, but the fruit also which Moses expresth to be the instrument and occasion of Adams ruine, hath set some mens teeth on edge, who tell vs what it is, as if they had lately tasted of it, a certaine signe indeede and fruite of that once vnlawfull tasting. <sup>g</sup> Goropius a man addicted to opinions, which I knowe not whether hee did holde more strangely or strongly, though he enlargeth Paradise ouer the World, yet hee maketh Adam an Indian (maruaile hee placeth him not in Dutch-land, for that was his language, if Beccanus be to be beleued.) About the River Acesines, betwixt Indus and Ganges (saith he) groweth that admirable Figge-tree, which hee at large describeth out of Plinie, Theophrastus and Strabo, whose branches spreading from the bodie, doe bend themselues downewards to the earth, where they take holde, and with new rooting multiply themselues, like a maze or wood. One tolde <sup>h</sup> Clusius that hee himselfe hath beene one of eight hundred or a thousand men, which had hidden themselves vnder one of these trees, adding, that some of them were able to couer three thousand men.

g Gora, Becon,
Indo-cythaica.

Strange is this tree, and Beccanus is with conceit hereof rauished into the pleasures of Paradise. This tree <sup>i</sup> Linschoten describeth growing about Goa, and (to bring vs out of Goropius Paradise) sayth that it hath no fruite worth the eating: but a small kinde like Oliues, which is foode onely for birds. Hee telleth vs <sup>k</sup> of another Indian Figge-tree, growing rather like a Reede then a Tree, a mans height, a spanne thicke, the leaues a fathome long, and three spannes broad: The Arabians and Indians suppose this to be that dismall fruite. The cause of this opinion Paludanus in his Annotations vpon Linschoten ascribeth to the pleasantnesse of the smell and taste. Being cut in the middle, it hath certaine veynes like a Crosse, whereon the Christians in Syria make many speculations. Yea the same Author telleth of a hill in the Ile of Seilan, called Adams hill, where they shew his foot-print, to proue that hee liued there: of which reade our discourse of that Island. <sup>l</sup> Boekhier in his Ara cali citeth out of Moses Barcephu, That wheat was the Tree of knowledge of good and euill; and so doe the Saracens hold: so curious and vaine is blinde Reason without a guide. And the Cabalists (saith <sup>m</sup> Ricinus) say, that Eues sinne was nothing but the wringing out of grapes to her husband; which yet he interpreteth allegorically.

But I thinke I haue wearied the Reader, with leading him thus vp and downe in Paradise; small fruit I confesse is in this fruite, and as little pleasure in this Paradise, but that variety happily may please some, though it be to others tedious. And for a conclusion, it is, I thinke worth the noting, that Mr. Cartwright an eye-witnesse,<sup>n</sup> by the counsell of the Nestorian Patriarke at Mosull or Niniuie visited the Ile of Eden, still so called, and by them holden a part of Paradise, ten miles in circuit, and sometime walled: which if it be not part of that garden-plot mentioned by Moses, yet it seemes is part of that countrey sometime called Eden, in the East part whereof Paradise was planted, and not far (according to Iunius Map) from that happy vnhappy place.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the word Religion, and of the Religion of our first Parents before the fall.

Having thus made way to our History of Religions, the first (and therefore best) Religion, is in the first place to be declared. Onely somewhat may be not vnfitly spoken before of the word. Religion in it selfe is naturall, written in the hearts of all men, which will (as here we shew) rather be of a false then no Religion: but the name whereby it is so called, is by birth a forreiner, by common vse made a free-denizen among vs, descended from the Romanes, which by their swords made way for their words, the authors both of the thing it selfe and of the appellation, to a great part of this Western world. But as the Latines haue accustomed themselues to multiplicite and variety of Rites, so haue they varied not a little about the Parents (as I may say) of this childe (as the Grecians sometimes about Homers birth-place) some giuing one etymologie and deriuation of the word, and some another, that there needeth som Herald to shew the true petigree, or some Grammarian Dictator to cease the strife.

<sup>a</sup> Seruius Sulpitius (as Macrobius citeth him) calleth that Religion, which for some holinesse is remoued and separated from vs, quasi relictam à relinquendo dictam. Seruius deserueth to be relinquished, and his opinion remoued and separated euen with an Anathema, if he would remoue and separate Religion from vs, which is the life of our life, the way to our happinesse. The like is added of Ceremonia à carendo dicta, a iust name and reason of the most of the present Romish Ceremonies, whose want were their best company. Massurius Sabinus in b A. Gellius hath the like wordes.

b Noc. At. lib. 4. ca. 9.

Religio, with Tully is Cultus deorum, the worship of the gods, hereby distinguished from Superstition, because they were, saith he, called Superstitious that spent whole daies in praier and sacrifices, that their children might be Superstites, suruiuors after them: (or rather as Lactantius,* Qui superstitem memoriam defunctorum colunt, aut qui parentes<sup>b</sup> suis superstites cel:brant imagines eorum domi, tanquam Deos penates. But they which diligently vsed and perused the things pertaining to diuine worship, & tanquam re-

gerent, were called Religious, Religiosus ex religendo tanquam ex eligendo eligentes, intelligendo intelligentes.* Saint Augustine better acquainted with religion than Cicero, commeth neerer to the name and nature thereof, deriuing it c à religendo of chusing againe. Hunc eligentes, vel potius religentes, amiser amus enim negligentes, unde & relictio dicta perhibetur. This word Religens is cited by Nigidius Figulus in Aulus Gellius; Religens esse oportet, Religiosum nefas: Religiosus being taken in bad sense for Superstitiosus. The same Father elsewhere, in his Booke de Vera Religione<sup>d</sup>, acknowledgeth another originall of the word, which Lactantius before him had obserued, à religando, of fastning, as being the bond betweene vs and God. Ad Deum tendentes, saith Augustine, & ei uni religantes animas nostras unde religio dicta creditur. Religet ergo nos Religio uni omnipotenti Deo. Lactantius his words are; Diximus nomen religionis à vinculo pietatis esse deductum, quod hominem sibi Deus reliquaerit & pietate constringerit, quia seruire nos ei ut Domino & obsequi ut patri, necesse est. Melius ergo (quàm Cicero)

Cicero id nomen Lucretius interpretatus est, quia ait se religionum nodos exoluere. And according to this etymologie is that which Maister Camden saith, * Religion in olde English was called Ean-fastnes, as the one and onely Assurance and fast Anchor-hold of our soules health.

* This is the effect of sinne and irreligion, that the name and practise of Religion is thus diuersified, else had there beene as one God, so one religion, and one language, wherein to giue it with iust reason, a proper name. For till men did relinquere, relinquish their first innocencie, and the Author of whom, and in whom they held it, they needed not religere, to make a second choise, or seeke reconciliation, nor thus relegere with such paines and vexation of spirit to enquire and practise those things which might religare binde them surer and faster vnto God: and in these respects for seuerall causes Religion might seeme to be deriued from all those fountaines. Thus much of the word, whereby the nature of Religion is in part declared, but more fully by the description thereof.

Religio est saith Augustine, qua superioris cuiusdam naturae quam diuinam vocant, curam ceremoniamque affert. Religion is here described generally (whether falsely or truly) professing the inward obseruation, and ceremoniall outward worship of that which is esteemed a higher and diuine nature. The true Religion is the true rule and right way of seruing God. Or to speake as the case now standeth with vs: True Religion is the right way of reconciling and reuniting man to God, that hee may be saued. This true way he alone can shew vs, who is the Way and the Truth; neyther can wee see this Sunne, except he first see vs, and giue vs both eyes to see, and light also whereby to discern him.

But to come to Adam, the subiect of our present discourse: His religion before his fall, was not to reunite him to God, from whom hee had not beene separated, but to vnite him faster, and daily to knit him neerer in the experience of that which nature had ingrafted in him. For what else was his Religion, but a pure streame of * Originall Righteousnes, flowing from that Image of God, wherunto he was created? Whereby his minde was enlightned to know the onely very God, and his heart was engrauen, not with the letter, but the life and power of the Law, louing and prouing that good and acceptable and perfect will of God. The whole man was conformable, and endeoured this holy practise, the bodie being pliant and flexible to the rule of the Soule, the Soule to the Spirit, the Spirit to the Father of Spirits, and God of all Flesh, which no lesse accepted of this obedience, and delighted (as the Father in his Childe) in this new modell of himselfe. How happy was that blessed familiarity with God, society of Angels, subiection of Creatures, enuied onely of the Diuels, because this was so good and they so wicked? Nature was his Schoole-master, or if you will rather, Gods Vsher, that taught him (without learning) all the rules of diuine Learning, of Politicall, Oeconomical, and Morall wisdome.

The whole Law was perfectly written in the fleshie Tables of his heart, besides the especiall command concerning the trees in the midst of the Garden, the one being an vniuersall and euerlasting rule of righteousness, the other by speciall authority appointed, as the manifestation of Gods diuine prerogatiue in commanding, and a triall of mans integritie in obeying. For the first part hereof, since it was so blurred in our hearts, it was renewed by the voyce and finger of God on Mount Sinai, giuen then immediately by God himselfe, as God ouer all; whereas the other partes of the Law, containing the Ceremoniall and Politicall ordinances were immediately giuen by the Ministerie of Moses, as to that particular Nation.

Neyther know I any that make doubt of this whole Law naturally and originally communicated: saue onely that some make question of the Sabbath. Howbeit, I must confesse that I see nothing in that Commandement of the Decalogue prescribed, but is Naturall and Morall: for, both the Rest is so farre Morall, as the outward actes of Diuine worship cannot be performed without suspending for a while our bodily labours: although Rest, as a figure, be Iewish, and in it selfe is eyther a fruite of wearinesse or idlenesse. And that the seuenth dayes obseruation is naturall

 t So Iustin reasoneth against Tryphan a Jew, & that Iewish Sabbathising: & so the rest, if their testimonies be well weighed.
 u *Gen. 2. 2, 3.

(I meane the obseruing of one day of seven in euery weeke) appeareth both by the first order established in Nature, when God blessed and sanctified the seuenth day; & the streame of Interpreters, especially the later, running and ioyning in this interpretation, (the Elder being somewhat more then enough busied in Allegories): by the reason in the Commandement, drawne from Gods example and Sanctification in the Creation: by the obseruation of a Sabbath, before this promulgation of the Law, Exod. 16. and by the diuision of the dayes into weekes, <sup>1</sup> both then and before by Noah, Gen. 8. 10. 12. by the necessitie of a Sabbath, as well before the Law in the daies of the Patriarkes, as in the times of Danid or Salomon: by the perfection of the number of seven in the Scriptures <sup>m</sup>: by the generall consent of all, that it is Morall to set apart some time to the Lord of times, and an orderly set time to the God of order, which men might generally agree on for their publike deuotions: which the Patriarkes practised in their Sacrifices and Assemblies; the Heathens blindly, as other things, in their Feasts. Thus saith Philo <sup>n</sup>: This is a feast-day, not of one Citie or Region, but of the whole world, and may be properly called the generall birth-day of the world: And Clement Alexandrinus sheweth out of Plato, Homer, Hesiod, Callimachus and Solon, that the seuenth day was not sacred alone to the Hebrewes, but to the Greekes also: and how mysticall was the number of seven, not onely among the Iewes, but also among the Heathens, both Philosophers and Poets? as Philo, <sup>o</sup> Macrobius and others haue related.

Hereunto agreeth the iudgement of Aquinas, <sup>p</sup> Præceptum de sanctificatione Sabbathi ponitur inter præcepta decalogi, in quantum est præceptum morale, non in quantum est ceremoniale. The Precept of sanctifying the Sabbath, is set amongst the Precepts of the Decalogue, as it is a morall, not as a ceremoniall Precept. It hath pleased him, <sup>q</sup> saith M. Hooker, as of the rest, so oftentimes to exact some parts by way of perpetuall homage, neuer to be dispensed withall nor remitted. The Morall law requiring therefore a seuenth part throughout the age of the whole world to be that way employed, although with vs the day be changed, in regard of a new reuolution begun by our Saviour Christ, yet the same proportion of time continueth which was before, because in reference to the benefit of Creation, and now much more of renouation thereunto added by him, which was Prince of the world to come, we are bound to account the sanctification of one day in seven, a duetie which Gods immutable law doth exact for ever. Thus farre Hooker.

This indeed in the Sabbath was Iewish and Ceremoniall, to obserue only that last and seuenth day of the weeke, and that as a figure, and lastly with those appointed Ceremonies, and that manner of obseruation. Thus saith Aquinas, <sup>r</sup> Habere aliquod tempus deputatum ad vacandum diuinis, cadit sub præcepto morali. Sed in quantum, &c. To haue some set time for the seruice of God is morall: but so farre this Precept is ceremoniall, as in it is determined a speciall time, in signe of the Creation of the World. Likewise it is ceremoniall, according to the allegoricall signification; in as much as it was a signe of the Rest of Christ in the graue, which was the seuenth day. And likewise according to the morall signification, as it signifieth a ceasing from euery act of sin, and the Rest of the minde in God. Likewise according to the Anagogicall signification, as it presignifieth the Rest of the fruition of God, which shall be in our Countrie.

To these obseruations of Thomas, we may adde that strictnesse of the obseruation, That they might not kindle a fire on the Sabbath, and such like. And howsoeuer some testimonies of the Fathers be alledged against this truth, and to proue that the Sabbath was borne at Mount Sinai, as of <sup>s</sup> Tertullian, Iustin Martyr, Eusebius, Cyprian, Augustine, which deny the Sabbathising of the Patriarkes before that time, and account it typicall. Why may we not interpret them of that Sabbath of the Iewes, which we haue thus distinguished from the morall Sabbath, by those former notes of difference? Broughton in his Conccent alledgeth the Conccent of Rabbins, as of Ramban on Gen. 26. and Aben Ezra vpon Exod. 20. That the Fathers obserued the Sabbath before Moses. And Moses himselfe no sooner commeth to a seuenth day, but hee sheweth, that <sup>t</sup> God rested, blessed, sanctified the same.

rituall deuotions from the beginning of the world, and that a seuenth dayes rest began, not with the Mosaicall Ceremonies in the Wildernesse (as some men will haue it) but with Adam in Paradise. That which is morall (say some) is eternall, and must not giue place; I answer, That the Commandements are eternall, but yet subordinate. There is a first of all the Commandements, and there is a second like to this, like in qualitie, not in equalitie: and in euery Commandement, the Soule of obedience (which is the obedience of the soule) taketh place of that bodie of obedience which is performed by the bodie. Mercie is preferred before sacrifice, and charity before outward worship; * Paul stayeth his preaching to heale Eutychus: Christ patronizeth his Disciples, plucking the eares of Corne, and affirmeth, That the Sabbath was made for man, and not man for the Sabbath. Although therefore both rest and workes of the Sabbath giue place to such duties, which the present occasion presenteth, as more waighie and necessarie to that time, yet doth it not follow, that the Sabbath is not morall, no more than the Commandement of almes is not morall, because (as * Bernard obserueth) the prohibitive Commandement of stealing is of greater force, and more bindeth. And in a word, the Negative Precepts are of more force, and more vniuersally bind than the affirmatiue. A man must hate his father and mother for Christs sake, and breake the Sabbaths rest for his neighbour in cases of necessity. And therefore such scrupulous * fancies, as some obtrude vnder the name of the Sabbath, esteeming it a greater sinne to violate this holy Rest, than to Commit murder, cannot be defended.

Pardon this long Discourse, whereunto the longer Discourses of others have brought me. But now me thinkes I heare thee say, And what is all this to Adams integritie? Doubtlesse, Adam had his particular calling, to till the ground: his generall calling also, to serue God; which as he was spiritually to performe in all things, so being a bodie, hee was to haue time and place set apart for the bodily performance thereof. And what example could he better follow, than of his Lord and Creator (But some object, This is to slacken him running, rather then to incite and prouoke him; to binde, and not to loose him; cannot be a spurre, but a bridle to his deuotion; but they should consider, that we doe not tie Adam to the seuenth day onely, but to the seuenth especiall, wherein to performe set, publique, and solempne worship. Neither did Daniel, that prayed thrice a day, or Dauid, in his seuen times, or Saint Paul, in his iniunction of praying continually, conceiue that the Sabbath would hinder men, and not rather further them in these workes. Neither was Adams state so excellent, as that he needed no helpes; which wofull experience in his fall hath taught. God gaue him power to liue, yea with an euertlasting life: and should not Adam therefore haue eaten, yea and haue had convenient times for food and sleepe and other naturall necessities? How much more in this perfect, yet flexible and variable condition of his Soule, did he need meanes of establishment, although euen in his outward calling hee did not forget, nor was forgotten? Which outward workes, though they were not irksome and tedious, as sinne hath made them to vs, yet did they detain his bodie, and somewhat distraet his minde, from that full and entire seruice which the Sabbath might exact of him. Neither doe they shew any strong reason for their opinion, which hold the sanctification of the Sabbath, Genes. 2. to be set downe by way of anticipation, or as a preparatiue to the Iewish Sabbath, ordained 2243. yeares after.

If any shall aske why the same seuenth day is not still obserued of Christians; I answer, this was figuratiue, and is abolished; but a seuenth day still remaineth. Lex naturalis est, conuictam habens ceremoniale designationem diei (saith Iunius.) The Law is naturall, having adioyned thereto the ceremoniall appointment of the day. But why is this day now called the Lords day? I answer, euen therefore, because it is the Lords day, not changed by the Churches Constitution Meere, as some seeme to hold; except by the Churches authoritie they meane Christ and his Apostles: nor descended to vs by Tradition, as the Papists maintaine, seeing the Scriptures, Act. 20. 7. 1. Cor. 16. 21. Apoc. 1. 10. mention the name and celebration by the constant pra-

Arbiter in this question of the Sabbath, who thus writeth to the Magnesian: Nam
Sabbatismus, Let vs not obserue the Sabbath after the Iewish manner, as delighting in ease; For he that worketh not, let him not eat: but let euery one of vs keepe the Sabbath spirituallly, not eating meat dressed the day before, and walking set spaces, &c.
But let euery Christian celebrate the Lords day, consecrated to the Lords resurrection, as the Queens and Princeesse of all dayes.

Now for the particular Commandement, which was giuen him as an especial proofof his obedience, in a thing otherwise not vnlawfull, it was the forbidding him to eat of the fruit of the Tree of Knowledge. For in the midst of the Garden God had planted two Trees, which some call Sacraments, and were, by Gods Ordinance, signes vnto him; one of life, if he obeyed; the other of death, by disobedience:
Not as the Iewes thought, and Iulian scoffed, That the Tree had power to giue sharpnesse of wit. And although some thinke signes needlesse to so excellent a creature; yet being mutable, subiect to temptation, and each way flexible to vertue or vice, according as hee vsed his naturall power of free-will, I see not why they should deny God that libertie to impose, or man that necessitie to need such monitories, and (as it were) Sacramentall instructions. For what might these Trees haue furthered him in carefulnesse, if he had considered life and death, not so much in these Trees, as in his free-will, and obeying or disobeying his Creator?

These Trees, in regard of their signification, and euent, are called the Tree of Life, and the Tree of Knowledge of good and euill; which was not euill or hurtfull in it selfe; but was a visible rule, whereby good and euil should be knowne, and that by reason of the Commandement annexed, which he might by this Precept see to be grounded in obeying or disobeying the authoritie of the Law-giuer. An easie rule, and yet too easily broken. For when as God did hereby challenge his owne Soueraignetie, by imposing so easie a fine, which might haue forbidden all but one (as contrariwise he allowed) and fore-signified the danger, that hee might continue his goodnesse to man, continuing in obedience, yet did Man herein shew his contempt, in reiecting so easie a yoake, and so light a burthen. I will not reason whether these two Trees may properly be called Sacraments; of which (say some) the one was but for the bodily life, and better neuer to haue touched the other; this we know, that in eating of this he lost both bodily and spirituall life, which the name and institution thereof forewarned, and should haue preuented: otherwise, in eating of the other, immortalitie had beene sealed both in soule and bodie, to him and his for euer. Strange it seemeth, that he should need no monitorie signes to preuent that, which, euen with these helps added, he did not eschew.

CHAP. V.

Of the fall of Man: and of Originall Sinne.

hitherto wee haue beheld the Creation of the World, and of our first Parents, the liuely Images of the Creator and the Creature; whom wee haue somewhat leisurely viewed in a naked Maiestie, delighting themselves in the enamelled walkes of their delightfull garden. The Riuer whereof ranne to present their best offices to their new Lords, from which they were forced by the backer streames, greedie of the sight and place which they could not hold: The Trees stouped to behold them, offering their shadie mantle and varietie of fruits, as their naturall tribute: each creature in a silent gladnesse reioyced in them, and they enioyed all mutuall comforts in the Creator, the Creatures, and in themselves. A blessed Payre, who enioyed all they desired, whiles their desire was worth the enioying: Lords of all, and of more than all, Content; which might, in all they saw, see their Makers bountie: and beyond all they could see, might see themselves comprehended, where they could not comprehend: of that infinite Greatnesse and goodnesse, which they could not but loue, reuerence, admire, and adore. This was then their Religion, to acknowledge with thankfulnessse, to be thankfull in obedience, to obey with cheerefulnessse, the Author of all this good: to the performance whereof, they found no outward, no inward impediment; Sicknesse, Perturbation, and Death (the deformed issue of Sinne) not yet being entred into the World.

In this plight did Satan (that old Serpent) see, disdain, and enuie them. It was not enough for him, and the diuellish crue of his damned associates, for their late rebellion, to be banished Heauen, but the inferiour world must be filled with his venom, working that malice on the creatures heere, which he could not there so easily wrecke on their Creator. And because Man was heere Gods Deputie and Lieutenant, as a pettie God on the Earth, hee chuseth him as the fittest subiect, in whose ruine to despise his Maker. To this end hee vseth not a Lion-like force, which then had bene bootlesse, but a Serpentine sleight, vsing that subtil creature as the meekest instrument to his Labyrinthian projects. Whereas by inward temptation hee could not so easily preuaile, by insinuating himselfe into their mindes, hee windes himselfe into this winding Beast, disposing the Serpents tongue to speake to the woman (the weaker vessell) singled from her husband, and by questioning doth first vndermine her. * The woman (whether shee had not yet experience in the nature of the creatures, or did admire so strange an accident, and would satisfie her curious minde in the further triall) entertained discourse, and was presently snared. For though shee held her to the Commandement, yet the threatening annexed shee did somewhat mince and extenuate. What shee seemed to lessen, hee feared not to annihilate, and wholly disanull, propounding not onely impunitie, but aduantage, That they should be as Gods, in the enriching of their mindes with further knowledge. This he perswadeth by the equiuocating in the name of the Tree (the first equiuocation we reade of, * otherwhere plainly termed a lye) charging God with falsehood and malignitie.

Thus he that abode not in the Truth himselfe, but was a Man-slayer from the beginning, and the father of Lying, which hee no where else borrowed, but had of his owne, perswaded her by his great subtiltie, first to doubt of Gods Truth in his Word (the first particular sinne that euermans heart entertained, for the other were but occasions and inducements; disobedience and vnthankfulnessse are more generall) after that shee vnlawfully lusted after this new knowledge, bewitched with the pleasantnesse of the fruit to the taste and sight, shee tooke and did eate, and gave to her husband likewise. The highest power of the soule is first intrapped, the lusting and sensible faculties follow after, iustly plagued by a correspondent inward rebellion, that the sense now ruleth the appetite; and this the reason, in our corrupt estate, which hence proceeded.

b Foolish and wicked is their conceit, that measure this Sinne by the fruit (a Nut or Apple) that was eaten: as Pope Iulius, That said hee might bee as well angrie for his Peacocke, as God (whose Vicar he was) for an Apple. Bal. de vit. Pont. c. Posse si vellent sed non velle ut possent.

b Thus vnbeliefe brought forth vnthankfulness; vnthankfulness, pride; from thence ambition, and all that rabble of contempt of Gods Truth, beleueing the Deuils lies, abuse of the creatures to wanton lust, Sacrilegious vsurping that which God had reserued, scandalous prouocation of her husband, with the murder bodily and ghostly, of him, her selfe, and their whole posteritie for euer; and whereas yet they had done so little seruice to God, they offered almost their first fruits to the Deuill, hauing c. Free-will to haue resisted if they would. No maruell then if such a combination of so many sinnes in one, wrung from the iustice of God such a multitude of iudgements on them and theirs, in the defacing that goodly and glorious Image of God; subiecting (in stead thereof) the body to Sicknesse, Cold, Heat, Nakednesse, Hunger, Thirst, Stripes, Wounds, Death; the Minde to Ignorance, Doubtings, Vanitie, Phancies, Phrenzies; the Will to Vnstaiednesse, Passions, Perturbations; the whole Man is made a slaue to Sinne within him, to the Deuill without; whence hee must expect wages sutable to his worke, Death; Spirituall, Naturall, and Eternall: and infinite punishment for offending an infinite Maiestie.

Thus had they put out their light in obscure darkenesse: and if they were not presently cast into vtter darknesse, it was Gods mercy (not their merit) which suspended the first and naturall death, to prevent that second & eternall. But spirituallly they were euen already dead in sinnes, as appeared by the accusations of their conscience; whereof Moses saith, The eyes of them both were opened, and they knew that they were naked. Conscience, before Vertues keeper, was now become Hels harbinger, thence flashing lightnings in the face of their mindes, to shew that their nakednesse did now appeare filthy in Gods sight: Lightnings indeed, which could only lighten to terrifie, not enlighten with instruction & comfort: Which sparke remaineth after the fire of Gods Image extinct, by the mercifull providence of God, in some c. to be a bridle of Nature, least they should runne into all excessse of villanie, and not leaue a face of the world in the world, and to be to others, by disposition and working of a higher & supernatural Light, a preparatiue to, and a preseruatiue in that light of Life. So much the greater is their sinne, that seek to flash out these flashings: and whereas they cannot read the booke of Scripture, and will not read the booke of the Creature, labour to extinguishe also this Light of Nature, that with seared consciences they may more freely in darknesse commit the workes of darknesse. And euen this did Adam seeke, if God had not brought him out of his Owles nest. For what could a Fig-leave hide from God? and did they thinke the innocent Trees would conspire with them to conceale Traitors? Was there any darkenesse which was not Light to him? Or could Breeches and Trees couer their Soules, which receiued the first and worst Nakednesse; till which, Nakednesse to the body was a Clothing of Beautie, a Liuerie of Bountie, an Ensigne of Maiestie? Such f. broken pits seeke they that forsake the Fountaine of liuing Waters.

And yet when God commeth into iudgement, and g. makes the windes to vsheer him vnto his priuate Sessions in Paradise; to those shiflesse shifts they added worse, impiously accusing God, vncharitably charging one another, to put from themselves that blame which thus claue faster to them. A medicine worse than the disease, or a disease in stead of a medicine is hypocrisie, that will not see her owne sicknesse, and seekes rather to couer, then to cure; to couer by charging others, then recouer by discharging and discovering it selfe; as if h. equitie pretended were not iniquitie doubled. God proceedeth to sentence, a sentence worthie of God, shewing at once his infinite iustice in the punishment of sinne, and no lesse infinite mercie, to provide an infinite price to redeeme vs; by his infinite power bringing good out of euill, and by his manifold wisdom taking that wife one in his craftinesse, who in the destruction of man had sought Gods dishonour. So good is it that euill should bee, when this soueraigne goodnesse purposeth to effect his good will by wicked instruments, out of their darknesse producing his owne maruellous light: as appeared in this worke of Sathan an aduersarie, intended to his despite; in, and by the promised Seede, disposed to his

glorie. & The Serpent hath a bodily curse in his future bodily difficulties, which still continue, for his instrumentall and bodily employment. g Gen 3.14.

The old Serpent and spirituall Enemie, hath a spirituall and eternall curse, the breaking of his head by that Seede of the Woman, that should once leade Captiuitie captive. Our Parents are cursed, yet so, as their curse is turned into a blessing; all things working to the best: In sorrow shall be the Womans conceptions, but recompensed with the ioy which followeth (and is as it were the Mid-wife in their trauell) because of fruit borne into the World; and more then recompensed, in that they are saved by bearing of children, if they continue in the faith, and liue in holinesse with modestie. h 1 Pet. 1.10.
Adam is set to labour, not as before, with delight, but with paine and difficultie; the Earth also being cursed for his sake: yet by this narrow way, by this crosse-way he is guided to Heauen; the hope wherof was giuen him, before Paradise was taken from him. So true is it, that in iudgement he remembreth mercie, if we can learne to liue by faith, and not by sight. i Job. 16.21.
k 1 Tim. 2.22.

This, that Moses telleth of the fall of Man, Experience doth in manner proclaime through the World, in the manifold effects thereof, which we daily see. For whereas the World was made for Man, as before is shewed, who alone, in regard of his bodily and spirituall nature, can neede and vse it, no creature in the world is in his kinde so imperfect as Man. Hee that was before as an earthly God, is now become an incarnate Deuill, and for aspiring to be like his Lord, was made a seruant of his seruants; the noblest part in him becoming a base Officer to degrade him, Reason it selfe dejected at the feet of Sense, to be a slaue, and a very Bawd to sensuall pleasures, a very Broker for dung-hill-profits. And what is this but to metamorphose man into a beast? vnlesse that some in a lower degree, liuing only to liue, suffocated with eating, drinking, sleeping, are degenerated into plants? And if he descend not lower, to become torpide and lifelesse, yet doth he participate the imperfections of those things, and that without their perfections, as if with an imperfect retrograde he would returne into his first elements. What stone so hard as mans heart is relentlesse, remorselesse to his best good? What dust more subiect to the winde, or water more flexible, then he to temptation and sinne? But those things remaine in their nature, or naturall place: Man is a fuming smoke, a passing shadow. And yet if we could stay at our Elements, it were somewhat better, but we are seruants and drudges beneath all names of basenesse, vnbowelling the earth, and our selues in the earth, for a little hardened earth, that neuer had the dignitie to see, no not to be scene of the Sunne. We seeme to rule the Skie, Windes, and Seas; indeede we aduenture our liues to their mercie, and not three fingers thickenesse doth separate vs from death, that we may bring home an idle discourse, or somewhat, almost lesse then nothing, that we call a Jewell. Once, wee inuert Nature, subuert others, peruert our selues, for those things which sometimes kill the body, and alway (except a power, with whom all things are possible, preuent) the Soule: And yet Thou foole, this night they may fetch away thy Soule; and whose then shall these things be? And whose then, and where then, shalt thou be? Thou gainest faire to lose thy selfe, to be taken with thy taking, to be thus bad to others, that thou maiest be worse to thy selfe: and when as (like an Asse) thou hast beene laden all the daies of thy life with those things, which euen in hauing thou wantedst, now to be more intolerably burthened, now to bee in Hell, which will neuer bee satisfied in thee, whose character was before engrauen in thy vn-satiable heart. Tell me not then of the reasonable power of our Soules, whereby we resemble God, seeing that reason may tell thee and mee, that by abusing it we are like, and are of our Faiber the Deuill. That erected countenance to be still grouelling in, and poring on the earth; that immortall soule to minde only such things as haue not the imperfect priuiledge to bee mortall; those high excellencies to bee abused to mischiefe, blaspheming, denying, forswearing God, and all for the basest of the basest creatures. Well might this deluge of corruption moue that Cynick, in a throng of men to make search for a Man, this man which is now left vs being but the ruines, the carkasse of himselfe. But what needes all this? Why are we fallen into so long and tedious discourse of our fall? Even l Luc. 12.30.

because some are fallen further, beyond all sense and feeling of their fall, and beleue not that man was euer any other creature then now they see; that if their goodnesse canot, yet their wickednes might teach them, that so perfect a world should not haue beene framed for so imperfect a wretch, now only perfect in imperfection. Our fall must teach vs to rise, our straying to returne, our degeneration a regeneration. And therefore was not that Image of God wholly done out, but some remainder continued to the posteritie, to conuince them of miserie in themselves, that so denying themselves, they might take vp their Crosse, and follow the second Adam vnto a durable happinesse.

But how (may some aske, as the Pelagian did) came this miserie to vs? Non peccat ille qui genuit, non peccat ille qui condidit, per quas igitur rimas inter tot praesidia innocentie fingis peccatum ingressum? Doth it agree with diuine Iustice, that if the Fathers haue eaten soure grapes, the childrens teeth should be set on edge? I answere we are heires of our father, we neede not seeke some secret cranie, we see an open gate, by one man sinne entred into the world, and death by sinne. A little leaue let vs borrow to cleare this difficultie. Sinne is a transgression of the Law, or a defect of conformitie to the Law, (si de aqua pura dicitur non de aqua) and cannot properly be said to haue an efficient, but a deficient cause, being in it owne nature & subsistence, in se ipso ens. The Schoolmen say, in sinne are two things to be considered, the substance and the qualitie, essence and priuation, the act and defect, whereof that they call the Materiall, this the Formall part of sinne, being nothing else but a deformitie, irregularitie, and vnlawfulnessse in our naturall condition and conditions, as easie to be distinguished, though not to be diuided, from the action, as lamenessse from the working hand, or iarring in an Instrument, both from the Instrument and sound. The sinner is termed nequam, as nequicquam, naught, as not bought. Not that sinne is simply nothing, Non negatine sed priuatiue Nihil; nor is it a meere and pure priuation, but to bee considered with that subiect, wherein and whereof it is such a distortion and destruction: the want of this consideration draue the Manichees to their hereticall opinion of two beings and beginnings. Sinne was first seene in the Deuill, who voluntarily straid from the right way, and as he abode not in the Truth himselfe, so he beguiled our first Parents, from whom, by the Conduit of Nature, it is conueied to vs. I speake of Originall sinne, which is our inheritance; for actuell finnes are our owne purchase and improuement, and yet bought with that stock which our Parents left vs: Our first Parents are to be considered, not as singular persons only, whereby they defiled themselves, but as the roote of mankind, which had receiued originall righteoufnesse, to keepe or to loose to them and theirs, as a perpetuall inheritance. As in the Bodie Politike, the Act of the Prince is reputed the Act of the whole; the consent of a Burgesse in Parliament bindeth the whole Citie which hee representeth: and * as in the naturall Bodie the whole Body is liable to the guilt of that fact which the head or hand hath committed: as a roote to his branches, a Fountaine to his streames, doth conuey the goodnesse or badnesse which it selfe hath receiued: So stands it betwixt vs and Adam our naturall Prince, the Burgesse of the World, the Head of his humane Bodie and Generation, the Root and Fountaine of our Humanitie. When he sinned, he lost to himselfe and vs that Image of God, or that part of the Image of God, which hee had receiued for himselfe and vs; not the substance, nor the faculties of body or soule, but the conformitie in that substance and faculties to the will of God, in righteoufnesse and bolinesse of truth.

Not so much therefore are wee here to consider the ordinarie course of Nature, wherein the soule that sinneth, it shall die: as the Ordinance of God, who appointed the first Adam, the Well-spring of Nature, which he receiued incorrupted; the second of Grace; that as men, wee all by generation are of the first and with the first, * one old man, in whom wee all sinned; of and with the second Adam wee are a all one new man in the Lord, euen one Bodie, one Spirit, one Seede, one Christ, in whom, and with whom, wee, as members of that Head, obeyed the Precepts, and suffered the Curse of the Law. b Other finnes of Adam are not our naturall, but his

personall, because he could be no longer a publike person, then while hee had somewhat to saue or loose for vs; all being already forfeited in this first sinne. The Author then of Originall Sinne is the propagator of our Nature: this aduall sinne is originally ours; the Guilt being deuied by imputation, the Corruption by naturall generation. First, that Person corrupted Nature; after, Nature infected our Persons. The matter of this Originall corruption, in regard of the subiect, is All and euery man, and All and euery part of all and euery man, subiect to all sinne, that if all bee not as bad as any, and the best as the worst, it must bee ascribed to Gods restraining, or renewing, nor vnto vnequall degrees in this originall staine.
In regard of the object, the matter of it is the want of originall Righteousnesse, and a contrarie inclination to Euill; * The imaginations of our hearts being only euill continually. No Grapes can grow on these Thornes. The forme of this corruption is the deformitie of our corrupted Nature, not by infusion or imitation, but by default of that first instrument, by which this Nature descendeth. It is the roote of a small sinnes; and whereas they, as fruits, are transient, this still remaineth, vntill Christ by his death destroyeth this death in vs.

But here ariseth another difficultie; How this sinne can bee deuied by Generation, seeing it is truly beleueed, that God is a Father of Spirits, the Father of our Soules, which doth by infusion create, and by creation infuse them; corruptible Elements being vnable to procreate an incorruptible substance, or generation to produce incorruption. Neither standeth it with reason, that he which communica-teth not the substance, should communicate the accidents; or with justice, that an innocent Soule should necessarily be stained by involuntarie infusion into, a polluted bodie.

I answer hereunto, That although the Soule be not traduced (as they terme it) and by generation conferred; yet is it coupled to the bodie in that manner and order which God had appointed for the coniunction thereof, though man had not sinned:
Neither was it the Soule alone in Adam, or the body alone, but the Person, consisting of both, which sinned: Neither can we be partakers of Natures sinne, till we be partakers of humane Nature, which is not, till the Soule and Bodie be vnited. We are not so much therefore to looke to the concupiscence & lust of the Parents in generation, as Lumbard teacheth vs; but to the Person; which, Scotus saith, is filia Ade, & debitrix iustitie originalis. And although the Soule be not in the seede, yet it is communicated to the Bodie (saith Aquinas) by a dispositiue or preparatiue power of the seede, which disposeth and prepareth the Bodie to the receiuing of the Soule, where it is receiued (after the generall rule) according to the measure and nature of that which receiueth. The Father is then a perfect Father, not because hee begetteth the Soule, but because he begetteth the Person, or at least all whatsoever in the Person is begotten: and though he doth not beget the substance thereof; yet, as it is such a substance, he may be said to procreate it, because his generation worketh towards the Vnion of the Soule and Bodie; which Vnion is made by the Spirits, Animall and Virall. And these Spirits are procreated by the seede, and consist of a middle nature, as it were betwixt bodily and spirituell: so that the production of the Soule, and incorporating thereof, may bee counted in the middle way betwene Creation and Generation. And therefore this originall corruption did not reach to Christ Iesus, although he were true Man, because he was the seede of the woman, and did not descend of Adam by generation (per seminalem rationem, tanquam a principio actiuo, saith Aquinas) but was miraculously framed in the wombe, and of the substance of the Virgin, by the power of the holy Ghost.

Thus haue I presumed to offer my crude and rude Meditations to the wiser World, about the deriuation of Originall sinne, which it selfe is the cause why we can no better see it, as darkenesse hideth it selfe. But the whole Citie of Mankinde being herewith set on fire, it behoueth euery one to be more carefull to quench it, then ouercuriously to enquire how it came: It is sufficient, that nothing descended hereby to vs by corruption, or was made ours by imputation, which is not fully cured by Christ:

many Martyrs: hath Religion, yea superstition yeelded? but who will lay downe his life to seale some Politicians authoritie? And so farre is it that Religion should be grounded on Policie, that Policie borroweth helpe of Religion. Thus did Numa father his Romane lawes on Ageria, and other Law-giuers on other supposed Deities, which had been a foolish argument, and vnreasonable manner of reasoning, to perswade one obscuritie by a greater, had not Nature before taught them religious awe to God, of which they made vse to this ciuill obedience of their lawes, supposed to spring from a Diuine fountaine. Yea the falshoods and varietie of religions are euidences of this Truth; seeing men will rather worship a Beast, stocke, or the basest creature, then professe no religion at all. The Philosophers also that are accused of Atheisme, for the most part, did not deny religion simply, but that irreligious religion of the Greekes in idolatrous superstition, Socratus rather swearing by a dogge, or an oke, then acknowledging such Gods. It is manifest then, that the Image of God was by the Fall depraued, but not vterly extract; among other sparkes this also being rayed vp in the ruines of our decayed Nature; some science of the God-head, some conscience of Religion: although the true Religion can be but one, and that which God himselfe teacheth, as the onely true way to himselfe; all other Religions being but strayings from him, whereby men wander in the darke, and in labyrinthes of errour: like men drowning, that get hold on every twig, or the foolish fish that leape out of the frying-pan into the fire.

Thus God left a sparke of that light couered vnder the ashes of it selfe; which himselfe vouchsafed to kindle into a flame, neuer since, neuer after to be extinguished. And although that rule of Diuine Iustice had denounced morre morietis, to die, and againe to die a first and second death; yet vnasked, yea by cauilling excuses further prouoked, he by the promised seed erected him to the hope of a first and second resurrection; a life of Grace first, and after of Glorie. The Sonne of God is promised to be made the seed of the woman: the substantiall Image of the inuisible God, to be made after the Image and similitude of a Man, to reforme and transforme him againe into the former Image and similitude of God: that he, which in the forme of God thought it not robbery (for it was nature) to be equal with God, should be made nothing to make vs something, should not spare himselfe that hee might spare vs, should become partaker of our Nature, flesh of our flesh, and bone of our bone, that he might make vs partakers of the Diuine Nature, flesh of his flesh, and bone of his bone. This was that seed of the woman, that hath broken the Serpents head, which by death hath overcome death, and him that had the power of death, the Diuell, who submitted himselfe to a death in it selfe bitter, before men shameful, and of God accursed, that he might bring vs to a life peaceable, glorious, and blessed, beyond what eye hath scene, or heart can conceive.

This promise of this Seed, slaine from the beginning of the world, was the seed of all true Religion, the soule of faith, the life of hope, the well-spring of charitie. True it is that all receiued not this promise alike: for a seed of the Serpent was fore-signified also, which should bruise the heele of the Womans seed. And this in the first seed and generation of man soone appeared: Cain and Abel were hereof liuely examples. It appeareth that God had taught Adam how he would be worshipped, as it were ordering & ordaining him the first Priest of the world, which function hee fulfilled both in instructing his wife & children, in prayer with and for them, and in the rites of sacrificing. His children accordingly in proceſſe of time brought and offered their sacrifices.

As concerning sacrifices, some hold opinion (according to their owne practise) that Nature might teach Adam this way of seruing God: as if Nature were as well able to find the way, as to know that she is out of the way, and were as well scene in the particular manner, as in the generall necessitie of Religion. We cannot see the Sun without the Sun, nor come to God but by God, to whom Obedience is better then sacrifice, and to hearken, better then the fat of Rammes. Abel, saith the Scripture, offered by faith, without which faith it is impossible to please God: but faith hath necessarie relation to the word of God, who otherwise will be wearis of our solemnities, and asketh, who hath required them at our hands. These sacrifices also, besides that they were acknowledgements of their thankfulness, and v<sup>e</sup>all confessions of their sinne and death, due to them therefore, did leade them by the hand to Christ that Lambe of God, that should take away the sinnes of the world, figured by these slaine beasts, confirming their faith in the promise and hope of the accomplishment: of which Nature could not once haue dreamed, which hath rather a the impression of some confused notions, that we haue lost the way and ought to seeke it, then either light to discerne it, or wisdom to guide vs in it.

Of sacrificing, there were from the beginning two kinds, the one called <sup>b</sup> Gifts or oblations of things without life: the other <sup>c</sup> Victims (so our Rhemists haue taught vs to English the word Victima) slaine sacrifices of birds and beasts: Again, they were propitiatorie, consecratorie, Eucharisticall, and so forth, whose kinds and rites Moses hath in his bookes, especially in Leuiticus, so plainly declared, that I should but powre water into the sea, or light a candle to the Sun, to dilate much of them: these being the same in signification with the Leuiticall, and little (if little) differing in the manner of doing. Cain brought <sup>d</sup> his offering, being an husbandman, of the fruit of the ground. Abel a shepheard, of the fattest of his sheepe: God respected Abel and his offering, (the tree first, and then the fruit, the worker, and then the worke) which hee signified either by voice, or by <sup>e</sup> fire from heauen, according to Theodotians translation; <sup>f</sup> as in the sacrifices of Aaron, Gideon, Manoah, David, Salomon, Elias: or by some other meanes, both comfortable to Abel, and enuied of Cain, who therefore slew him; thus in this member bruising the heele of that blessed seed, as a type of that which the head himselfe should after sustaine.

Heere is the first Apostasie after that first Euangelicall promise, and the first diuision of Religion, Cain being the first builder of the <sup>g</sup> Earthly Citie, not that which he called after the name of his son, <sup>h</sup> Henoch, but of that spirituall citie of the wicked, the seed of the Serpent, which he founded in his brothers blood: euen as that later Compendium thereof, which called her selfe Caput mundi, the head of the world (and indeed <sup>i</sup> the World is vsually in Scripture applied to that seed of the Serpent, as it is opposite to the seed of the Woman) was by Romulus her first founder by like example of fratricide in the murder of Remus, dedicated (as it were) to the future mysterie of iniquitie, the seat of the Beast, and of the Whore, (by whose authoritie, Christ himselfe was slaine) drunken after with the blood of his Saints: and still breathing blood and slaughter, to every Abel that will not communicate in her spirituall whoredomes: that will not with her offer the fruits of the ground (the sacrifice of Cain) which neither came from heauen, nor can guide to heauen, being earthly, sensuall, diuellsish.

Cain was for this his fact conuicted by that All-seeing Iustice, who both by open sentence and inward terrors accused and accursed him, continuing his life, euen for the same cause that other murderers lose it, that he might liue an example (which then in that vnpeopled world by his death he could not haue beene) to the future generations, branded <sup>k</sup> also by the Lord with some sensible marke, to exempt him, and terrifie others, from that bloodie crueltie: this mercie being mixed with this iudgement, a longer time of repentance. God before <sup>l</sup> cursed the earth for Adam, he now <sup>m</sup> cursed Cain from the earth, to be a runnagate, and wanderer thereon. For how could he, that had so forsaken God, but be forsaken of the earth, and of himselfe? the <sup>n</sup> stable and mercifull earth, which before had opened her mouth to receiue his brothers blood, shrinking, and (as it were) grudging to support such wicked feet, and by denying him her strength, forcing him to his manifold shifts, and shittlesse remouings. Wretched man alwayes bleeding his brothers blood; not daring to looke vp to heauen, fearing to looke downe to hell, the world without him threatening a miserable life, his bodie branded to contempt and shame till his death, his soule become a stage of Anguish, Feare, Horror, and other Furies, the harbingers of hell: not able to suffer (which yet he cannot but suffer) the guilt of passed wickednesse gnawing him, the waight of present miserie pressing him, the dread of a death, and a death attending him: restless in himselfe, hated of the world, despairing of reliefe from God: a liuely mappe of the deadely

b Calu. in Gen. Martyr. in Gen. Chrysost. hom. 20. Cain, more vexed with the punishment, then at the fault of his sinne, departed from the presence of the Lord, which is meant either of his iudiciall conuenting him, or <sup>b</sup> in regard of the visible societie of the Church, cradled yet in his fathers household, where God did especially shew his present providence, protection and grace, who otherwise sitteth the heauen and earth, of whom and in whom they are: from hence, as Adam before out of Paradise, so Cain was, as it were, excommunicated, expelled, and out-lawed, and dwelt in the land of Nod, which <sup>c</sup> some take to be appellatiuely spoken, as if his miserie had giuen name of Moning vnto the place where he dwelled, or roamed rather: <sup>d</sup> Iosephus saith, he built Naida, applying it to a proper place, which was either Eastward from Eden, or Eastward towards Eden from Canaan, where Adam is supposed to haue dwelt, and after with his wife to haue been buried at Hebron. Afterward, his posteritie being multiplied (his wife, Epiphan. out of Leptogenesis calleth Shana, <sup>e</sup> Comestor calleth her Chalmana, <sup>f</sup> Philo. Thamech) he built a citie which he called by the name of his sonne & Henoeb: to crosse that curse of his wandering to and fro on the earth, or to arme him against others, which his guiltie conscience caused him to feare, or to be a receptacle and store-house of those spoiles, which, Iosephus saith, he robbed from others by violence, when as the earth was barren to him. Philo (if we may so entitle that Author) which hath written of the antiquities of the Bible, ascribeth to him other cities, Mauti, Leed, Tebe, Iesca, Celes, Iebbat, adding that he liued 730. yeares. These things may be probable, although that Author be otherwile fabulous, considering that men did ordinarily liue many hundred yeares in those times, and were also exceeding fruitfull, especially after that Polygamy was embraced of that family. <sup>h</sup> And if that in Abrabams posteritie the seed of Iacob in lesse then 300. yeares was multiplied to so <sup>i</sup> great a people, it is like that the Cainites were no <sup>k</sup> lesse populous, living in more freedom. He first (saith Iosephus) found out weights and measures, and assigned proprieties in possessions of land, before common as the aire and light, and was author to lewd persons, of a lewd and vngodly life. Probable it is that the Citie was called Henoeb, because the curse suffered not the father to stay in a place, but to leaue a hasty inheritance to his son to finish and rule it. Iabal and Iubal and Tubalcain, were inuentors of Arts: the first to dwell in tents and keepe cattell; the second of muscicall instruments: the third of working in mettals, and making of Armour, which some thinke to be Vulcan, by the neerenes of name and occupation. His <sup>l</sup> sister Naamah is accounted by some Rabbines, the first inuenter of making Linnen and Woollen, and of vocall Musicke; yea they make her the wife of Noah also.

Thus let vs leaue this family multiplying in numbers, in sciences, in wickednesse, fauouring nothing diuine, or at least nothing but humane in their Diuinitie: (therefore called the sonnes of men <sup>m</sup>), let vs looke backe to Adam, who in this wicked fruit of his bodie might reade continuall lectures of repentance for the sinne of his soule. Adam begate a child in his owne likenesse <sup>n</sup>, that is, not in that likenesse of God, wherein he was created, but like vnto himselfe, both in humane nature, and naturall corruption, his name he called Seth, of whose posterity the whole world was by Noah repeopled. Vnto Seth was borne Enosh. Then began men, saith Moses, to call vpon the name of the Lord. This some <sup>o</sup> interpret of the beginning of idolatry, that men began to prophane the name of the Lord: some to call the name of the Lord, that is, after Rabbi Salomo, to apply the name of God to Images, Stars and men: But the more likely opinion is, that when Adam had obtained a more holy posterity, which was now multiplied in diuers families, <sup>p</sup> Religion which before had bin a priuat in-mate in Adams household, was now brought into publike exercise, whereof Prayer hath alwaies bin accounted a q that instruction whereby Seth was taught, and became a perfect man: the others being beasts and Rochus, which in an allegoricall sense may be truly spoken; and so perhaps was meant. <sup>r</sup> Broughton. principall part, and God himselfe in both Testaments calleth his house a house of prayer; the calues of the lips, and the eiaculations of the heart being the body and soule of Diuine worship, whereof sacrifices were in a manner but the apparell, fashioned to that infancie of the Church. Of the names * of the posterity of Adam, and his hundred yeares mourning for Abel; of Seth, his remouing after Adams death to a mountaine neere Paradise, and such other things, more fauouring of fabulous vanity in the false-named Methodius, Philo and others that follow them, I list not to write. And well might Genebrard haue spared his paines in searching for the antiquity of Popery in this first age of the world. Easily may we grant a Church then, truly Catholik, in the posteritie of Seth, instructed partly by reuelations, partly by Traditions, concerning the creation, the fall, the good and euill Angels, the promised seed, the vnity and Trinity, punishments and repentance for sinne, publike and priuate deuotions, and other like Articles gathered out of Moses: but for the rabble of Rabbinicall dreams which he addeth hereunto, we had neede of the implicite faith of some simple credulous Catholike to receiue them: as namely Purgatorie resembled in the fiery sword at the entrance of Paradise, Free will grounded on that which God speaketh to Caine, Thou shalt rule ouer him (the prerogatiue of the elder brother ouer the yonger falsely applied to the rule of the minde ouer sinfull lusts) the choise of meates in the first fathers abstinence from flesh, fish, and wine (as he saith) which had not bene permitted to them, as it is to vs: Traditions, when as yet they had no Scripture: superstitious obsequies to the dead: because the Iewes in their office for the dead call vpon the fathers which lie buried at Hebron (namely Adam, Eue, and the rest) to open the gates of Paradise: Deuotion to Saints, because the Cherubims were set betweene Paradise and sinners; (as if their Saints were honoured to keepe them out of heauen) and not the bloody sacrifices onely in Abels offering, but that vnbloudie sacrifice (so they stile their Masse) in the offering of Caine: (we enuie them not their founder) yea, he finds their sacraments of Orders in Gods executing the Priestly function, of matrimony in Adam and Eue, of Baptisme in the breeches which they ware, of Penance because God said, Thou art dust, and to dust thou shalt returne, of Confirmation in those words, Shee shall breake thy head (the Truth will breake their heads for so reading it) of Vnction in that Seth went to the Cherub which kept Paradise, and receiued of him three graines of the tree of life, whereof we read in the Apocalyps, the leaues shall heale the Nations; with those graines was an oyle made, wherewith Adam was anoyled, and the stones put into his mouth, whence sprang the tree whereof the Crosse of our Lord was made, hidden by Salomon in the Temple, and after in the poole of Bethesda. Spectatum admissirium teneat amici? Did not Genebrard deserue an Archbishoppricke? or if the obseruation be his, did not Petrus Victor Palma deserue the Palme-victory for Peters pretended successors, which could finde such antiquity for prooofe of their Catholicisme? Much good may it doe their Catholique mawes with such dainties. Iust art thou O Lord, and iust are thy iudgements, which because they will not beleene thy truth, giuest them ouer to such strong delusions, so beleene so grosse and palpable lies.

* Some are of opinion that all those Fathers mentioned Gen. 5. were Ecclesiasticall Fathers also, & Priests for diuine worship, which function of Lordship and Priesthood vniued, continued to the first-borne many generations after the flood. Betram. pol. Iud. c. 2.

CHAP. VII.

Of the cause and comming of the Flood.

Hus we haue scene in part the fulfilling of the Prophecie of the seed of the Woman, and of that other of the Serpent, in the posteritie of Caine and Seth. The family of Caine is first reckoned, and their forwardnes in humane Arts, as the children of this world are wiser in their generation, in the things of this life, which they almost onely attend, then the children of light. As for the Iewish dreames, that Lamech was blinde, and by the direction of Tubalcaine his sonne guiding his hand slew Caine, supposing it had bene a wilde wilde beast, which when he knew, so enraged him, that he killed his son also, they that list may follow.

Moses reckoneth the Generations according to the first-born in the posterity of Seth, as enjoying the Principalitie and Priesthood, that so the promised seede of the Woman (after such a world of yeares comming into the world) might iustifie the stablesse of Gods promises, his lineall descent from Adam with a due Chronologie, being declared. After Seth, Enosh, Kenan, Mehalaleel, Jared was Enoch the seventh from Adam, who walked with God, whom God took away that he should not see death. This before the Law, and Helias in the Law, are witnesses of the resurrection; being miraculously taken from the earth into heaven, not by death, but by supernaturall changing of their bodies. That he should be still in<sup>b</sup> an earthly Paradise, and that he and Elias should come and preach against Antichrist, and of him be slaine, is a Popish dreame; the scripture saying, that Enoch was taken away that he should not see death; of Elias, that he is<sup>d</sup> already come in the person of Iohn Baptist: the spirit and power, or spirituall power of walking with God, reforming Religion, and conuerting foules, being communicated to many of those Ministers which haue lien slaine in the streetes of that great Cittie.

This his assumption is<sup>e</sup> supposed to be visibly done. He was a Prophet, and Iude doth in his Epistle cite a testimony of his, which either by<sup>f</sup> tradition went from hand to hand, as it seemeth the whole word of God was deliuered before the dayes of Moses; God by visions and dreames appearing vnto the Patriarkes; or else it was written and since is lost. Some holde it was penned by some Iew vnder the name of Enoch. <sup>g</sup> Augustine thinketh that the Booke entituled Enoch was forged in his name, as other writings vnder the names of Prophets and Apostles: and therefore calleth it Apocrypha (as<sup>h</sup> Hierome doth also) <sup>i</sup> Chrysostome and Theophylact account Moses the first Pen-man of holy Scripture. Although it seeme that letters were in vse before the flood, if<sup>k</sup> Iosephus his testimonie be true, who affirmeth that Adam having prophesied two vniuersall destructions, one by fire another by water, his posterity erected two pillars, one of bricke another of stone, in both which they writ their inuentions of Astronomy; that of stone was reported to remaine in his time. Some<sup>l</sup> ascribe this to Seth, as also the first naming of the seuen Planets. The science of Astronomy, they say, was much furthered by Enoch, who (saith Eusebius) was by the Greekes called Atlas, to whom they attributed the inuention thereof. <sup>m</sup> Pliny was of opinion that letters were eternall.

Howsoeuer, it is more then apparant, that the booke bearing Enochs name, is very fabulous, which, because the tales therein professe antiquitie (although they were later dreames) I thought it not vnfit to borrow out of<sup>n</sup> Scaliger somewhat of that which he hath inserted, in his notes vpon Eusebius, the Greeke copie being, as the phrase testifieth, translated out of Hebrew, which had bene the worke of some Iew: the antiquitie appeareth, in that<sup>o</sup> Tertullian citeth it.

And<sup>p</sup> it came to passe when the sonnes of men were multiplied, there were borne to them faire daughters, and the Watch-men (so he calleth the Angels out of Dan. 4.) lusted and went astray after them; and they said one to another, <sup>q</sup> Let vs chuse vs wiues of the daughters of men of the earth. And Semias their Prince said vnto them, I feare me you will not doe this thing, and I alone shall be debter of a great sinne. And they all answered him & said; We will all sweare with an oath, and will Anathematise or curse our selues not to alter this our minde till we haue fulfilled it, and they all sware together. These came downe in the dayes of Jared to the top of the hill Hermon. And they called the hill Hermon because they sware and Anathematized on it. These were the names of their Rulers, Semias, Atarcuph, Arachiel, Chababiel, Oramname, Ramiel, Sapsich, Zakiel, Balkiel, Azazel, Pharmaros, Samiel, &c.

These tooke them wiues, and three generations were borne vnto them: the first were great Giants; the Giants begate the Naphelim, to whom were borne Elud; and they taught them and their wiues sorceries and enchantments. Eazel taught first to make fwords and weapons for warre, and how to worke in mettals. He taught to make womens ornaments, and how to looke faire, and Jewelling. And they beguiled the Saints; and much sinne was committed on the earth. Other of them taught the vertues of Roots, Astrologie, Diuinations; &c. After these things the Giants began to eate the flesh of men, and men were diminished: and the remnant cried to heauen, because of their wickednesse, that they might come in remembrance before him. And the foure great Archangels Michael, Gabriel, Raphael and Uriel hearing it, looked downe on the earth from the holy places of heauen: and beholding much bloudshed on the earth, and all vngodlinesse and transgression committed therein, said one to another, That the Spirits and Soules of men complaine, saying, That ye should present our prayer to the Higheest, and our destruction. And the foure Archangels crying, said to the Lord, Thou art God of Gods and Lord of Lords, &c. Thou seest what Exael hath done, he hath taught mysteries, and reuealed to the world the things in heauen, &c. Then the Higheest said, The Holy one, The Great one spake and sent Vriël to the sonne of Lamech, saying, Goe to Noe, tell him of the end approaching, and a flood shall destroy the earth, &c. To Raphael he said, Go Raphael and binde Exael hand and foot, and cast him into darknesse, and open the wilderness in the desert of Dodoel, and there cast him, and lay vpon him sharpe stones to the day of iudgement, &c. And to Gabriel he said, Go Gabriel to the Giants, and destroy the sons of the Watch-men from the sons of Men, set them one against another in warre and destruction. To Michael he said, Go Michael, binde Semixa and the others with him that haue mixed themselves with the daughters of Men (vntill seuentie generations) to the hills of the earth; vntill the day of their iudgement, till the iudgement of the world be finished, and then they shall be brought into the confusion of fire, and vnto tryall, and vnto the prison of the ending of the world, and whosoever shall bee condemned and destroyed, from hence forth shall be cast together with them till the finishing of their generation, &c. And the Giants which were begotten of the Spirits and flesh, they shall call them euill spirits on the earth, because their dwelling is on the earth. The spirits that depart out of their bodies shall be euill spirits, because they were engendered of the Watch men and Men.

But it were tedious to recite further. The antiquity of it, and because it is not so common, and especially because some of the Ancients and of the Papiſts haue been misse-led by these dreames (refused iustly by Ierome and Augustine) interpreting the sonnes of God in Moses to be spoken of Angels (as their Translation did reade it) haue moved me to infer those tales. Notable is the diligence of the Purgatory Seauengers, who in Vines notes vpon Aug. de Ciuit. Dei. lib. 15. cap. 23. haue in their Index expurgatorius, set the scale of their Office vpon a testimonie alleged out of Eusebius de Prap. Euang. lib. 5. cap. 4. as if they had bin Vines his owne words, to be left out in the impression. The words, because the fauor of the former error, haue I heere placed, Non ergo Deos, neque bonos demones Gentiles, sed perniciosos solummodo venerantur. Quam rem magis Plutarchus confirmat, dicens fabulosas de dijs rationes res quasdam significare, à demonibus antiquissimis gestas temporibus, & ea qua de gigantibus ac de Titanibus decantantur, demonum fuisse operationes. Vnde mihi suspicio (saith Eusebius, but Vines is fined for it) nonnunquam incidit, ne ista illa sint, qua ante diluuium à gigantibus facta diuina Scriptura tetigit, de quibus dicitur: Cum autem vidissent Angeli Dei filios hominum, quia essent speciosa, elegerunt sibi ex illis uxores, ex quibus procreati sunt famosissimi gigantes à seculo. Suspiciabitur enim fortasse quispiam, illos & illorum spiritus esse qui ab hominibus postea dij putati sunt, pugnasq; illorum, tumultus & bella esse, qua fabulosè de dijs conscribentur. Lactantius saith, that when the world was multiplied, God sent Angels to keep men from the frauds of the Diuell, to whom he forbad all earthly contagion. These were by the Diuell insuared with women, therefore deprived of heauen: and their progenie of a middle nature betwixt men and Angels, became vncleane spirits; so that hence grew two kindes of Damones or diuellish spirits; the one heavenly, the other earthly, which would now seeme to bee keepers, and are destroyers of men.

The Angels are sometimes called the sonnes of Gad; but that name is communicated hicated to men, who <sup>q</sup> by nature children of wrath, by faith in the naturall and onely begotten Sonne of God, haue this prerogative to be the sonnes of God, and fellow-heires with Christ. But some of the children of the Kingdome shall be cast out, because they haue rebelled against their Father that begot them, professing themselves to be the sonnes of God, but <sup>r</sup> doe the workes of their father the Diuell: and of these Hypocrites and Apostates, it is said, that louing pleasure more then God, they married themselves in Cains familie, a prouocation so mightie to euill, that strong Sampson and wise Solomon are witnesses, that <sup>s</sup> the strong men are slaine by this weaker sexe. This was the Serpents policie at first, Balaams policie after, Babels policie now; * and Balaams wages doe moue many still to make such linsiey-woolsiey marriages, that the children <sup>t</sup> speake halfe Asdod, and whilest the father professeth one Religion, the mother another, the children become Giants, to fight against all that is called God, and to make little or no profession (at least in their liues) of any Religion at all.

I denie not that then there were Giants also in regard of bodily stature, <sup>u</sup> whom the Scripture calleth, because they were great and fearefull, Rephaim and Emim, of their pride Hanukim, of their strength Gibborim, of their tyrannie Nephilim, of their naughtinesse Zamzummim. Such were Og and Goliath after the flood. Yea such haue bene in all ages: which (to omit other Ethnike Authors) <sup>x</sup> Augustine affirmeth, that at Utica he saw a mans tooth as great as an hundred of the ordinary life. Viues on that place, saith he saw one as bigge as a mans fist. Nicephorus telleth of two men in the time of Theodosius, the one not so admirable for his height, which was five cubites and an hand, as the other for his smalenesse, like to a Patrich in bignesse, yet witty and learned. Our Histories of <sup>y</sup> Arthur, little Iohn, Curcy Earle of Vlster, and one in our times, <sup>z</sup> 1581. scene in London, doe shew some such here and there, now and then in the world, which Geropius in his Gigantomachia, affirmeth of his owne sight: and euen whole families of these monstrous men are found at this day in America, both neere to Virginia, as <sup>a</sup> Captain Smith reporteth; and especially about the Straits of Magellan, <sup>b</sup> neere which he found Giants, and in the same Straits were such seen of the <sup>c</sup> Hollanders ten foot in height, where as yet other families were but of the ordinary greatness. One Thomas Turner tolde me that neere the Riuer of Plate, he saw one twelue foote high, and others whose hinder part of their head was flat, not round. <sup>d</sup> Authors tell of Maximus the Romane Emperour, that hee was eight foote and a finger high, whose wiues bracelets might serue him for rings, that he often in one day drunk an Amphora, which is almost fixe gallons of Wine, and ate forty pounds of flesh: Cordus saith sixty; he could breake a horse legge, or strike out his teeth with a blow of his fist, &c. Which occurrents in Nature no doubt haue giuen occasion to some of further fabling. Qui de magnis maior loquuntur. <sup>e</sup> We reade in Pliny of one of forty fixe cubites, in Crete found by the force of an earth-quake, breaking the hill wherein he stood, supposed to be Orion or Orus; more credible is that he telleth of one Gabbara in Clandius time, nine foote and nine inches; and in Augustus time of another halfe a foore higher.

Howsoeuer the bodies of these men before the Flood were composed, certain their mindes were disposed to all monstrous inhumanity, which hastened their destruction. This made God so repent that he made man vpon the earth, not that there was any change or repentance in him, but because a change for want of repentance happened to them. In long sufferance hee gaue them an hundred and twenty yeares space, in which Noah might be a Preacher of Righteousnesse; yea, the Arke it selfe, which Noah that while was providing, might preach to them repentance, that their teares might haue quenched his wrath, and preuented temporall drowning and eternall burning. Adam liued till Enochs time, a witnesse and Preacher of the promise he himselfe had receiued. Enoch himselfe is made, not a verball but a reall Preacher, whiles his sonne Methuselah, and his Nephew Lamech the father of Noah liued: that God might haue witnesses to conuert some and conuince others. But whiles the world becometh worse and worse, (<sup>d</sup> Etas parentum prior auistulit Hor nequiores, mox daturos Progeniem vitiosorem) a deluge of sinne first, and a deluge of iudgement after, drowned the World.

within, and against the weather without. But if any would entertaine longer dispute about this, he may (among others that haue handled this question) resort vnto <sup>h</sup> Gorgopius Becanus his Gigantomachia, whom in this point I would rather follow, then in many other his Becceslamicall paradoxes.

Noah and his family with this their retinue being entered, the fountains of the great deepes were opened, and the windowes of heauen: the two store-houses of waters which God had separated in the Creation, being in a manner confounded againe, the Seas breaking their sandie barres, and breaking vp by secret vnderminings the priuie pores and passages in the earth: the cloudes conspiring with the waters, and renewing their first league and naturall amity, to the confusion of Nature and the World. The heauenly lightshid their faces from beholding it, and cloathed themselues with blacke, as bewayling the worlds funerall; the ayre is turned into a sea, the sea possesseth the ayrie region, the earth is now no earth, but a myrie lump, and all that huger world is contracted into a brieft Epitome, and small abridgement in the Arke, euen there but a few inches distant from death. Thus doe all Creatures detest Sin which hath made them subiect to Vanitie; thus would the Elements wash themselues cleane from it, and the committers thereof; but the Arke preuaileth over the preuailling waters, a figure of the Church, the remnant of the elder, and Seminarie of the new world.

Hieronymus applieth the fable of Prometheus to Noah, lib. 1. k De Fab. Mundi.

This drowning of the world hath not beene quite drowned in the world, but besides Moses many other writers haue mentioned it: the time thereof being referred to that which in each Nation was accounted most auncient; as among the Thebans to Ogiges; in Thessalia, to Dencalion; among the Americans (although <sup>k</sup> Mercator thinke that the Flood drowned not those partes, because they were not yet peopled, and because the beasts there are most what differing kindes from these in our world) the people haue retained the tradition hereof: Mnasenu among the Phœnicians, Berosus a Chaldean, Hieronimus Egyptius, Nicolaus of Damascus, the Poets Greeke and Latine, adding fables to the truth (which without some ground of truth they could not haue added) all mention the Flood; howsoeuer confounding the lesse and later with this first and vniuersall.

I might adde the testimonies of Eusebius, Molen, Abidenus, Alexander, Polybistor, out of Eusebius, Iosephus, and others. Lucian in his Dea Syria, telleth the opinion of the Hierapolitans but a little corrupted from Moses Narration: that Countrey wherein Noah liued, most likely retayning firmer memorie of this miracle: so plainly doth he attribute to his Dencalion the Arke, the resort and safe-guard of the Lions, Boreas, Serpents, and Beasts: the repairing of the World after the drowning thereof, which he ascribeth to periurie, cruelty, and other abominations of the former people. That Berosus which we now haue, is not so much as the ghost, or carkasse, and scarce a few bones of the carcasle of that famous Chaldean Author, mentioned by the Ancients, but the dreams of Ammius (no new thing in this last age) coined for the most part in his name. Some fragments of Berosus wee haue cited in other Authours that conuince this Bastard.

Among others, somewhat of the Flood hath escaped drowning: his testimonie whereof set downe in Polybistor and Abidenus, is in <sup>1</sup> Eusebius. He affirmeth that Saturne gaue warning to Sisuthrus of this deluge, and willed him to prepare a great vessel or ship, wherein to put conuenient food, and to saue himselfe and his kindred and acquaintance, which he builded of length five furlongs, of breadth two. After the retyring of the waters, he sent out a bird which returned: after a few dayes he sent her forth againe, which returned with her feet bemired; and being sent the third time, came no more: with other things to like purpose, which <sup>1</sup> Polybistor there, and Abidenus caryeth out of Berosus. Plutarch hath also written of this Doue, sent by Dencalion out of the Arke, which returning was a signe of tempest and flying forth of faire weather.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the re-peopling of the world: and of the diuision of Tongues and Nations.

NOW <sup>a</sup> GOD remembred NOAH, saith <sup>c</sup> Moses; not that God can forget, but that he declared his Diuine power, whereby Noah might know hee was not forgotten. Then did the <sup>b</sup> Heauens remember their wonted influence in the Elements: then did the Elements remember their naturall order: GOD made a winde to passe in Commission, and, as a common vmpire, to end their vnaturall strife, forcing the Waters into their ancient precincts aboue and beneath the Firmament. (<sup>c</sup> Ambrose <sup>c</sup> Amb. l. de No. interpreteth this Winde of the HOLIE GHOST. <sup>d</sup> Rupert. l. 4. most, of a winde, which yet naturally could not be produced from that waterie masse, but by the extraordinarie hand of God <sup>d</sup>.) Then did the Earth remember her first inheritance, being freed from the tyrannicall inuasion and vsurpation of the Waters. <sup>d</sup> Peter. in Gen. lb. 13. And what could then forget or be forgotten, when GOD remembred NOAH and all that was with him in the Arke?

And in the <sup>e</sup> seuenenth moneth, the seuenteenth day of the moneth, the Arke rested vpon the Mountaines of Ararat. This fell out in the yeate from the Creation 1656. <sup>e</sup> An. Mund. 1656. the The <sup>f</sup> Septuagint, and the Fathers that followed them, reckon farre otherwise: which error of theirs, differing from the Hebrew veritie, <sup>f</sup> Augustine ascribes to the first Copiers of that Translation: <sup>h</sup> Others to their owne set purpose, that they might contend with other Nations in the challenge of Antiquitie: for that cause, and lest the often halving of ages should trouble the faithlesse, saith Master Broughton, they saime Caiman, betwixt Arphaxad and Selah: in which account if <sup>i</sup> Luke in his Genealogie hath followed them, it is to bee ascribed to them which would correcte Luke by their corrupt translation of the Septuagint; for <sup>k</sup> some Copies of the Gospell haue wanted it. The place is commonly thought to bee Armenia. The Sibillic O-racles (if at least we may so call those eight bookes in Greeke verse, translated into Latin by Callistion) doe place <sup>l</sup> Ararat in Phrygia, and say, it is the Hill whence the Riuer Marfyas issueth. But Scaliger censurcth our Sibillic to be counterfeite, inuented with zeale to vp-hold the Truth by falshood: in which our later Legendaries haue followed them.

<sup>m</sup> Goropius after his wont paradoxicall, holdeth it to be the Hill Parapanisus, or Paropamisus, a part of the Hill Taurus (vnproperly ascribed to Caucasus, which lieth betwene the Euxine and Hircan Sea) supposed the highest part of the Earth, called now, <sup>n</sup> Naugracot. Hee imagined, that the place first inhabited after the Flood was Margiana, whence those Colonies passed that with Nimrod built Babylon. His reason is, because <sup>o</sup> they went from the East to the Plaine of Shinar, whereas Armenia beareth somewhat Westward from thence. As though that iourney had bene presently after the Flood, which was an hundred yeares after: in which space it is likely that they followed the mountainous countries Eastward along time; and from Assyria Adiabena, turned back into that fertile Plaine, where pride, fulnesse of bread, and abundance of idlenesse, set them on worke against GOD. I hold it not meet, that a few coniectures should counterpoise the generall consent of all ages. Iosephus saith, the place in Armenia was called Apobaterion, of this their going forth of the Arke: and alleageth <sup>p</sup> Berossus testimonie, that a part of this Arke was then said to remaine in the Gordyazan (or Gordyazan) Hills, the pitch whereof some scraping away, wore the same for Amulets. And out of <sup>q</sup> Nich. Damascenus lib. 96. There is (saith he) aboue the Region of the Minyæ, a great Hill in Armenia, by name Baris, wherein, they say, many saued themselves in the time of the flood, and one, brought in an Arke, there staid (the remnants of the wood thereof continuing there long time after) which happily was he that Moses the Iewish Law-giuer writ of. This mountaine or mountainous Region the Chaldean Paraphrast calleth <sup>r</sup> Kardus; <sup>s</sup> Curtius, Cordes montes; <sup>t</sup> Ptoloman;

Ptolemaus, Gordiai: the people are called Cardai, or Gordai. In this Tract (saith Epiphan.) there is one high Mountaine called Lubar, which signifieth the descending place (Lubar in the Armenian and Egyptian language signifying the same that αὐτοβάρητος before mentioned) and the word Baris before cited out of Damasceus seemeth to be corruptly written for Lubaris.

The Armenians through all ages haue (as it seemeth) reserued the memorie hereof: and euen <sup>1</sup> in our dayes there standeth an Abbey of Saint Gregories Monkes neare to this Hill, which was able to receiue <sup>m</sup> Shangh Thomas, and a great part of his Armit. These Monkes, if any list to beleue them, say that there remaineth yet some part of the Arke, kept by Angels: which, if any seeke to ascend, carrie them back as farre in the night, as they haue climbed in the day. Courtwright, an eye-witnesse, saith that this Hill is alwaies covered with snow; at the foot thereof issue a thousand Springs; there are adioyning three hundred Villages of the Armenians. He saith also that there are seene many ruinous foundations, supposed to be the workes of this first people, that a long time durst not aduenture into the lower Countries, for feare of another floud. <sup>n</sup> Abidennus saith, that the Ship or Arke was still in Armenia (in his time) and that the people vsed the wood thereof against many diseases with maruellous effect.

After that Noah had obtained his deliuerance, and was now gone out of the Arke; his first care was Religion: and therefore he <sup>p</sup> built an Altar to the Lord, and toke of euery cleane beast, and of euery cleane fowle, and offered burnt offerings vpon the Altar: And the Lord smelled a sauour of rest, and renewed the ancient blessings and promises to Noah and his posteritie. The liuing creatures were also permitted to their foode, and submitted to their rule, by whom they had in the Arke escaped drowning. Only the blood was prohibited to them, as a ceremonial obseruation to instruct them in lenitie and hatred of crueltie: the politicall Ordinance being annexed touching the blood of man, against man or beast that should shed the same. This difference being <sup>q</sup> alleaged of the life of Man and Beast, that the life of the Beast is his blood, the life of Man is in his blood. Not that the blood which we see shed is the life of the beast; for that is properly, Cruor, not Sanguis, that is, the matter, whose forme was the life or vitall spirit, which being separated from the bodie, is seuered also from the forme of life. And the life of beasts hath no other forme but that which is vnited with the blood, as the life of trees is the sappe of trees; their blood being (as it were) their soule. But <sup>r</sup> the life of man is in his blood, hauing his seat therein, liuing when it is by death separated from the blood; meane while the Spirits being the purest part of the blood, as conduits conueying life to the bodily members, and as firme bands of a middle nature, betweene the body and soule, vniting them together; which bands and carriages being broken by effusion of blood, the soule subsisteth a spirituall substance without the bodie, not subiect to substantiall corruption or mortalitie.

God did also make a couenant for man with the beasts of the field, infusing into the nature of all things, a dread and feare of man, whereby they feare the power, the snares, and sleights of man, and therefore flee or else submit themselues, not by that willing intinct, as to Adam in innocencie, but rather with a seruile feare. And although by hunger or prouocation, or feare of their owne danger, they sometimes rebell, yet otherwise there remaines some impression of this naturall decree in them, as experience in all places hath shewed. Euen the Lyon, King of Forrests and sauage creatures, doth not easily giue on-set, but on such occasions: yea the Moores meeting with this beast, doe rate and braule at him; this magnanimous beast passing by with a leering countenance, expressing a mixt passion of dread and disdain, fearing the voice of one, that feareth not the weapons of many, and which himselfe, by the terror of his voice, maketh the beasts to tremble. Hereunto the Lord addeth the Rainbow, a new Sacrament, to seale his mercifull Couenant with the earth, not to drowne the same any more; which yet at last shall be burnt with fire, so to purge the heauens and earth of that <sup>s</sup> vannie, whereto mans sinne hath subiected them. And thus much doe <sup>t</sup> some reade in the colours of <sup>u</sup> the Rainbow, of a waterish and fierie mixture, as a

continued signe of the double destruction of the world, the first outward as already past, the other inward as yet to come. Well, indeede, may this Bow be called the Child of Wonder, both for the naturall constitution and diuine ordinance: not that there was before <sup>1</sup> no such creature, but that then this vse of the creature was ordained. The reflection or refraction of the Sunne-beames in a waterie cloud, the brightness from the Sunne, and the cloud meeting together, the varietie of colours proceeding from the varietie of matter; the sunnish and dryer part of the cloude yeelding a purplish, the waterie a greenish Sea-colour, &c. borrowing the roundnesse from the Sunne halfe eclipsed by the shadow of the Earth, are accounted the naturall causes of this wonder of Nature; sometime also by reason of abundance of matter, the same being doubled, one Bow within the other, their colours placed contrarie, for that the one is the Image (by reflection) of the other. Neither is it to bee thought, that there was no Raine-bow before the flood; any more then that there was no water, bread, or wine, before the institution of our Christian Sacraments, which name and dignitie, not Nature, but Vse, by the appointment of the God of Nature and Grace, doth giue vnto them. For not in the cloudes alone is this Bow to bee seene, but as further witnesse of the naturall causes and constitution thereof, the same effect may be shewed by concurrence of like causes in the Waters and Rocks where Riues haue their falls; yea on the buildings of men: as I my selfe haue seene a perfect Raine-bow by the reflection of the Sunne-beames on a boarded wall of a Water-mill; the boordes thereof being very wet with the fall of the water, and opposite to the Sunne.

To shew directly which Nations descended of each of these three, were a hard taske: and now after this confusion of Nations by warres, leagues, and otherwise, impossible. But for the first beginnings of Nations, before that Colonies were by violence of Conquerors, or by themselves, in their exceeding multiplying, voluntarily translated from one place to another, they are by Moses faithfully related, although the confusion of Languages and of Peoples do make the matter hard and harsh to vs. Yet the names of Nations in the Greeke stories do in great part agree with the names of these first Patriarkes, as <sup>4</sup> M. Broughton hath shewed, by laying downe the names of Noahs house, which, vnswelled, may admit sundrie pronouncings, setting against them such names as Heathen Authors haue mentioned. Of Thubal the Iberians, called sometime (saith Iosephus) Tibolch. The Iberians, saith Montanus, dwelt neare to Meotis: certaine Colonies of them inhabited Spaine, and called it Hiberia, and themselves Hiberians: whence the Spaniards haue a report, that Thubal was the first peopler of their Countrey. Of Ianus children, Elisba founded the Aeoles, called also Elisei: of Tarsibis came the Cilicians, whose Mother-citie was Tarsus, Pauls birth-place. Montanus thinketh that Tharsis was Carthage in Africa, which the Poeni after possessed: some refferre the Venetians to Tharsis also. Cittim was an other part of Cilicia. The Cretans (after Montanus) were called Cherim, and of others Cortini, of whom the Italian coast called Magna Gracia was inhabited, and the Citie Caieta, builded. Of Dodanim came the Dorians and Rhodians. These peopled the North and West parts of the World in Asia and Europe.

*Cham*s posteritie was Cush, Mizraim, Put, and Canaan: These possessed the South of Asia, and Africa. Of Cham is the name Chemmis in Aegypt; and Ammon the Idoll and Oracle so notorious. Cush gave name to the Ethiopians and Arabians, knowne in Scripture by that name. Mizraim, to the Aegyptians, even at this day so called in their owne and the Arabian tongues. Put, to the Libyans, sometime called Phuthazi: the River Fut is mentioned by Plinie, not far from Atlas. To *Shem*s posteritie befell the parts of Asia from Iudæa eastward.

*Shem*s Sonnes were Elam, the Father of the Elamites, in the highor part of Persia: Assur, of whom came the Assyrians: Arphaxad; the Cadusians or the Chaldeans are (with little likenesse of sound) ascribed to him. Lud is holden Father of the Lydians; and Aram of the Syrians, called also Aramzi; others of Aram deriue Armenia.

*Aram*s sonnes were Vz, of whom the region Aufaniciis was named Chul, of whom Cholle seemeth to haue his appellation in the Pahmyrene Desarts neare to Euphrates. Getber, Iosephus ascribeth to him Bactria; others that part of Syria where Gnidar stood. Atergate and Derceto, that notorious Syrian Goddess, happily borrowed the name hence: Of Mash is the name Masius, part of the Hill Amanus. Montanus saith, of Mer, Misy and Misa, whom Iuvenal calls Mesos. — de præge Mesorum.

Ischan begat Elmodad, of whom the Hill Emodus may seeme named; of Sbalab the Selebi and Sarphi; of Hutzarmaveth, the Sarmatians; of Iaraeb, the Arachosians; of Hadoram, the Orites, people of India; of Vzal or Auxal, Auzakea a citie in Scythia,

Of Iobab, Arias Montanus coniectureth Paras in the West Indies to haue come, but with little probabilitie which I can see. And of the most before named we haue probable coniectures, not certaine proofes, as appeareth by the difference of opinions of Authors concerning them. Neither may wee thinke that Moses intended so much a Geographicall history of all the Nations of the world, many of which were not, long after this time, planted or peopled; but of the first Fathers, who peopled the places by degrees, as they increased in multitude which were neere that Armenian centre: and especially he relateth and dilateth of them, whom it most concerned the Israelites to know, as the Canaanites, whose bounds and Nations are exactly described. I could adde much touching the seuerall Nations descending of these three brethren, and the bounds of their habitations, in which Africanus sometime tooke profitable paines, and Eusebius out of him, although both be in this part lost: somewhat hath beene barbarously translated into Latine by an unknowne Author, for the solecismes, tedious; for the substance of Historie profitable to the Reader: and therefore by Scaliger in his edition of Eusebius communicated to the world. But the vncertaintie maketh me vnwilling to proceed in this argument further,

Of this vncertaintie no greater cause can be alledged, then the diuision and confusion of Tongues, the historie whereof Moses declareth. For whereas God had giuen to man two Priuiledges and principall prerogatiues, whereof other creatures are no way capable, his inward<sup>b</sup> Reason, and abilitie to vtter the same by Speech: this benefit of God in Nature was turned into a conspiracie against God and Nature. They said one to another, <sup>c</sup> Come, let vs make bricke for stone, and slime had they in stead of mortar. Also they said, let vs build vs a City and Tower, whose top may reach vnto the heauen, that we may get vs a name, lest we be scattered vpon the whole earth. This was their vaine arrogance and presumption, that when their guiltie consciences threatened a dissipation and scattering by diuine Iustice: they would thus harden and harden themselves against God and Man: in stead of thankfulnessse to God, and honouring his name, they would winne themselves a name and honour: in stead of preventing punishment by repentance, they would in this Giant-like fighting against God preuent future iudgements. But euen that, by which they intended to keepe them from scattering, was the true and first cause of their scattering. So doth God scatter the counsellors of his enemies, and taketh the wise in their craftinesse. Babel or confusion is alway the attendant of Pride. Sibylla, alledged by <sup>d</sup> Iosephus (for the Sibylls which we haue in Greeke verse, translated by Castalion into Latine, are but counterfeits, if <sup>e</sup> Scaliger iudge rightly, Pseudosibyllina oracula, qua Christiani gentibus obiciebant, quum tamen Christianorum officina prodissent, &c. but that more ancient Sibyll) testifieth of this confusion of Tongues in these words. When all men before vsed one speech, they erected a high Tower, as if they would ascend to Heauen, but the Gods by tempests ouerthrew their Tower, and gaue to each of them seuerall Languages, whereof the Citie was named Babylon: According to that of Moses, <sup>f</sup> Therefore the name of it was called Babel, because the Lord did there confound the Language of all the Earth. From thence then did the Lord scatter them vpon all the Earth. The Atheists and Naturalists dreame the world to be eternall, and conceiue that all men could not be of one; because of this diuersitie of Languages. If such had beene at Hierusalem, and heard the Apostles (not the expertest men in their owne vulgar) speake all Languages: they might then haue seene the like power in a contrarie effect to this of Babylon. Mans sinne caused this, Gods mercie that the one came from Babylon, the other from Hierusalem, that old Hierusalem giuing a taste tafte and earnest of that, which the new Ierusalem shall once fully accomplish, when all shall be made new, all shall become one, and God shall bee all in all. It appeareth that these Builders lost the vnderstanding of their owne speech, and were endued with other language, whereto their Vnderstandings and Tongues were framed, in stead of that former.

What this former Language was, hath beene doubted, either of ignorance, or of curiositie and selfe-loue. <sup>a</sup> Theodores esteemeth Syrian the first language, and that Hebrew began with Moses, taught him by God as a sacred language. <sup>b</sup> Ioseph Scaliger affirmeth that the Syrian Maronites attribute greater antiquitie to the ancient Syrian then to the Hebrew, which is all one, saith he, as if one should contend that the Italian Idiom were ancienter then the Latine. Hee concludeth that the Bible was written in the most ancient language, which at first was pure in Assyria, but by merchandize and warres corrupted. For Assyria, saith he, was first inhabited both before and after the Flood: and from thence were Colonies sent into Syria and Phoenicia, which held their language pure, by reason few strangers had recourse to them, after Moses, to the time of the first Temple, as appeareth by the coyne of the Tyrians and Sidonians, which are digged out and found daily. <sup>c</sup> Psammetichus King of Egypt, caused two children to be closely brought vp by a shepherd, who should at times put Goats to them to giue them sucke, without euer hearing humane voyce. After two yeares they vttered the word Bee Bet, which was the voice that they had heard of their nurfes the Goats, but not so interpreted by Psammetichus; for he enquiring in what language Bee was significant, and hearing that the Phrygians so called Bread, ascribed to them the prioritie of all Nations and languages, Melabdim Echebar, the great <sup>d</sup> Mogor (as the Iesuites Epistles declare) made the like triall of thirtie children, whom he caused, without hearing of man, to be brought vp, setting Guards to obserue the Nurfes that they should not speake to them: purposing to be of that Religion whereto they should addict themselves. But neither could they euer speake, <sup>e</sup> or would he euer addict himselfe to one certaine Religion. <sup>f</sup> Goropius by a few Dutch Erymologies grew into conceit, and would haue the world belecue him, that Dutch was the first language; which if it were, we English should raigne with them as a Colonie of that Dutch Citie, a streame from that fountaine, by commerce and conquests since manifoldly mixed. But his euidence is too weake, his authoritie too new.

The 8 common and more receiued opinion is, that the Hebrew was the first, confirmed also by vniuersalitie, antiquitie, and consent of the Christian Fathers and learned men, grounding themselves vpon this reason, That all the names mentioned in Scripture before the Diuision, are in that Language onely significant: besides, it is not like, that Schem conspired with these Babylonians, and therefore not partaker of their punishment. Now it is very probable and almost manifest, that he was <sup>h</sup> the same which after is called Melchisedech, King of Salem; betwixt whom and Abraham, in that familiaritie, it is not likely, that there was much dissonance in Language. He is also called the father of all the sonnes of Heber, by a peculiar proprietie, although he had other sonnes, because the puritie of Religion and Language remained in Hebers posteritie. And why should Heber call his sonne Peleg (Diuision) but of this diuision which then happened? The Nation and Language of Israel borrow their name (Hebrew) of him. And if it had happened to himselfe, why should he more then others, haue so named his sonne?

CHAP. IX.

WE have all this time beene viewing one Nation, which alone was knowne in the Earth, vntill confusion of Language caused diuision of Lands: and haue taken notice of the Heads and Authors of those Peoples and Nations, that from that time were scattered ouer the World, and after settled in their proper Habitations. We haue not followed the opinion of some, both of the Antients, and later Writers, in defining the number of Nations and Languages through the World; reckoned by them 72. For who seeth not, that Moses in that tenth of Genesis is most carefull to describe the Posteritie and bounds of Canaan, which God had giuen to Israel, which it were absurd to thinke in so small a territorie to be off so many (that is, eleuen) severall Languages? And how many Nations were founded after that by Abrahams posteritie (not to mention to many other Fountaines of Peoples) by the sonnes of Hagar, and Keturah, and Esau the sonne of Isaac? Neither could the world so suddenly be peopled: and of that, which then was peopled, Moses writing a Historie of and for the Church, so far mentioneth the Affaires and Nations of the world, as it was meet for the Church (and especially that Church of the Israelites) to know, according as it was likely they should haue then, or after, more or lesse to doe with them. <sup>a</sup> Africanus hath reckoned the 72. by name. But how easie were it in these dayes to set downe 72. more, of differing Nations, both in Region and Language; and how little of the World was then knowne, shall presently be shewed. Besides, it may be a question, whether diuers of those, there mentioned, did not speake the same Language (as in Chaldaea, Syria, and Canaan) with some diuersitie of Dialect, a little more then in our Northerne, Westerne, and Southerne English: Which may appeare, both by the pilgrimages of the Patriarkes, Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, in those parts (which had needed new interpreters, by that rule, in every two or three dayes trauell, except themselves had beene almost miraculously skilfull in Languages) and by the Chaldaean and Syrian Monumentes and Bookes, which some obserue to come nigh to the Hebrew. <sup>d</sup> D. Willer reproveth Philos opinion, That the Chalde and Hebrew was all one, because Daniel, an Hebrew, was set to learne the Chalde: or that the Syrian and Chalde, according to Marcus opinion, was the same; yet grants, that in the first times the Syrian and Chalde little differed. <sup>e</sup> Scaliger a fit man to speake of Languages, who could speake so many) saith, as before is obserued, That in Assyria was the first, both man and Language, euen the same which thence passed with their Colonies into Syria and Canaan, where it remained pure; euen then when in Assyria it selfe it was corrupted by intercourse of strangers. Abraham spake this corrupted Syrian, which tooke place onely in the traits of Euphrates, at the first: but after, both he and his posteritie vsed the Language of Canaan; so that Laban, whose kindred, countrie and language was the same with <sup>f</sup> Abrahams, yet spake another and differing language from that of Jacob, one calling that Galed, which the other calleth Iegarshaduthu. Thus it appeareth by him, that the ancient Syrian, Assyrian and Chaldaean, were first which is now called Hebrew, because the Hebrewes obserued and retained it, and onely haue left bookes to vs written therein, (whom the Cananites called Hebrewes, as <sup>g</sup> Scaliger and Montanus affirme, because Abraham had passed ouer the Riuer Euphrates vnto them) but after degenerated first in the parts neere Euphrates, where it was first spoken: and when the Tyrians and Sidonians had the Empire of the Sea, by reason of their traffique, it proued impure there also, howsoeuer in the time of Elisa or Dido, the Phænicean or Punike, which she carried into Africa, was pure Hebrew, as were also their letters. The later Carthaginian letters were read from the left hand to the right; as the Latine and Greek, but those from the right hand; yet not the same which now are called Hebrew (but ought rather to be called Iewish, as brought by them from their Babylonish captiuitie) but the Canaan or Phœnician letters, which the Samaritans still vse, and wherein Moses had innouated nothing, as some will haue him, neither in the letters, nor in the Language, but vsed them as they were long before his time. Warres and traffique could not but further alter those Languages in continuance of time: which appeared most after the Captiuitie, when the Iewes spake not Hebrew, but Syrian, and that also in likelihood more and more by time altered. Perhaps it was with these three Languages, as with the Frankes <sup>a</sup> Language, when they first seated themselves in Gallia, and that which is now called <sup>b</sup> French; or the Saxon and the present English: for there were no lesse mutations and transmutations, by times and warres, in those parts then in these. It seemeth therefore probable, that at the first diuision of Languages, they that most disagreed, did furthest separate themselves, and they that spake either the same, or neere in likeness to the same speech, obserued the same neighbourhood of Nation, as of speech; which, the names and words of the Phœnician, Syrian, Persian, Arabian, and Egyptian Languages testifie. The diuision of Tongues was about an hundred yeeres after the Flood, An. Mundi 1757. as Caluissius and Buntingus account.

Now that we haue spoken of the first Authors of the principall and first Nations, let vs suruey the Lands and Inheritance, which God gaue vnto them, which was the habitable Earth. This Earth, together with the Waters, make one Globe and huge Ball, resting on it selfe, supported by the Almighty hand of God, to the roundnesse whereof, the high mountaines in comparison of the whole, can bee small impediments, and are but <sup>c</sup> as a few motes or dust sticking to a ball. Posidonius, Eratosthenes, Hipparchus, Plinie, Ptolomey, and others, skillfull in Geographie, haue endeouored by Art to finde out the true quantitie therof: and although there appeare difference in their summes, yet that is imputed rather to the diuersity of their furlongs, which some reckoned longer then others, then to their differing opinions. But neuer had they so certaine intelligence of the quantitie of the Earth, as in our time, by the Nauigations of <sup>d</sup> Spaniards, <sup>e</sup> English, and <sup>f</sup> Dutch, round about the same, is giuen vs; Art and Experience consulting, and conspiring together, to perfect the Science of Geographie. For whereas the Ancients diuided the world into three parts, <sup>g</sup> Asia, Africa, and Europe, and yet neuer knew, the East and North parts of Asia, nor the South of Africa, nor the most Northerly parts of Europe: not onely these three are by Land and Sea farre more fully discouered, but also <sup>h</sup> three other parts, no lesse (if not much greater) then the former, are added to them; namely, America Mexicana, and America Peruviana, and Terra Australis, or the Land lying toward the South Pole. As for the seventh part, which some reckon vnder the North Pole, because we haue no relation but <sup>i</sup> from a Magician, a Frier of Oxford, called Nicholas de Linna, which might with as good conscience lie to vs, as by Art-Magicke take view of those Parts (otherwise it is not certainly knowne, whether it be ioyning to Asia, or whether it be Land or Sea) I therefore leaue it out in this diuision.

Europe is diuided <sup>k</sup> from Africke by the Mediterranean Sea; from Asia by the Egean and Euxine, Mæotis, Tanais, and a line from the fountaines thereof Northwards: on the North and West parts washed with the Ocean; which running by the straits of Gibraltar, floweth along the Coasts of Africke, to the Cape of Good Hope, and thence passeth all alongst on the East-side thereof into the Arabian Gulfe, where, by a Necke of Land, it is encountered: This Necke, the Mediterranean, and Ocean, doe limit the bounds of Africa: The rest of the old World is Asia. America Mexicana, or North, and the South called Peruviana, are seuered by the narrow straits of Dariene, in other places compassed by the Sea: The South Continent is verie little knowne, and containeth the rest of the World, not bounded in the former limits. But in their particular places wee shall heare of each of them more fully.

It cannot be without some great worke of God, thus in the old and decrepit Age

Age of the World, to let it haue more perfect knowledge of it selfe; which wee hope, and pray, may be for the further enlargement of the Kingdome of CHRIST IESVS, and propagation of his Gospell; And, as in former times, in those then discouered parts, the Iewes were scattered, some violently, some willingly, through ASIA, AFRICA, and EUROPE, to vsier the Gospell into those parts, and make way for that which the most of themselues reiect: who knoweth, whether in the secret dispensation of Diuine Providence, which is a co-worker in euery worke, able euen out of euill to bring good, the Donations of Popes, the Nauigations of Papists, the preaching of Friars and Iesuits may be fore-runners of a further and truer manifestation of the Gospell, to the new-found Nations? for euen alreadie it is one good stepe of an Atheist and Infidell to become a Profelyte, although with some soyle: and againe, the Iesuites there cannot play the Statel-men, as in these parts, yea (themselues in their Relations being witnesses) they rather take the Euangelicall courses of those, which heere they count Heretickes, and by laying open mens sinne through the fall, and diuine Iustice, onely by Christ satisfied, doe beate downe infidelitie with diligent Catechising: although vpon that golden foundation they build afterward their owne Hay and Stubble, with their racke of Confession, and rabble of Ceremonies, and (the most dangerous to new Conuersts) an exchanged Polytheisme in worshipping of Saints, Images, and the Host. But if God shall once shew mercie to Spaine, to make them truly Catholike, and, as a diuine Inquisitor, condemne that diuellish Inquisition to perpetuall exile, how great a window may by that meanes be opened vnto this new World for their conuersion and reformation? And why may not the English Expedition & Plantation in Virginia, and the Nauigations of other Protestants, helpe this way, if men respected not their owne Pride, Ambition and Couetousnesse, more then the truth and glorie of God? But he that by Fishers conuerted the old World, and turned the wisdom of the World into foolishnesse, subdued Scepters by preaching the Crosse, yea, by suffering it in himselfe and in his members: is able of those stones to raise vp children to Abraham, and that by the mouth of Babes and Sucklings, by weakest meanes, when it pleaseth him. Let vs therefore pray the Lord of the Haruest to send forth Labourers into these wide and spacious fields, ripe thereunto.

But to returne to our parts of the World, whence this meditation hath withdrawn me. The ancient Geographers were ignorant of a great part of that threefold diuision: as appeareth by their owne Writings. The vse of the Loadstone, found out by Iohn Goa of Meli, an Italian (or as Bellonius obserueth, by one Plinius, but Albertus Magnus was the first that writ of the nature of it) was a great and necessarie helpe to further Discoueries, especially after that Henrie sonne of Iohn the first, King of Portugall; began to make voyages of discouerie vpon the Coast of Africa, and Iohn the second seconded that Enterprise, and vsed the helpe of Mathematicians, Roderigo and Ioseph his Physicians, and Martin Robemus, by whom the Astrolabe was applied to the Art of Nauigation, and benefit of the Mariner, before vsed onely in Astronomie. This Iohn also sent men of purpose into Arabia, and Aethiopia, and other Countries of the East, to learne further knowledge thereof. From these beginnings, daily encreasing, hath Nauigation (first in Portugall, and by degrees in other European Nations) by the helpe of Astronomicall rules growne to her present perfection, and by it, Geographic. And if the longitude of places might as easily be found out as the latitude, which our Countreman Master Linton made promise of, we should yet grow to better knowledge in those Sciences, and of the World by them. Moreouer, as the Expedition of Alexander, and those flourishing Monarchies in Asia, brought some knowledge thereof to the Ancients: So the Histories of later times, but especially the great Trauels by Land of Marcus Paulus, Odoarius, Will. de Rubriques, Ioannes de Plano Carpini, our Countreman Mandeville, and others, before this skill of Nauigation, haue giuen much light to the knowledge of the in-land Countries of Asia, which we are first to speake of.

The Meridians, which are Circles passing over our heads, in what part of the World soever we be, and also through both the Poles; the Horizon, which divideth the upper halfe of the World which wee see, from the nether halfe which we see not: the Parallels of Latitude from the Equinoctiall towards either Pole: The Climes or Climates, which are the spaces of two Parallels: Also the rearmes of Poles, which are two, the Arctike, and the Antartike; and the Axletree of the World (a right line imagined to passe from the one to the other, through the Centre of the Earth:) the Degrees, containing 60. miles (or after Cornelius de Iudais, 68095  $\frac{1}{2}$  paces, and after other Authors otherwise, according as they have differed in opinion touching the measure of the Earth, or touching the furlongs, miles, and degrees, which they used in their computation; the varietie whereof both ancient and moderne among the Greekes, Romans, Arabians, Italians, Spaniards, and others, Master Hues our Countreiman hath studiously collected: into 90. of which degrees every fourth part of the world is divided, and amount in the whole to 360. Also the Geographall rearmes of Litus. Fretum. Insula. Sinus. Continens. Pro-montorium. Isthmus. that is, Shores, straits, Ilands, Bayes, Continent, Capes or Headlands, Neckes of Land, and such like: All these (I say) and other things of like nature, needfull to this kinde of knowledge, the studious shall finde in those Authors which teach the Principles of Astronomie and Geographie, with the use of Globes or Mappes, as Mr. Blundenile, Mr. Hues and others.

My intent is not to teach Geographie, but to bestow on the studious of Geographie, a Historie of the World, so to give him flesh vnto his bones, and vse vnto his Theorie or Speculation, whereby both that skill may be confirmed, and a further and more excellent obtained. Geographie without Historie seemeth a carkeasse without life and motion: Historie without Geographie moueth, but in moving wandreth as a vagrant, without certaine habitation. And whereas Time and Place are twinnes and vnseparable companions, in the chiefe Histories to set downe the true time of chiefe Accidents, will adde much light to both; a great taske in one Countrey: but to take vp the whole World on my shoulders, which haue not the strength either of Atlas or Hercules to beare it; and in the whole to obserue the description of Places, order of Times, and the Historie of Actions and Accidents, especially Religions (alliorum & as triplex, thrice happie he that could happily archieve it) I confesse beyond my abilitie exactly to performe; but with the wisest, I hope that the haughtines of the Attempt. In a thing so full of varietie and hardnesse, shall rather purchase pardon to my slippes, then blame for my rashnesse. And how can I but often slip, that make a perambulation ouer the World, that see with others eyes, that tell of matters past so many Ages before I had a being. Yet such is the necessitie of such a Historie, either thus, or not at all. But as neere as I can, I purpose to follow the best evidence, and to propound the Truth: my fault (where it is worst) shall be rather mendacia dicere, then mentiri, and yet the Tale-man shall be set by the Tale, the Authors name annexed to his Historie, to shield me from that imputation.

And first we must begin with ASIA, to which the first place is due, as being the place of the first Men, first Religion, first Cities, Empires, Arts: where the most things mentioned in Scripture, were done; the place where Paradise was seated; the Arke rested; the Law was giuen; and whence the Gospell proceeded: the place which did beare Him in his flesh that by his Word beareth vp all things.

Asia (after some) is so called of Asia, the daughter of Oceanus and Thetis; which was wife to Iapetus, mother of Prometheus: Others fetch this name from Asius the sonne of Manaus: both with like certaintie and credit. It is greater then Europe and Africa: yea, the Ilands thereof are larger, if they were put together, then all Europe. It is compassed with the Easterne, Indian, and Scythian, Oceans, on three parts: on the West it hath the Arabian Gulfe, that necke of Land which diuideth it from Africa, the Mediterranean, Aegean, Pontike Seas, the Lake Mæotis, Tanais, with an imagined line from thence to the Bay of S. Nicholas. Some make it yet larger, and make Nilus to diuide it from Africa, but with lesse reason. Taurus diuideth it in the middest: On the North side is that which is called Asia interior: on the South is Asia exterior. More vnequall is that diuision into Asia the greater and the lesse, this being lesse indeed, then that it should sustaine a member in that diuision. So, Barrius diuideth it into nine parts, Ortelius into fiue, Magirus into seuen, which are these: First, That part of Tartaria, betwixt Muscouia, the Northerne Ocean, the Riuer Ob, and the Lake Kytai, and a line thence drawne to the Caspian Sea, and that Isthmus which is betwixt that and the Pontike Sea: secondly, the great Cham Country, from thence to the Easterne Sea, betwixt the frozen Sea and the Caspian: thirdly, That which is subiect to the Turke, all from Sarmatia and Tartaria Southwards, betweene Tigris and the Mediterranean Sea: fourthly, The Persian Kingdome, betweene the Turke, Tartar, India, and the Red Sea: fifthly, India, within and beyond Ganges, from Indus to Cantan: sixthly, The Kingdome of China: seuenthly, The Islands. These Diuisions are not so exact as may bee wished, because of that varietie and vncertainie in those Kingdomes. Many things doth Asia yeeld, not elsewhere to be had; Myrrhe, Frankincense, Cinnamon, Cloues, Nutmegs, Mace, Pepper Muske, and other like, besides the chiefeest Jewels. It hath also minerralls of all sorts: It nourisheth Elephants, Camels, and many other Beasts, Serpents, Fowles, wilde and tame, as in the ensuing Discourse, in their due places, shall appeare; yet doth it not nourish such monstrous shapes of men, as fabulous Antiquitie fained. It brought forth that Monster of irreligion, Mahomet; whose Sect, in diuers Sects, it fostereth with long continuance of manifold Superstitions. It hath now those great Empires of the Turke, Persian, Mogore, Cathayan, Chinois: it had sometimes the Parthian, and before that, the Persian, Median, Assyrian, Scythian: and first (as it seemeth) before them all, the Babylonian Empire vnder Nimrod, which is therefore in the next place to be spoken of.

CHAP. X.

Of Babylon, the originall of Idolatrie: and the Chaldeans Antiquities before the Flood, as BEROSVS hath reported them.

Confusion caused diuision of Nations, Regions, and Religions. Of this confusion (whereof is already spoken) the Citie, and thereof this Country tooke the name. <sup>a</sup> Plinius maketh it a part of Syria, which he extendeth from hence to Cilicia. <sup>b</sup> Sirab addeth, as farre as the Pontike Sea. But it is usually reckoned an entire country of it selfe, which <sup>c</sup> Ptolemy doth thus bound. On the North it hath Mesopotamia, on the West Arabia Deserta; Susiana on the East; on the South, part of Arabia, and the Persian Gulfe. Luke maketh Babylon <sup>d</sup> a part of Mesopotamia: Ptolemy more strictly diuideth them: whereunto also agreeth the interpretation <sup>e</sup> of the Land of Shinar, that it was the lower part of Mesopotamia, containing Chaldaea and Babylon, lying vnder the Mount Sangara. In this Country was built the first Citie which we reade of after the Flood, by the vngatefull world, moued therunto (as some thinke) by Nimrod, the son of Cush, nephew of Cham. For as Cains posteritie before the Flood, were called the sonnes of Men, as more fauouring the things of men then of God: more industrious in humane inuentions, then religious deuotions; so by Noahs Curse it may appeare, and by the Nations that descended of him, that Cham was the first Author, after the Flood, of irreligion. Neither is it likely, that he which derided his old father, whom Age, Holinesse, Fatherhood, Benefits, and the greatest Function of Monarchie, Priesthood, and Prophecies, should haue taught him to reuerence: That he (I say) which at once could breake all these bonds and chaines of Nature and Hu-manitie, would be held with any bonds of Religion; or could have an eye of Faith to see him which is invisible, having put out his eyes of Reason and Civilitie. Had he feared God, had hee reverenced man, had hee made but profession of these things in some hypocriticall shew, he could not so easily have sitten down at ease in that Chaire of Scorning, whence we read not that ever he arose by repentance. From this Cham came Nimrod, & the mightie hunter before the Lord; not of innocent beasts, but of men, compelling them to his subiection, although Noah and Sem were yet aliue, with many other Patriarchs.

As for Noah, the fabling Heathen, it is like, deified him, The Berosus of fabling Annin, calleth him Father of the Gods, Heauen, Chaos, the Soule of the World.
Iannes his double face might seeme to have arisen hence, of Noahs experience of both Ages, before and after the flood. The fable of Saturnus cutting off his fathers priuities might take beginning of that act, for which Cham was cursed. Sem is supposed to be that Melchisedech King of Salem, the figure of the Lord, and the propagator of true Religion; although even in his posteritie it failed, in which Abrahams father, as witnesseth Iosbna, serued other Gods. Iaphets pietie causeth vs to perswade our selves good things of him; Cham & his posteritie we see the authors of ruine. i Philo and Metiodius (so are the two bookes called, but falsely) tell, That in these daies they began to diuine by Starres, and to sacrifice their children by Fire; which element Nimrod compelled men to worship; and that to leaue a name to posteritie, they engraued thei names in the bricke wherewith Babel was builded. Abram refusing to communicate with them (and good cause, for he was not yet borne) was cast into their Brick-kill, and came out (long after from his mothers wombe) without harme. Nahor, Lot, and other his fellowes, nine in number, saved themselves by flight. Others adde, that Aram, Abrahams brother, was done to death for refusing to worship the Fire. Qui Basilium non odit, amet tua carmina Mani.

To come to truer and more certaine reports, Moser saith, That the beginning of Nimrods Kingdome was Babel, and Erec, and Accad, and Calne, which three some interpret Edessa, Nisibis, Callinifum. And whereas commonly it is translated in the next words, Out of that land came Ashur, and built Ninive, Tremellius and Iunius read it, Out of this land he (Nimrod) went into Ashur or Assyria, and built Ninive and Re-hoboth, Calah, and Resen. But most vsually this is vnderstood of Ashur the sonne of Sem; who disclaiming Nimrods tyrannie, built Ninive, which after became the chiefe Citie of the Assyrian Empire, to which Babylon it selfe was subiect not long after. Xenophon de Equinoctis (if his authoritie be current) saith, That the eldest of the chief families were called Saturni, their fathers had to name Culum, their wiues Rhea and out of a pillar, erected by Semiramis to Ninus, alledgeth this inscription; My father was Iupiter Belus, my grandfather Saturnus Babylonicus, my great grandfather Sa-turnus Ethiops, who was sonne of Saturnus Egyptius, to whom Calus Phœnix Ogyges was father. Ogyges is interpreted Noah, therefore called Phœnix. because of his habitation (as is thought) in Phœnicia, not farre from whence, in Ierusalem, Sem rained. Saturnus Egyptius may be the natie of Cham, of whose name Egypt is in Scripture termed the land of Cham. Saturnus Ethiops is Chush, Nimrod, Babylonicus, the father of Belus, who begat Ninus. But this cannot be altogether true. For Ninive hath greater antiquitie then Nimrods nephew (howsoeuer the Greeke Histories ascribe this to Ninus, and Babylon to his wife Semiramis) except we say, that by them these two Cities formerly built, were enlarged and erected to that magnificence, which with the growth of the Assyrian Empire they after obtained.

Eusebius in the first booke of his Chronicle attributeth the originall of Idolatrie to Serug, the Father of Nahor. Bede saith, In the daies of Phaleg Temples were built, and the Princes of Nations adored for Gods. The same hath Isidore. Epiphanius re-ferreth it to Serug; and addeth. That they had not grauen Images of Wood or Met-tall, but pictures of men; and Thara the father of Abraham, was the first Author of Images. The like hath Snidas. Hugo de S. Victor saith Nimrod brought men to ido-

latter, and caused them to worship the fire, because of the fiery nature and operation of the Sunne, which error the Chaldeans afterwards followed: These times, till Abram they called Scythism. The reason of their Idolatry Eusebius alleadgeth, That they thus kept remembrance of their Warriors, Rulers, and such as had achieved noblest enterprises and worst exploits in their life time. Their posterity ignorant of that their scope (which was to observe their memorials which had bene Authors of good things, and because they were their forefathers) worshipped them as heavenly Deities, and sacrificed to them. Of their God making or Colonization, this was the manner: In their sacred bookes or Kalendars they ordained, That their names should be written after their death, and a Feast should be solemnized according to the same time, saying, That their soules were gone to the Isles of the blessed, and that they were no longer condemned or burned with fire. These things lasted to the daies of Phara; who (saith Suidas) was an Image-maker, & propounded his Images (made of diverse matter) as Gods to be worshipped: but Abram broke his fathers Images. From Saruch the Author, and this Practise, Idolatry passed to other Nations: Suidas addeth specially into Greece; for they worshipped Hellen, a Gyant of the posterity of Japheth, a partner in the building of the Tower.

P. 2. 1. 1. 1. 1.

Not unlike to this, we read the causes of Idolatry in the booke of Wisdom (supposed to be written by Philo, but because the substance is Salomons, professing and bearing his name) which of all the Apocrypha-Scripture sustaineth least exception, attaineth highest commendation; When a father mourned grievously for his sonne that was taken away suddenly, he made an Image for him that was once dead, whom now he worshippeth as a God, and ordained to his servants Ceremonies and Sacrifices. A second cause he alleadgeth, viz. the tyrannies of men, whose Images they made and honoured, that they might by all means flatter him that was absent, as though he had him present. A third reason followeth; the ambitious skill of the workeman, that through the beauty of the work the multitude being allured, took him for a God, which a little before was honored but as a man. The like affirmeth Polydore de inventis, alledding Cyprian de Idolis for his author, Lactantius (as before is shewed) maketh that the Etymologie of the word Superstitio Quia superstitum memoriam defunctorum colebant, aut quia parentibus suis superstitos celebrabant imagines eorum domi, tanquam Deos penates; either because they honored with such worship the surviving memory of their dead ancestors; or because surviving & out-living their ancestors, they celebrated their Images in their houses, as household Gods. Such authors of new rites and deifiers of dead men they called Superstitious; but those which followed the publicly-received and ancient Deities, were called Religious, according to that verse of Virgil. Vana superstitio veterumq; ignara deorum. But by this rule (saith Lactantius) we shall find all superstitious which worship false Gods, and them only religious which worship the one and true God. The same Lactantius saith, That Noah cast off his son Cham for his wickednes, and expelled him. He abode in that part of the earth which now is called Arabia, called (saith he) of his name Canaan, and his posterity Canaanites. This was the first people which was ignorant of God, because their founder and Prince received not of his father the worship of God. But first of all other the Egyptians began to behold and adore the heavenly bodies; and because they were not covered with houses for the temperature of the ayre, and that Region is not subiect to clouds, they observed the motions and eclipses of the stars, and whiles they often viewed them more curiously, fell to worship them. After that, they invented the monstrous shapes of beasts, which they worshipped. Other men scattered through the world, admiring the Elements, the Heavens, Sun, Land, Sea, without any Images & Temples worshipped them, and sacrificed to them sub dio, till in processe of time they erected Temples and Images to their most puissant Kings, and ordained vnto them sacrifices & incense: so wandering from the knowledge of the true God, they became Gentiles. Thus saith Lactantius. And it is not unlike that they performed this to their Kings, either in flatterie, or feare of their power, or because of the benefits which they received from them, this being (saith Pliny) the most ancient kinde of thankfulness, to reckon their benefactors among the Gods. To which accordeth <sup>a</sup> Cicero in the examples of Heracles, Castor, Pollux, Esculapius, Liber, Romulus. And thus the Moores deified their Kings, and the Romanes their deceased Emperours.

The first that is named to haue set vp Images, and worship to the dead, was Ninus, who when his father Belus was dead, made an Image to him, and gave priuiledge of sanctuary to all offenders that resorted to this Image: wherupon, moued with a gracelesse gratefulnesse, they performed thereunto diuine honours. And this example was practised after by others. And thus of Bel or Belus began this Imagerie, and for this cause (saith Lyra) they called their Idols Bel, Baal, Baalzebub, according to the diuersitie of languages. <sup>d</sup> Cyrollus calleth him Arbelus, and saith, That before the flood was no Idolatry amongst men, but it had beginning after in Babylon, in which, Arbelus (next after whom raigned Ninus) was worshipped. Tertullian out of the booke of Enoch, before mentioned, is of opinion, That Idolatry was before the flood. Thus to continue the memorie of mortall men, and in admiration of the immortall heauently Lights, together with the tyrannie of Princes, and policies of the Priests, began this worshipping of the creature, with the contempt of the Creator: which how they increased by the mysteries of their Philosophers, the fabling of their Poets, the ambition of Potentates, the Superstition of the vulgar, the gainfull collusion of their Priests, the cunning of Artificers, and aboue all, the malice of the Diuels, worshipped in those Idols, there giuing answers and Oracles, and receiuing sacrifices; the Histories of all Nations are ample witnesses. And this Romane Babylon now Tyrant of the West, is the heire of elder Babylon (sometimes Ladie of the East) in these deuotions, that then and still Babylon might be the mother of whoredomes and all Abominations. To which aptly agree the Paralels of Babylon and Rome in Orosius, the Empire of the one ceasing, when the other began first to haue a being; which he further prosecuteth in many particulars.

But before we prosecute these Babylonian affaires after the flood, it shall not be amisse to shew here the Chaldæan fables of Antiquities before the flood, out of Berosus a Chaldæan Priest, which liued in the time of Alexander. Polyhist <sup>b</sup> citeth out of Berosus his first booke this report of himselfe; and Tatianus <sup>i</sup> saith he was the Priest of Belus, and wrote his Chaldæan storie to Antiochus, the third after Selencus, in three bookes. His name by Scaligers interpretation signifieth the Sonne of Osce.

Alorus raigned the space of tenne Sari (Sarus with them is three thousand sixe hundred yeares) Alasparus three Sari; Amelus thirteene Sari; Amenus twelue; Motalarus eightene; Daorus tenne; Adorachus eightene; Amphis tenne; Otiartes eight; Xixushtus eightene: in his time, as is said before, the flood happened. The whole space is an hundred and twentie Sari, which amounteth to foure hundred thirtie two thousand yeares. This I thought not vnfit (although incredible) to report from Berosus, both because my scope is to declare as well false as true Religions (it being not Theologicall but Historicall, or rather Historically Theologicall) and because the Ancients, Cicero, Lactantius, Augustine, haue mentioned this monstrous Computation of the Chaldæan Kalendar, which yet they rack higher, to foure hundred threescore, and ten thousand yeares. Here you haue the particulars out of Apollodorus and Abidenus, which both borrowed them of Berosus, <sup>k</sup> Polyhist addeth, That there came one out of the red Sea, called Oannes and Annedotus a Monster (otherwhere like a fish, his head, feet and hands like a man, as saith Photius, but Al. Polyhist ascribeth two heads, one of a fish, and the other of a man) the Image whereof was vnto his times reserued. This Monster liued without meat, and taught them the knowledge of Letters and all Arts, buildings of Citties, foundations of Temples, enacting of Lawes, Geometry and Husbandry, and all necessities to mans life. Afterwards he returned to the Sea; and after him appeared other such monsters. Foure of them came out of the Sea, saith Abidenus, when Daos (whom Apollodorus calleth Daorus) raigned; their names were Eneodocus, Enengamus, Enaboulus, Anementus, Pentabiblus (it seemeth) was then their chiefe Cittie. That Oannes the first did write of the first beginning: That all was darkenesse and water, in which liued monstrous creatures, hauing two formes; men with two wings, and some with foure, with one body two heads, one of a man, and another of a woman, with the priuities of both sexes: others with hornes and legges like Goats; some with Horse feete; some like Centaures; the former part Men, the after part Horses; Bulls also headed like Men and Dogges; with foure bodies, &c. with many monstrous mixtures and confusions of creatures, whose Images were kept in the Temple of Belus; Over all these ruled a waiuain, named O-morke, which signifieth the Sea, and by like signification of Letters, the Moone. Then came Belus and curlier in waine, and made the one halfe of heauen, and the other Heauen, and the creatures therein appeared. This Belus made Men and Beasts, the Sunne, Moone, and Planets; these things reporteth Berosus in his first Booke; in the second he telleth of the Kings (before mentioned) which reigned till the flood: After the flood also the same Polyhistor out of him sheweth, That Sisithrus hauing by Saturnus warning before, built an Arke (as is before said) and hid vp all monuments of Antiquity in Sipparis; a Cittie dedicated to the Sunne, and now with all his world of creatures escaped the flood, going out of the Arke did sacrifice to the Gods, and was neuer seene more. But they heard a voyce out of the ayre, giuing them this precept; To be religious; His wife, daughter, and ship-master were partakers with him of this honour. He said vnto them, the countrey where they now were was Armenia, and hee would come againe to Babylon, and that it was ordained, that from Sipparis they should receiue Letters, and communicate the same to men: which they accordingly did. For hauing sacrificed to the Gods, they went to Babylon and digged out the Letters, writings, of bookes, and building many Citties, and founding Temples, did againe repaire Babylon. Thus farre out of Alexander Polyhistor, a large fragment of the true Berosus.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Cittie and Countrey of Babylon: their sumptuous walls, Temples, and Images.

Leauing these Antiquities, rotten with age, let vs come to take better view of this stately Cittie. Herodotus, Philostratus, Pliny, and Solinus report concerning the compasse of Babylon, That the walls contained 480. furlongs, situate in a large plaine foure square, inuironed with a broad and deepe ditch full of water. Diodor. saith, That there were but so many furlongs as are dayes in the yeare, so that euery day a furlong of the wall was built, and 300000. worke-men employed therein. Strabo ascribeth to the compasse 380. furlongs: and Strabo 38. (ninety furlongs thereof inhabited, the rest allotted to ryth and husbandry.) Concerning the thickness of the walls, or the height, they also disagree. The first Authors affirme the height two hundred cubites, the thickness fiftie. They which say least, cut off halfe that summe. Well might Aristotle esteeme it a Countrey rather then a Cittie, being of such greatnesse that some part of it was taken three dayes before the other heard of it. Lyranus out of Hierome vpon Esay, affirmeth, that the foure squates thereof contained sixteen miles a peece, wherein euery man had his Vineyard and Garden according to his degree where with to maintaine his family in time of siege. The fortresse or Tower thereof he saith was that which had been built by the sonnes of Noah. And not without cause was it reckoned among the Wonders of the world: It had a hundred brassen gates, and two hundred and fiftie Towers. It was indeede a mother of wonders: so many miracles of Art accompanied the same, the works partly of Semiramis, partly of Nabuchodonosor; which I would desire the Reader to stay his hasty pace, and take notice of. Every where I shal not, I can not, be so tedious in these kinds of relations. Diodor. thus addeth of Semiramis; she built also a bridge of 5. furlongs. The walls were made of brick & asphaltum, a slimy kind of pitch which that country yeildeth.

death. She built two Pallaces, which might serue both for ornament and defence; one in the west, which inuironed fiftie furlongs; with high brick walls: within that a lesse, and within that also a lesse circuit, which contained the Tower. These were wrought sumptuously with images of beasts, and therein also was game and hunting of beasts: this had 3. gates. The other in the East, on the other side the River, contained but 30. furlongs. In the lower countrey of Babylonia she made a great square lake, containing 200. furlongs; the walls whereof were of bricke, and that pitchy mortar; the depth 35. foote. In the middest of the Cittie she erected a Temple to Iupiter Belus (saith Herodotus) with brazen gates (now in his time remaining) fouresquare: each square containyng 2. furlongs; in the middest whereof is a solid Tower; of the height, and thickness of a furlong: vpon this another, and so one higher then another, eight in number. In the highest Tower is a Chappell, and therein a faire bed covered, and a table of golde, without any Image. Neyther, as the Chaldean Priests affirme, doth any abide here in the night, but one woman, whom this God shall appoint. They say the God himselfe there lieth. In regard of this exceeding height, Diodorus affirmes, that the Chaldeans did thereon make their obseruations of the Starres. Hee also addeth, that Semiramis placed in the top three golden statues; one of Iupiter forty foot long, weighing a thousand Babylonian talents; till his time remainyng; another of Ops, weighing as much, sitting in a golden throne, and at her feet two Lions, and iust by, huge serpents of silver, each of thirty talents: the third Image was of Venus standing, in weight 800. talents. Her right hand held the head of a serpent, her left a scepter of stone. To all these was common, 1. table of gold 40. foot long, in breadth 12. in weight 50. talents. There were also 1. standing cups of thirtie talents, and two vessels for perfume of like value: three other vessels of golde, whereof one dedicated to Iupiter, weighed 1200. Babylonian talents: (euery Babylonian talent is said to contain seven thousand drachma Attica, fixtie three pounds, nine ounces, and an halfe, and halfe a quarter Troy weight.) All these the Persian Kings tooke away.

Without the Temple, by Herodotus testimonie, was a golden Altar, and another huge one besides, for their solemne sacrifices, the other being not to be polluted with blood, except of sucking things. In that greater the Chaldeans burnt yearly in their sacrifices a hundred thousand talents of Libanorus. One statue of gold twelue cubits high. Darius, affecting spared; but Xerxes both tooke it, and slew the Priest that forbade him. I might here also tell of those Pensile gardens, borne vp on arches, foure square, each square containyng foure hundred foote: filled on the roose with earth, wherein grew great trees and other plants. The entrance was (as it were) a hill: the arches were builded one vpon another in conuenient height, still increasing as they ascended: the highest which bare the walls were fiftie cubites high, and twelue in breadth: There were within these arches, Innes. There was also a conueyance of water to the watering thereof. This Garden was made long after Semiramis time by a King, which herein seemed to lord it ouer the Elements, and countermand Nature, being himselfe the seruant of his wifes appetite, who in this lowly valley where in Babylon stood, would faine haue some representation of her owne hilly and mountainous countrey of Media.

This King was Nabuchodonosor, as witnesseth Berosus in Iosephus, who hauing conquered Egypt, Syria, Phoenicia, Arabia, enriched the Temple of Belus with the spoiles, and added a new Cittie to the olde, without the same. And prouiding that the enemy might not after turne the course of the riuier, and approach to the Cittie, he compassed the inner Cittie with three walls, & the vtter Cittie with as many, these of brick, those also with bitumen, or pitchie slime of that countrey, adding thereunto stately gates. And neere his fathers pallace he built another more sumptuous: and this hee did in fiftene dayes. Therein he raysed stone-works like vnto mountains, and planted the same with all manner of trees. He made also a pensile Garden. Many more things (saith Iosephus) doth Berosus adde, and blameth the Greeke writers for ascribing the building of Babylon to Semiramis an Assyrian. This fragment of Berosus, cited by Iosephus, doth well serue vs to cleare both the holy and prophane Historie.

In the one, Daniel<sup>a</sup> induceth Nabuchodonosor walking in his royall pallace in Babel, <sup>a Dan. 4. 27.</sup> with words answerable to his pride, Is not this great Babel that I have builded for the house of the kingdome, by the might of my power, and for the honour of my maiestie? His words (euen in the speaking) were written in the Booke of God, and an endirement thereof framed in the highest Court; where hee was adiudged presently the losse of Reason, which he had thus abused, Till he knew that the most High bare rule over the kingdome of men, giuing the same to whomsoever he will. Well might he say he had built it, in regard of this new City and pallace, with other miracles thereof: with more truth the some Expositors, which accuse him herein of a lie, for arrogating that which Semiramis did. His wife also, for whose loue he did this, was (as <sup>b Scaliger</sup> thinketh) <sup>b Scal. note in frag. Beros.</sup> Nitocris, mentioned by Herodotus; who also coniectureth that she was the daughter of Altiates, that Daniel intendeth her, Dan. 5. 10. that she administred the kingdome in the time of her husbands madnesse, and in the times also of Enlilmerodach and Balsasar: a woman no whit inferiour to Semiramis; that it may bee said, Semiramis began Babylon, and Nitocris finished and perfected it, finishing and perfecting those workes which Nabuchodonosor her husband before the time of his madnesse had begunne.

And for Semiramis, profane histories<sup>c</sup> generallie make her the founder of this City, and among others <sup>d</sup> Annius his Berosus, who (contrarie to this fragment of the true Berosus in Ios. phus) saith, that Semiramis made Babylon of a towne, a great City, that she might be rather esteemed the builder thereof, then enlarger. Nimrod had before built the Tower, but not finished it, and did not <sup>e</sup> found the citie; which hee had designed and set out, and Belus his sonne had <sup>f</sup> erected those designed foundations rather of the towne then the city Babylon. Moses testifieth that at the first building, they were (by confusion of language) forced to cease their worke, leauing a name of their shame, in stead of that renoune & name, which they had promised to themselues. It may be that Semiramis did amplifie this; and happilie so did other Assirian & Babylonian kings, as Augustine & Abydenus affirme. Hanc quidam putant condidisse Babylonem quam quidem potuit instaurare. Likewise Abydenus saith, that the wals being by inundation fallen, were built againe by Nabucodonosor, and agreeeth in other things with Berosus. But the Grecians are children, in comparison of ancient Historie, and little of this matter can we affirme on their testimonie; their first Historian Herodotus liuing long after this age in the time of the Persian monarchie. Howsoever; Nabucodonosor is he which (by diuine and humane testimonie) there established that golden head of the Image, the seat of the Babylonian monarchie raising it to that high top of worldlie excellence. Yea Daniel speaketh of one more sumptuous Image, then any mentioned by Herodotus & Diodorus set vp by this king threescore & cubits high, and six broad, enioyning a Catholike and vniuersall idolatry thereunto, which the three Saints Shadrach, Mesach, and Abednego refused and in a sixe triall, were found both Martyrs and Confessors. <sup>h</sup> Lyranus, Hugo Cardinalis, Pererius, Pintus, Pellicanus, thinke that Nabucodonosor set vp this Image for himselfe, requiring diuine honour to be giuen vnto it, as Caligula since amongst the Romans: but by his exposition, Will ye not serue my God? and the like answer of those three men; We will not serue thy Gods, it seemeth to haue been consecrated to Bel or some other Babylonian deitie. Which because it was erected in the plaine of Dura (this is thought to be Dera in Susiana mentioned by Ptolomey) <sup>i</sup> Daniel might haue good occasion of absence from thence, whose office was to <sup>k</sup> sit in the gate of the king, at Babylon.

<sup>k</sup> Strabo out of Megasthenes (whom Annius hath set out as truly as he hath done Berosus, saue that he sturred at the name, and called him Megasthenes) saith of this King whom he nameth Nabucodonosor, more esteemed of the Chaldeans then Hercules, that he came in his expeditions as farre as the Pillars of Hercules (the straights of Gibraltar) and as farre as Tearcon the Aethiopian, and that he conducted an armie out of Iberia into Thracia, and Pontus. This Tearcon is he-whome the Scripture calleth Tirhaka, which warred against Sennacherib.

And no lesse wonderfull was that Obeliske, or Needle: a square stone made spire-fashion, cut by Semiramis out of the mountaines of Armenia, one hundred and fiftie foot long, and four and twentie thick, on many Waines brought to the River; thence to Babylon, and there erected. Plinie testifieth, that the Temple of Belus still remained in his daies: and that Belus was in-ventor of Astronomic.

o Ar. lib. 7.

This Temple was the same with the Sepulchre of Belus, which Strabo saith, was rased by Xerxes: yet not so; but that Alexander would haue repaired it; but in regard that it asked so much labour and time (for only the cleansing of the earth required ten thousand men two moneths worke) hee was not able to finish that which he had begunne. In the description he saith lesse then Herodotus, that it was a Pyramis, or spire-worke, a furlong or sixe hundred foot in height, and each of the foure squares containing as much. Arrianus <sup>n</sup> affirmeth that Alexander had the same purpose of other Temples also. The Temples, saith he, which Xerxes had ouerthrowne, he commanded to be repaired, and among them the Temple of Belus, whom the Babylonians with singular Religion worship. <sup>o</sup> At his returne homewards, Belus in thankfulness (it seemeth) sent his Chaldean Priests to meet him, and forbid him to enter the Citie, as he loued his life, whose Oracle Alexander contemning, there ended his dayes. The cause why he listened not to them, is thought a mistrust that hee conceiued of the Chaldeans. For whereas Xerxes, at his returne out of Greece, had rased this and all other sacred places of the Babylonians: Alexander minding the repaire hereof, hauing already remoued the rubbish, thought with his whole Armie to archiue this enterprize. But the reuenue which the Kings of Assyria had left for the maintenance of this Temple-sacrifices, after the ouerthrow thereof, was shared among the Chaldeans; which they by this attempt were like to loose, and therefore were willing to want his presence.

so by Sir Ant.
Sherley in his
Perfia.

This Temple some supposed to be that Tower of Babel, mentioned by Moses, Gen. 11. and supposed still in part to remaine. For about seuen or eight miles from Bag-dar, as men passe from Felugia a Towne on Euphrates, whereon old Babylon stood, to this new Citie on Tigris (a worke of eighteen houres, and about fortie miles space) there is scene a ruinous shape of a shapelesse heape and building, in circuit lesse then a mile (some say, but a quarter of a mile) about the height of the stone-worke of Pauls steeple in London: the bricks being sixe inches thicke, eight broad, and a foot long (as master Allen measured) with Mats of Canes laied betwixt them; yet remaining as sound, as if they had beene laied within a yeaeres space. Thus master Eldred, and mas-ter Fitch; master Cartwright also, and my friend master Allen, by testimonie of their owne eyes, haue reported. But I can scarce thinke it to be that Tower or Temple, because Authors place it in the midst of old Babylon, and neare Euphrates. Whereas this is nearer Tigris: Isidore affirmeth, that first after the flood Nimrod the Giant founded Babylon, which Semiramis the Assyrian Queene enlarged, and made the wall with Brick and Bitumen. The height of the Tower was five thousand one hundred seuentie foure paces. <sup>p</sup> Vershegan addeth, the passage to mount vp was very wide and great, winding about on the outside: the middle and inward part for the more strength being all massie: and by Cart, Camels, Dromedaries, Hories, and Asles, the carriages were borne and drawne vp: and by the way were many Lodgings and Ho-telries both for man and beast: yea fields also for graine and pasture; if yee can beleeue it. But it is now, as we see, come to confusion. Also there is yet beyond Tigris some ruines of a Temple, which is called the Temple of Bel, with high yron gates, as is reported.

Dominicus Nager <sup>q</sup> hath these words: Seleucia in proesse of time hath changed her state and her site. For it was on the westerne banke of Tigris, which a Cut from Euphrates flowed into; in which place are now scene the ruines thereof, where the shepherds shepherds haue erected their cottages, and on the Easterne banke haue the Barbarians built the Citie and called it Bāchdad, right ouer against the old. If this be true, vaine is the conceit of credulous Trauellers, which suppose those ruines to bee the monuments of Babylons buriall, and confound againe this later world, with the reports of Babels Tower.

The Bitumen or slime pitch which they vsed in stead of Morter in their building, is, as Plinius Niger our of Trogus reporteth, common in those parts. Herodotus telleth, that eight dayes journey from Babylon was another Citie, named Is, with a small rill of the same name, which runneth into Euphrates, carrying thither (as tribute) much of this slime matter. Niger mentioneth one place, where out of a cleft or opening of the earth, proceedeth such a stinke, that it killith the Birds which flie ouer it. And at this day, two doles journey from Bagdat: as a place called Ait, is a mouth continually throwing forth boiling pitch, therefore by the Moores called Hell-mouth, which runneth into a great field alwayes full thereof: and herewith they pitch their boats. The water, as my friend master Allen (who liued in Bagdat diuers Moneths) told me, is warme and accounted medicinable, for which cause he hath drunke largely thereof: the liquid pitch floateth on the top of the water, like clowded cream, to vie his owne phrase.

The Countrey of Babylonia hath bene the most fruitfull in the world, yeelding ordinarily two hundred, and in some places three hundred increase: the blades of the Wheat and Barly about foure fingers broad: Phmie, somewhat otherwise: They cut (saith he) or mow their corne twice, and seeede it a third time in Babylonia, otherwise it would bee nothing but blade: and yet so their barren land yeeldeth fiftie, their best an hundred increase. Tigris and Euphrates ouer-flow it, but bring not fatnesse to the soile, as Nilus in Egypt, but rather cleanse that superfluous fatnesse which naturally it hath.

The soile is of a rosenne clay, saith master Allen, and would still retaine in likelihood his ancient fertilitie, if it were watered with like diligent husbandrie: In digging it yeeldeth corrupt waters, fauouring of that pitchie slime. In the Citie anciently, it seemeth that in every Garden of any Citizen of sort, were rills made out of the Riuer. The ruines from the Towers aforesaid to Bagdat (which some call Babylon) and beyond on the other side of the Riuer, containe twentie two miles, yet to be seen: which happily are the ruines, not of old Babylon, so much, as of the Neighbor townes here built, Seleucia, Vologescherta, and Ctesiphon: which I rather thinke, because they reach beyond Tigris as well as on this side.

To returne to the religious places in Babylon: Calius Rhodiginus tells, that in the Temple of Apollo, was found a golden Chest of great antiquitie, which being broken by some accident, thence issued a pestilent vapour, that infected not those alone which were present, but the neighbouring Nations, as farre as Parthia. Ammianus Marcellinus hath the like Historie of the Image of Apollo Chameus at Seleucia, which was brought to Rome, and there placed by the Priests in the Temple of Apollo Palatinus: and when as a certaine hole which the Chaldean Wife-men had by Art stopped, through the couetousnesse of certaine Souldiers breaking in thither for spoile, was broken vp, the world was thence poisoned with a contagion from Persia, as farre as France. Philostatus reporteth (but who will beleue his reports?) of Apollonius, that he saw at Babylon such stately Palaces, as scarce agree with the state of Babylon in the time of Apollonius, which was while Domician reigned: amongst other things he saw Galleries full of Greeke Images, as of Orpheus, Andromeda, &c. He came also into a Gallerie, the rooffe whereof was made bowing like the heauens, and covered with Saphire, so to resemble Heauen, and the Images of their Gods, made of gold, were there set. From the rooffe there hanged four birds of gold, representing the Goddesse of Reuenge, which they called the tongues of the Gods, I know not by what arte or myserie, admonishing the King not to exalt himselfe.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Priests, Sacrifices, religious Rites, and customes of the Babylonians.

The Chaldeans (saith <sup>a</sup> Diodorus) were of reputation in Babylon, as the Priests in Egypt; Chaldaen, being a name sometime applied to the whole Nation; sometime appropriated to the Priests, who spent their whole time in religious Services, and in Astrologie. Many of them by Divination foretold things to come, as we haue shewed before in the Historie of Alexander; and the booke of Daniel witnesseth this their profession. By their auguries, or divination by birds, by sacrifices and enchantments, they were accounted to doe good or harme to mankinde. They were most expert in their sacred Rites, in the knowledge whereof they were brought vp from their child-hood; and continued in that course of learning all their liues, the child being instructed in his Fathers science. They professed the interpretation of dreames, and prodigious accidents in Nature. Their opinions were, That the world is eternall, without beginning and end: the order and furniture of all was done by diuine providence: all heauenly things were perfected, not by chance, or of their owne accord, but by the determinate and firme decree of the Gods. By long obseruation searching the course and nature of the starres, they foretold things to come. But the greatest Power they attributed to the siue Planets, and especially to Saturne. They call them Mercuries, because when others are fixed, these haue their proper motion, and shew future things, as the Interpreters of the Gods, by their rising, setting, and colour. Vnder their course they giue the title of Gods <sup>b</sup> to thirtie other Starres, the one halfe; aboue; the other, vnder the earth, beholding all accidents. And in ten dayes one of the higher is sent to the lower, as an Angell, or Messenger of the Starres, and one from them to the higher: And this course they take eternally.

They hold twelue principall Gods, each of which hath his peculiar moneth, and his signe in the Zodiacke; by which the Sunne, and Moone, and siue Planets, haue their motion. These Planets they esteeme to conferre much good or euill in the generation of men, and by their nature and aspect, things to come may be foreknowne. Many things they foretold to Alexander, Nicanor, Antigonus, Seleucus, and to priuate men, beyond the reach of men. They number foure and twentie constellations without the Zodiacke, twelue towards the North, and as many towards the South. These Northernly are scene, which they attribute to the liuing: those Southernly are hidden, and present (they thinke) to the dead, which they hold the Iudges of all. Concerning the site, motion, and eclipse of the Moone, they hold as the Greekes; but of the Sunnes Eclipse they haue diuers opinions, and dare not vtter their opinion thereof, nor foretell the time. The earth they conceiued to bee hollow like a boat.

R. Moses Ben Maimon out of a booke entituled de Agricultura Egyptiorum, attributeth like things vnto them: that they beleued the Starres were Gods, and that the Sunne was the chiefe God, and next to him the Moone: that the Sunne ruleth the superiour and inferiour world. And concerning Abraham, that he was borne in a land which worshipped the fire, which when he reprov'd, and his Countreymen objected the operations of the Sunne, he answered that the Sun was as the Axe in the hand of the Carpenter. But at last the King cast Abraham into prison, and when as there hee still continued the same disputes and opinions, the King fearing hurt to his people, banished him into the vtmost bounds of Chanaan, hauing first spoiled him of all his goods. This contradicteth the Historie of Moses, and of the old and new Testament, which commend Abrahams faith in voluntarie forsaking of his Countrie at the command of God, and not by compulsion of man, although it reacheth not to the former * absurditie, which ascribeth this to the time of Nimrod. And whether Abraham was an Idolater before that his calling, is handled <sup>a</sup> elsewhere. But to returne to our

Rabbine (highly * admired by a most admired Author) he saith, that hence Abraham grew renowned through the World, all Nations honoring his memorie; except some Heathens, as the Parthians on the left hand, and Indians on the right, which were remainders of the Chaldeans, and called Zubij. These Zubij, Scaliger also saith were Chaldeans, so called à ventro Apeliote, as one might say Easter-men: and addeth, that the Booke so often cited by Rambam, concerning their Religion, Rites, and Customes, is yet extant in the hands of the Arabian Muhamedans. Out of this booke our Rabbi reciteth their opinions: that Adam was borne of man and woman as other men; and that hee was a Prophet of the Moone, and by preaching perswaded men to worship the Moone, and that he composed bookes of husbandrie: that Noe also was a husband-man, and beleueed not in Idols. For which the Zubij put him in prison, and because hee worshipped the Creator. Seth also contradicted Adam in his Lunarie worship. They tell also that Adam went out<sup>b</sup> of the Land of promise, which is towards India & entred into Babylon, whither he caried with him a tree still growing with branches & leaues, and a tree of stones, and leaues of a tree which would not burne, vnder the shadow of which tree hee said 10000. men might bee covered, the height whereof was as the stature of a man. Adam also had affirmed in his booke of a tree in India, the boughes whereof being cast on the ground would stir like Serpents; and of another which had a root shaped like a man, endued with a kinde of sounding voice differing from speech; and of a certaine hearbe which being folded vp in a mans clothes would make him walke invisible, & the smoke of the same, being fired, would cause thunders: another tree they worshipped which abode in Ninive 12. yeares, and contended with the Mandrake for vsurping her room; whereby it came to passe that the Priest or Prophet, which had vsed to prophetic with the spirit of that tree, ceased a long time from prophesying; and at last the tree spake to him and bad him write the sute betwene her and the Mandrake, whether of them were the more honourable. These fooleries, saith he, they attributed to Adam, that so they might proue the eternitie of the world, and Deitie of the Stars. These Zubij made them for this cause Images of gold to the Sunne, of silver to the Moone, and built them Temples, saying, that the power of the Planets was infused into those Images, whence they spake vnto men and taught things profitable. The same they affirmed of those trees which they appropriated to each of them with peculiar worships, rites, and hallowings, whereby that tree receiued a power to speake with men in their sleeps. From hence sprang magicall diuinations, auguries, necromancie, and the like. They offered to their chiefe God a Beetle, and seuen Mice, and seuen Fowles.

The greatest of their bookes is that of the Egyptian seruice, translated into Arabike by a Moore called Enemmaxia, which containeth in it many ridiculous things; and yet these were the famous wise-men of Babylon in those daies. In the said booke is reported of a certaine Idolatrous Prophet named Tamut, who preaching to a certaine King this worship of the seuen Planets, and twelue Signes, was by him done to a grievous death. And in the night of his death, all the Images from the ends of world came and assembled together at the great golden Image in the Temple at Babylon, which was sacred to the Sunne, and hanged betwene the heauen and the earth, which then prostrated it selfe in the midst of the Temple, with all the Images round about, shewing to them, all which had befallen Tamut. All the Images therefore wept all night, and in the morning fled away each to his owne Temple. And hence grew that custome yearly in the beginning of the moneth Tamut, to renew that mourning for Tamut. Other bookes of theirs are mentioned by him, one called Deixamechameche, a booke of Images, a booke of Candles, of the degrees of Heauen, and others falsely ascribed to Aristotle, and one to Alformor, and one to Isaac, and one of their Feasts, Offerings, Prayers, and other things pertaining to their Law, and some written against their opinions, all done into Arabike. In these are set downe the rites of their Temples and Images of stone or metall, and applying of Spirits to the same, and their Sacrifices, and kindes of meats. They name their holy places sumptuously built, the Temples of Intelligible formes; and set Images on high mountaines, and honour trees, and attribute the increase of men and fruits to the Starres. Their Priests preached that the earth could not be tilled, according to the will of the Gods, except they serued the Sunne and Starres, which being offended, would diminish their fruits, and make their countries desolate. They have written also in the former bookes, that the Planet Iupiter is angrie with the Deserts and drie places, whence it cometh that they want water and trees, and that Devils haunt them. They honored husband-men, as fulfilling the will of the starres, in tilling the ground: they honoured Kine and Oxen for their labours therein, saying that they ought not to bee slaine. In their festiuals they vsed songs, and all muscicall instruments, affirming that their Idols were pleased with these things, promising to the doers long life, health, plentie of fruits, raines, trees, freedome from losses, and the like. Hence it is saith R. Moses, that the Law of Moses forbiddeth these rites, and threatneth the contrarie plagues to such as shall obserue them. They had certaine hallowed beasts in their Temples wherein their Images were, before which they bowed themselves and burned incense. These opinions of the Zabij, were holden also by the Aramites, Chanaanites, and Egyptians.

 See Cap. 18.

They had their magicall obseruations in gathering certaine hearbs, or in the vse of certaine mettals, or liuing creatures, and that in a set certaine time, with their set rites, as of leaping, clapping the hands, hopping, crying, laughing, &c. in the most of which women were actors; as when they would haue raine, ten Virgins clothed in hallowed garments of red colour, danced a procession, turning about their faces and shoulders, and stretching their fingers towards the Sunne: and to preuent harme by haile, foure women lay on their backs naked, lifting vp their feet speaking certaine wordes. And all magicall practises they made to depend of the starres, saying, that such a starre was pleased with such an incense, such a plant, such a mettall, such wordes or workes, and therby would be as it were hired to such or such effects, as to driue away Serpents and Scorpions, to slay wormes in guts, to make the leaues fall, and the like. Their Priests vsed shauings of the head and beard, and linsiey wolsey garments, and made a signe in their hand with some kinde of mettals. The booke of Centur prescribeth a woman to stand armed before the starre of Mars, and a man clothed in womens attire painted, before the starre of Venus to prouoke lust. The worshippers of the fire made men beleue that they which would not cause their children to passe through the fire, should loose them, and easily perswaded them thereunto as a thing easie, saith the Rabine, for they did not burne them (although herein both diuine and humane testimonies make mee beleue the contrarie.) From hence, saith hee, descended the customes, obserued by women, in holding and mouing their children ouer the fire or smoke.

Averse Venus.

They had their diuersities of Processions; and when they hallowed a tree to an Image, one part of the fruit thereof was offered, and the other eaten in the house of the Idoll: the like they did with the first fruits of every tree; making men beleue that otherwise the tree would become vnprofitable. They had their magicall enchantments in the planting or grafing of trees, with obseruations of the starres, incenses, words: but this most Diabolicall, that in the houre when one kinde was to be engrafted into another, the science which was to be engrafted should be holden in the hand of some beautifull woman, and that some man should then carnally, but vnnaturally, haue knowledge of her, the woman in that instant putting the science into the tree. They vsed also to make circles when they planted or sowed, and went about the same, some five times, because of the five Planets, some seuen in regard of the Sunne and Moone added to that number. For this cause the Jew not vnprobably thinketh that mixtures in garments, feedes, and the like, were forbidden by the Law of Moses, with other rites any way resembling these.

They further worshipped Devils, beleeuing that they appeared to men in the formes of Goats, and therefore called their Devils kids, and held it vnlawfull to sheare or to eate their kids: but especially they abhorred the killing of Kine, but performed much worship to them, as they also doe in India to this day. They sacrificed Lyons, Beares, and wilde beasts, as is mentioned in the booke Zenzir. They held bloud bloud in much abomination, accounting it a great pollution, & yet did eat it, because (they said) it was the food of Devils, and they which did eate it should have communion with them: and that they would come to fish and reveale vnto them things to come. Some whose nicer stomachs could not endure to eate it, receiued the same, when they killed a beast, * in a Vessell or in a ditch; and did eate the flesh of that Sacrifice, being placed about that bloud, thinking that the Devils did eate the bloud, and that thus by this as it were eating at the same table, was intainted berwixt them and the Devils mutuall familiaritie and societie. They believed also that in their sleepes the Devils came and revealed secrets vnto them. Concerning a monstrous woman their custome was, that shee should sit alone in a house, and that the places where she sether feet should be burned; whosoever talked with her was vnclane, yea if hee but stood in the winde of her, the winde from her did pollute him. Likewise these Zabians thought, whatsoever went from their bodies was vnclane, as nailes, haire, bloud, and therefore Barberers and Surgeons were holden polluted: and after cutting off their haire vsed much washing for expiation. But it needeth some expiation that I insist so long in these narrations, and haue neede of some Barber or Surgeon to ease me of superfluities, if that can be superfluous which fitteth so to our proiect, and in the iudgement of the learnedst of the Jewish Rabbines in many ages, seemed the cause of so many prohibitions in Moses his Law, least they should conform themselves in religious obseruances to these superstitious Zabians. But let vs now returne to Diodorus, who affirmeth that the Chaldeans numbered 43000. yeares, vntill the coming of Alexander, since first they had begunne their obseruations of the Starres. These yeares Xenophon de aequinoctio interpreteth of months: for so (saith he) the Chaldeans reckoned their antiquities; in other things they kept their computation according to the Sunne. But of their fabulous antiquities wee haue heard before: where wee haue also touched, that one beginning of Idolatrie did arise of this curious and superstitious Starr-gazing, especially in the Countreys of Egypt, where not at all vnsually; and in Chaldaea, where diuers moneths, & together they haue neither raines nor cloudes.

Strabo diuideth the Chaldeans into sects; Orcheni, Borsippeni, and others, diuersly opinioners of the same things. Borsippa was a Citie sacred to Dianna and Apollo, Plinius b addeth the Hippareni. Daniel c reckoneth vp foure kinde of Wise-men among the Chaldeans: the first are called Chartummim, which were Enchanters; Ashuphim, Aitrologers; Mecashpim, Sorcerers or Iuglers; deluders of sense; and Chasdim, Chaldeans, which, howsoeuer it were a generall name of that Nation, yet was it appropriated vnto a certaine sect and profession of learning among them which seemed to excell the rest, and were their Priests, Philosophers, and Mathematicians; as you haue heard. In the seuen and twentieth verse of the same chapter are mentioned also Cachitim, Wisards, which by coniectures and casting of lots did ghesse of things to come; and Gazim, of the word gazar, to cut; these opened, and diuined by, the entrails of sacrifices. The vanitie of their diuinations appeareth in that Prophet, howsoeuer they haue beene renowned therefore among the Heathens: as in the foretelling of Alexander's death, and before that, when Darius had changed his Scaberd into the Greeke fashion, the ruine of that Empire by the Greekes. When Faustina * the Emperesse, wife to M. Antoninus, had fallen in love with a fencer or sword-plaier, and being sick confessed the same to her husband; the Chaldeans were sent for, who gaue counsell to kill the Fencer, and that shee should wash her selfe in his bloud, and then accompanie with her husband: which was done and Commodus begotten; who in qualities resembled that Fencer vpon this occasion (as the people reported) though others esteemed him a Bastard. Plutarch c sheweth how vainely the Romans depended on their predictions. Thus Inuolant reprooueth them:

Many Edicts were after made against them. Otho Heurnius & laboureth to bring the Grecian Philosophie from the Chaldeans: yea Aristotle himselfe, as hee had receiued the Persian and Indian Philosophie by tradition of Pythagoras and Democritus, and the Egyptian and Iewish learning from Plato, so was hee instructed (saith hee) in the Babylonian sciences by Callisthenes. But Calvis Rhodiginus <sup>h</sup> and Iosephus Scaliger <sup>i</sup> thinke them rather corrupters of learning, whereof they had no solide knowledge, and that the Greekes attained therunto by their owne industrie, without borrowing of the Chaldeans. Pencer deemeth <sup>k</sup> them too Philosophicall, the peruerterers of Religion into Theoricall speculations of Nature, and confuteth their five kindes of prognosticating. But their estimation could not haue been such in Daniels time, if they had not bene very learned: and somewhat was added, as we may well coniecture, to their learning by him, who by Nabuchodonosor was <sup>l</sup> set ouer them. For besides the gifts wherewith he was enriched, and the ciuill authoritie wherewith he was dignified, hee was exalted also to this Ecclesiasticall iurisdiction ouer the Schooles of the Wise-men, (as after Iunius and Osiander, D. Willet hath obserued) as it were their Superintendent: which though Caluin thinketh hee refused, yet it appeareth by the title which the King after <sup>m</sup> gaue him, that he accepted it. In which his Superintendentship, saith our Author <sup>n</sup>, such laudable sciences as might safely be learned, he promoted and furthered; such corruption and superstitions as were practised among them he corrected and reformed: but such abuses as could not bee taken away hee forbore, and kept himselfe free from them. And here haue we a testimonie of their Hierarchie, which Nature taught these and all people, contrarie to the Noueltie of Paritie. In the dayes of Hezekiah, when the Sunne went backwards, <sup>o</sup> is appeareth how studious the Chaldean Nation was, in that <sup>p</sup> their Princes sent their Embassadors into Iudea to enquire thereof. Yes the Delphian Oracle, as Theodoret citeth it out of P. Porphyrio, ascribeth the finding out of that learning which leadeth to the Gods, not to the Greekes, but to the Egyptians, Phœnicians, Chaldeans, and Hebrewes; in which the Chaldeans (as that Father out of Daniel obserueth) were furthered by the Hebrewes.

Some <sup>q</sup> doe call the Babylonian Priests, Magi; but because they were by this name best knowne, and most esteemed among the Persians, which in that vicinitie of Regions had as neare Neighbourhood in Religions, wee will speake of these Magi, in our Persian Relations. And it is thought that the Persian Magi came from these Chaldeans. Mornani <sup>r</sup> reckoneth among the Chaldean opinions, that of Oromasei, Mitriæ, and Arimini, that is to say, G o d, Minde, and Soule: which he applyeth to the Christian doctrine of the holy Trinity. The Oracle of Apollo, pronounced the Chaldeans and Hebrewes to be only wise.

The Chaldean opinion concerning iudiciall Astrologie, was not receiued of all the Chaldeans, as Strabo reporteth. And Bardanes Syrus, the best learned of the Chaldeans (it is Eusebius <sup>s</sup> testimonie) doth at large confute that opinion (which yet many Wisards, carcases of Christians, still follow.) He affirmeth that in those things which a man hath common with a beast, eating, sleepe, nourishment, age, &c. a man is ordered by Nature, as the beasts are. But Man hauing also a reasonable soule, and freedom of will, is not subiect to that naturall seruitude; which at large he proueth by the diuers customes of men, both in diuers, & in the same countries, in diet, gouernment, and Religion: as the Reader, willing to reade so worthe a discourse, may find related at large in Euseb. Alexander Polyhist. <sup>t</sup> out of Eupolemus, telleth that in the 101. generation after the flood, in Camyrine a citie of Babylonia, which other call Vr, Abram was borne, which excelled all in knowledge, & was the inuentor of Astrologie among the Chaldeans. He by diuine precept went into Phœnicia, and taught the Phœnicians the course of the Sun & Moone: and when the Armenians, warning vpon the Phœnicians, had had taken his brothers sonne prisoner, he by a band of his seruants recovered him, and freely dismissed the captiues, which he had taken. He after liued with the Priests at Heliopolis in Egypt, and taught them Astrologic; confessing that he had receiued that Art by succession from Enoch. He added that Belus reigned the second in Babylon, and was called Saturne; the father of a second Belus, and Canaan; which Canaan was the father of the Phœnicians, and the Ethiopians, brother of Mizraim the Author of the Egyptians: with many other things not much differing from the Diuine Historie.

Astronomy in all likelihood was knowne to Abraham, to whom the heavenly stars might be Remembrancers of that promise, so shall thy seed be: his country also, where it was practised, might therein further him, and the excellency of the Science in it self. But this Star-gazing destiny, Iudiciall, Coniecturall, Genethliacall Astrologic, Reason and Experience, God and Man haue condemned. Ur signifieth light, which agreeth to the Fire, the Chaldean deitie, which the Persians and Chaldeans fained to haue receiued from heaven, and kept euer burning; as the Vestals in Rome. They held Water and Fire to be the beginning of all things. They made a chalenge of this their ferie God, to contend with any other gods of the godlesse Heathen: an Egyptian encountered and ouercame them: thus he caused his Canopus to be made full of holes, stopped with wax, and hollow in the middle, which he filled with water: and the Chaldeans putting their fire vnder, the wax melting, opened a quier of watrie arrowes, that cooled the heat of their deuouring god, and deuoured him. They had yet a more foolish God, euen an Onyon, which they worshipped. They obserued diuers wicked Sciences of diuining, by Fire, Aire, Water, Earth, consulting with the dead, and with wicked spirits, — Chaldaea vocatis Imperat arte dijs, saith Claudian.

Euery day the King offered a Horse, furnished, vnto the Sunne; as did also the Persians. Philoftratus, saith, that it was a white Horse of the Nisæan race, sumptuously trapped, lib. 1. cap. 20. They obserued, a feast in Babylon (Athenæus citeth it out of Berosus) on the sixteenth Calends of September, which continued fise daies; in which the Masters were subiect to their seruants, and one of them, royally attired, was caried out of the house, whom they called Zoganes, Baruch cap. 6, in the Epistle of Jeremie (Apocrypha) rippeth vp their idolatrous Rites, Idols, Processions, bearing Idols on mens shoulders, the people before and behind worshipping: their Priests collusions to make gaires of the Idol-offerings, together with their Priests shauen heads and beards, their rent cloaths, their roaring before the Idol: their Temples wherein they stood with scepters, axes, or other weapons in their hands, hauing candles lighted before them, with other such rites; that, in the reading, one would thinke he were telling the discourse of the mysteries of mysticall Babylon in the West; so euently they accord. The Chaldeans invoke their Belus, to do miracles also: saith he, invoking a dumbe Idol to giue speech vnto another, which himselfe wanteth. But about all, one beastly rite was in vse among them. The women, saith he, fit in the waies girded with 5 cords of rushes, and burne straw: and if one of them be drawne away, and lie with any such as come by, she casteth her neighbour in the teeth, because shee was not so worthily reputed, nor her cord broken. Thus was their glorie their shame. Herodotus will yeeld vs a Commentary on this place. The Babylonians haue an abominable law (saith he) that all their women once in their life do sit at the Temple of Venus to haue familiaritie with strangers: the richer sort comming in chariots, richly furnished, and attended to this vngodly purpose. Their manner of sitting is, crowned on their Temples with garlands, their retiring places distinguished with cords, by which the stranger may haue access to which of them he liketh best. And thus do these Votaries of Venus sit, holding it religion to be irreligious, none of them euer returning home, till some guest haue cast money into her lap, whom it is not lawfull for her to refuse: but to accept of him and his price, whatsoeuer he be, and follow him aside from the Temple, where he defileth her. At the giuing of the mony he vseth these words, Tanti tibi deam Mylistam imploro, that is, at this price, or for so much, I implore vnto thee the Goddesse Mylistra (so the Assyrians call Venus) and this mony is consecrated to a sacred vse. After this, with the Goddesse good leaue, she may re-

Among their many Idols, a Bel bare the bell, not here alone, but in all the countries of Assyria and adioyning thereto, as appeareth in the Historie of the Bible: where Bel or Baal is so often mentioned, as the Idoll of so many Nations, & the sin of the apostat. icall Synagogue. They b built vnto him high places: or else in stead thereof vsed the roofes of their houses to his worship: they built him houses, they made him Images, erected Altars, planted Groves, bended to him the knee, and kissed him in token of subiection, vsed perfume and incense, obserued to him holy dayes, cut and lanced themselves in his seruice, with other extaticall furies, and religious frencies, with ornaments of gold and jewels, inuocations and immolations, yea of their owne children: he had also his peculiar prophets and Priests. These and such like doth the Scripture mention of this Babylonian Idoll, whose contagion infected the East with a Catholike Idolatrie that could plead Antiquitie, Vniuersalitie, and Consent, by euidence of Scripture-historie (which later Babylon cannot doe) and yet was but Catholike and generall errour. Bel was, saith Plinie c, Inuentor sideralis scientia, the inuenter of Astrologie, which (Henr-nius addeth) he defiled with impure Magicke, as did his daughter Semiramis, who warted vpon Zoroaster, in enuie of his greater learning: Bels magicke appeared in his sepulchre, which Xerxes opening, found a vessell of glasse, and therein a carkasse swimming in oyle, which reached not to the brim by a hand-breadth. In a little pillar iust by was engrauen, that he should dearely repent it, which opening the sepulchre did not fill vp the vessell: this Xerxes assayed to doo in vaine, and therefore departed vearle heauie, finding in his Grecian Expedition the truth of Bels prophecie. The like is said to happen, when Darius in hope of treasure d opened the sepulchre of Semiramis, he found a chift, which being opened, a venemous pestilence issued, that consumed the third part of men.

Ribera affirmeth, e that diuers later Authors, and before them f Theodoret, doe esteeme the name Bel or Baal to be a generall name, agreeing to all the gods of the Gentiles, according to the signification of the word, to wit, a Lord. g It was a name generall to their Idols, when it was put alone, but particullar with some addition, as Bel-zebub, Baal-zephon. There were so many Baals in Syria, saith h Drusius, as there were Regions, and almost as many as Cities. The Moabites had their Chamos, the Ammonites Moloch, the Sydonians Astarte, in Gaza Marnan, in Hamath Asima, &c. And Seruius i is Author, that Belus the father of Dido descended of that ancient Belus the first King of the Assyrians, which people worshipped Saturne & Iuno, which were after worshipped in Africa, whereupon the Punikes called God, Bal, (from whence came those names Hannibal, Adherbal, and such like) whom the Assyrians in some respect call Bel, and Saturne, and the Sunne. This opinion that in Bel they worshipped the Sunne, is followed by Tremellius and Iunius in their notes on Esaias, Chap. 46. 1. because the Assyrians, Persians, and Babylonians, accounted the Sunne the greatest God, and worshipped the Fire as a partice thereof: To him the Iewes, with this borrowed forren Idolatrie, dedicated Horses and Chariots, which k Iosias abolished, together with the Altars on the roofof Abai his house, and the high places, where their God might see their deuotions. Hierome, on that place of Esay, saith, that Bel was Saturne, which Suidas confirmeth. Augustine l relateth the vsuall opinion (on those words, Iud. 2. They serued Baal and Altaroth) that Baal in those parts was the name of Iupiter, and Astarte of Iuno, and produceth the Punike language, in which Baalsamus signifieth the Lord of Heauen; and for Astartis (which he readeth Astartibus) he saith it is in the plurall number, in regard of the multitude of Idol-images, each bearing the name of Iuno. This also is exemplified in the blessed Virgin by Ribera, sometime called our Lady of Loretto, sometime our Ladie of Monreferato, &c. according to the diuersitie of places, wherein they worship, not Mary the Virgin, but their owne Idols; the daughters of their whorish mother Babylon.

For

For the Tyrians, Sydonians, Phillistims, and other Syrian, and Assyrian Nations, the Scripture brandeth them with this Bel or Baal-Idolatry: in hatred of which name; the fewes called the Prince of Devils, as the Acaronites did their principall Idols, by the name of Beelzebub.

Thus the Greekes and Latines haue confounded the Assyrian and Tyrian Bel, which by Iosephus <sup>m</sup> Scaliger, (who not unworthily is called <sup>n</sup> the Dictator of knowledge, and great Prince of learnings state) are distinguished and made two: the one (saith he) is written בל and the later בל and reprovethe Hierome for making Belus, the father of Ninus, and the Virgilian Belus to be one. But in his notes on the fragments of Berosus, and other ancient Authors, he saith, the Tyrians and Sydonians called him בל which the Greekes made Belus: and so Mr. Selden also is of opinion, that these names בל and בל differ onely according to the propriety of the language; and not indeed, for the Grammarians obserue that the Chaldee words often lose that middle letter: Elias in his Thesbi obserueth, that Baal signifieth the act of generation, which may well agree with those beastly Baal-rites before mentioned, Baal is read in the feminine Gender. Tob. 1. 5. Rom. 1. 4. In Phorim <sup>o</sup> is mentioned, that the Phœnicians and Syrians called Saturne חל, and בל, E L, and Bel, and Bolathes. Lilium Giraldu <sup>p</sup> out of Servius. affirmeth that חל, in the Assyrian language signifieth the Sunne, from whence the Greeke ἥλιος is deriued: some attribute this to the Phœnician tongue, in which Hal signifieth God. The Assyrians named Saturne and the Sunne Hel. The Indians called that Hercules, which Tully de Nat. Deor. numbred the first, Belus. But we find no end of these Labyrinths. D. Willet in his Comment vpon q Daniel, hath these words: The Chaldeans had fise Idols, three Gods and two Goddesses. Their first God was Bel, a name contracted of Bebel, which cometh of Babal, which signifieth a Lord: to whom was built that Temple before mentioned. The second was the Sunne; which they called Rach, that is, a King; because hee is chiefe among the Planets: and the Persians call him Mithra, as Iustinus Martyr saith, Dialog. in Tripson. The Priests of this Idoll were called Raciophanta, Observers of the Sunne. Their third God was Nego, the Fire; so called of the brightness; this was carried about among them: the Priests were called Ortophanta. Their first Goddess was Shacha, which was the Earth, worshipped also of the Romans vnder the name of Telus and Opis: of the Syrians called Doreetha. In the honour of this Goddess, they vied to keepe a feast fise dayes together in Babylon; during which time, the Masters were vnder the dominion of their seruants: one of which was vsually set ouer the rest, and royally cloathed, and was called Sogan, that is, great Prince (our Lords of Mistrule seeme to deriue their pedigree from hence.) This festiuall time was called Shache, whereof Babylon was called Sheshach, of keeping this Feast, Ierem. 25. 27. and 51. 41. Their other Goddess was Mulitta, which was Venus, whose Priests were called Natita, or Natophanta. But the chiefeft of their Idols was Bel.

Hee also interpreteth <sup>r</sup> those words. Dan. 1. 4. whom they might teach the learning and tongue of the Chaldeans, of Schooles wherein youth was brought vp in good letters, to bee after employed in the State. So among the Egyptians they had the like vse; where Moses was taught the learning of the Egyptians. Among the Israelites eight and fortie Cities were appointed for the Leuites, which were as the common Schooles and Vniuersities for the whole Kingdome. Samuel and Elizans had their Schooles and Colledges of Prophets: yea the rude Indians had their Gymnosophistes; and the Romans had their Colledges of Angures.

In the senetieenth chapter of the second booke of Kings is mentioned Sucoth Benoth an Idoll of the Babylonians. Beda interpreteth it the Tabernacles of Benoth, and so the word Sucoth used, Amos 5. 25. is by Saint Stephen, Act. 7. 43. interpreted. And so doth the <sup>r</sup> Glosse on that place of the Kings interpret; where Lyra, <sup>r</sup> according to the signification of the words (a Tabernacle of wings) relateth out of Rab. Sal. that this Idoll was made like to a Hen brooding her chickens: which Idols the Babylonians framed in worship of that Constellation, called by the vulgar, the Hen and chickens, and of the learned, Pluades; as others did to the Sunne, others to the Moone. Some<sup>a</sup> apply it to the mystrie of their Idoll, (which Christ the Truth, truly faith of himselfe) protecting his worshippers, as a Hen her chickens. My learned friend Master Selden gathered by the signification of Succoth benoth (the Tabernacles of the daughters) that thereby is meant the Temple of Venus, where the daughters of the Babylonians sate, as before is said, to performe their filthie deuotions. It seemeth the idolatrous Priests carried the Tabernacle of their Idoll on their shoulder, in apish imitation of the true Priests and Levites: for so Amos saith, <sup>b</sup> Tee carried Succoth, or Sicchuth your King, Chiun your Images, which Drusius <sup>c</sup> interpreteth Maloch and Hercules.

In the fourteenth chapter of Daniel, as the Latines reade, is a large historie both of Bel, a dead statue, and of a liuing Dragon which the Babylonians worshipped. The Priests of Bel were seuentie, besides their wiues and children, whose fraud, and couisenage Daniel detected, making it manifest by their foot-steps in the ashes, which he had strewed in the Temple, that they were the deuourers of that huge portion of fortie sheepe, twelue measures of meale, and six great pots of wine, daily consecrated for Bels break-fast. He after slew the Dragon also; for which the Babylonians forced the King to lodge him six daies among the Lions. But howsoeuer generally more authoritie is to be ascribed to the Apocryphall bookes, then to any humane Historie, or other Ecclesiasticall Authors, as Zanchinus <sup>d</sup> religiously holdeth, yet for this fragment of Daniel, it is accounted <sup>e</sup> the worke of Theodotian a badman, who foisted it into his translation. And not onely the Reformed Churches account it as it is, but Driedo, a learned Papist, Erasmus a Semi-christian (so Bellarmine calleth him) Iulius Africanus of old, and the Iewes generally, reiect it out of the Canon, as the Cardinal himselfe <sup>f</sup> hath obserued: and he is faine to tell vs of another Daniel of the Tribe of Leui, to maintaine the credit hereof. But Hierome in the Preface of his Commentaries stileth them, Belis Draconisq; fabulae, quas veru anteposito, eog; ingulante, subiicit, ne videretur apud imperitos magnam partem voluminum detruncasse: and alleageth Eusebius, Orogen, Apollinaris, and other Ecclesiasticall Doctors, which were of his minde, and though they needed not to answer Porphyrie, who had hence raked some obiections against the Christians, for these things which had not authoritie of Scripture.

As for Pyramus and Thysbe, with Cyparissus and such like, I leaue them to Ouid, and the Poets. It seemeth worthie relation that fell out at Assus, a Babylonian Citie, where a Dolphin so loved a boy, that following too farre after their wonted sportings, he stucke fast in the sands: <sup>h</sup> which Alexander interpreting to be ominous, preferred the Boy to the Priesthood of Neptune.

For the present Saracenicall Religion, now obserued in these parts, our third booke shall largely relate thereof. Concerning other Babylonian customes: Herodotus, l. 1. telleth of three families in Babylon which liued on fish. It may be the Carthusians of our Westerne Babylon are of their of-spring: for whose sparing, their fellowes may eat the more flesh, with which those of old, and these later, may not (forsooth) pollute themselves. <sup>i</sup> Curtius telleth generally, that, for fleshly vices, the Babylonians were most corrupt. They prostituted their wiues and daughters to their guests for rewards. They were addicted to excessive banquetting, and drunkenness. In the beginning of their feastes, their women were modestly attired; by degrees they stripped themselves of their cloathes, beginning with the vpper-most, till nothing was left to couer their shame, or forbid their shamelesseesse. And not their Curtizans alone, but their Matrons, (yea, in token of ciuilitie) did thus prostitute themselves to those flames of lusts which haue come from hell, and carrie thither. Hence was, Alexander many and victorious armie made effeminate, vnfit after to haue encountered with a strong enimie: <sup>k</sup> Some ascribe the loose liues of the Babylonians, to a law of Xerxes, who to chastise them for a rebellion, enacted that they should no longer weare armes, but addiect themselves to Musicke, riot, and such like.

CHAP. XIII.

The Chaldaean, and Assyrian Chronicle, or Computation of Times, with their manifold alterations of Religions and Government, in those parts untill our time.

WE have before shewed the prodigious Chronologie of the Chaldeans, reckoning the reignes of their Kings before the flood, 432000. years. They tell also after the flood of diuers Dynasties or governments in this countrey of Babylon.

First, the Chaldeans, Eurchoos reigned 6. yeares, Chamusbo 7. Poros 35. Nechubet 43. Abios 48. Onibalos 40. Zinzaros 45.

He being dispossessed by the Arabians, Mardosentas began the second Arabian Dynastie, and reigned 45. yeares, and after him Sifmardisb 28. Abias 37. Parannos 40. Nabonnabos 25. The space of these two Dynasties is reckoned 440. yeares. Thus Scaliger relateth: but in my minde, as the former was beyond all possibilitie of truth (which they tell of before the flood) so this hath no great likelihood, at least for so long a space before Babyl, with whom the most histories beginne their relations, and Scaliger his third Dynastie, of one and fortie Kings in this order.

The summe of this Dynastie, 1484. yeares.

The fourth Dynastie was of the Medes, begun by Arbaces, who deprived Sardanapalus; he reigned 28. yeares, his sonne Mandaucos 50. Sosarmus 30. Articus 50. (In the 19. yeare of this King Nabonassar, the Babylonian rebelled, and began a new Dynastie in Babylon. And in the 43. yeare of his reigne, Salmannassar captiued the ten Tribes) Arbaces or Cardiceas 22. Arasos or Deucos 40. Articus called also Pharates 22. Aschabarus or Cyanaxares 40. Apandus alias Astages 40. In all 322. yeares.

The fifth Dynastie was of the Persians, begun by Cyrus, which ouerthrew Astages, and reigned 30. yeares: His sonne Cambyses 8. the Magi 7. moneths. Darius sonne of Hystaspes 36. yeares; Xerxes 20. Artabanus 7. moneths. Artaxerxes Longimanus 40. Xerxes 2. moneths. Sogdianus 7. moneths. Darius Nohus 19. yeares. Artaxerxes Manuan 40. yeares. Artaxerxes Oebus 26. Arsecas Darius 6. in all 231. yeares.

The sixth Dynastie was of the Macedonians, the first of which was Alexander, who after the conquest of Darius reigned 6. yeares; Antigonus 12. Seleucus Nicator 32. Anti-

These I haue heere inserted out of Scaliger, rather to shew the continued succession of the Easterne Empire, then with any intent to perswade, that all these were Kings, and ruled the countrey of Babylonia. For after Arsaces rebelled, the Parthians dispossessed the Syrian Kings of these parts: and before, the Babylonians often rebelled; as in the time of the Persians, when Zopyrus by a strange stratagem, recited by Justin and others, restored them to Darius: but especially in the times of the Medes, whose Dynastie was much disquieted: sometime the Scythians (saith Orosius) and sometimes the Chaldeans, and sometimes the Medes preuailing. Sometimes also (as the Scripture witnesseth) the Assyrians renewed their ancient power. Yea in the time of the Assyrian Dynastie, the Chaldeans are said to warre (in the reigne of Panyas) against the Phznicians, which argueth that they were then free.

The Scripture and other Histories speake of Phul, Teglath-Phalasar, Iarsh, Sargon, Salman-asar, Senacherib, Asur-baddon: which were great and mightie, not onely strong enough to defend themselves against the Medes, but to inuade forren Nations, yea did translate people from one Kingdome to another, and seated the captiues of Israel in the Cities of the Medes, and sent Babylonian Colonies to Samaria; which they could not doe, if they had not commanded both Assyria, and Media, with Babylonia.

Nabonassar rebelled, as is said, against Artaxerxes, and began the Chaldean Dynastie, from whom, for this restitution of libertie, the Chaldeans began their Astronomicall computations: he reigned 14. yeares, Nassus 2. Chinzernus and Porus 5. Dilans 5. Mardokempadus 12. He sent Ambassadors to Hezekia, Arxanus 9. Interregnum 12. Bolitus 3. Aporonadicus 6. Horighalus 2. Nesnoemondacus 4. Interregnum 17. Iearadin 13. Sasfducinus 9. Kiniladachus 14. Nabopollosarus 29. (In the seuenteenth yeare of his reigne, hee sent his sonne Nabuchodonosor into Syria with an Armie.) Nabuchodonosor 30. Enilmorodach 6. Neregasolarus 5. Nabonidus 17. This was a Mede by linage (not as some say, King of the Medes) sonne of Xerxes a Mede, but borne at Babylon, and by conspiracie raised to the Kingdome: not inuading Babylon with Cyrus, but reigning in Babylon, till Cyrus deposed him. Megasthenes calls him a Mede, and the Scripture Darius Adadus, Cyrus came against him in the nineteenth yeare of his reigne, and eleuen yeares before the seuenth of the Captiuitie were ended; in which space Cyrus had enough to doe to besiege and conquer Babylon, and Borsippa where Darius was. From the beginning of Nabonassar to the end of Cyrus are 217. yeares. From thence to the Asiaticke Empire of the Macedonians 201. From thence to the rebellion of Arsaces the Parthian, of whom the Parthian Kings were called Arsacids, 79. And the Dynastie of the Parthians continued 479. yeares: the last of them Artabanus, being slaine. These Kings, and the times of their reignes are not easie to set downe, and Omnibius is therefore reprov'd of Scaliger, for vndertaking this taske, in which authority faileth him. Of them we shall speake in due place.

The second Persian Dynastie continued till the Mahumetans deposed them. The first Artaxerxes reigned 12. yeares, Saporus 31. Ormisdas 1. Waramanus 3. Waramanus 2. 17. Waramanus 3. foure Moneths. Narses 7. Ormisdas 7. Saborus was borne King, and reigned 70. yeares, Artaxerxes 41. Saborus 3. Waramanus 4. 11. Indigides 21. Waramanus 5. 10. Isfignides 2. 27. Peroces 24. Obalus 4. Cabades 11. Zimastres 4. Cabades againe 30. Cosroes Adagrus 48. Ormisdas 8. Cosroes 39. Siroes 1. Adeser 7. moneths. Barasas 6. moneths. Baram 7. moneths. Ormisdas 12. degrid 3. in all 402.

The Saracens succeeded, whose names and times you may see in our Saracenicall

call relation. After the Saracens, reigned the Tartars; and since, sometime one family, sometime another, among the Persians, till Solyman dispossessed the Sophian of the Babylonian dominion, vnder which Turkish seruitude it groined, till our dayes, in which the present Persian hath recouered it, if we may credite some reports, by others<sup>k</sup> denied.

I dare not take vpon me to be vmpire and decider of those many altercations among Chronologers: but haue simply followed Sealiger, whose very name is able to shield me from contempt, if not to yeeld me commendation. Let others, that haue more lust and leasure, trauesse these matters at their pleasure: my intent is, most of all, the History of Religions; and the successions and alterations of States I haue lightly touched: but precisely to determine in what yeare of the world every King began his reigne and to dispute the same with all opponents, would be somewhat tedious to the Reader: to me (perhaps in these varieties of opinions, impossible. Leauing therefore the more studious to the Chronologers, let vs take a little reuiue of some principal occurrences in the former Catalogue.

Africanus begins the Assyrian Monarchie at Belus, and not, as the most, with Ninus: That Belus some thinke to be the same with Nimrod, whom Ninus, as wee said before, consecrated. Semiramis is reported to be the first that caused Eunuchs to be made. Ninus which succeeded, left not like monuments of his great exploits, as his Predecessors before him. Buntingus thinks him to be that Amraphel King of Shinar, mentioned Genes. 14. and that Arioch King of Elasser was his sonne. However, it breeds much difficulty, to reconcile the ancient Historie of the Babylonian and Assyrian great and long continued Empire, with the kingdomes and Kings in that Chapter by Moses mentioned. Eupolemus, as before is cited out of Eusebius, saith that those Kings were Armenians; Diodorus Tarsensis, as Peterius affirmeth, reckons them Persians, Iosephus Assyrians: Peterius himselfe thinks them vassals, and tributaries to the Assyrian: Genebrard suspects the History of the Assyrian greatnesse: and truly, not altogether vniustly, neyther do we reade of any in all the Historie of Moses and Ioshua, concerning the Kings in those parts, for ought can be gathered, yeelding subiection to Babylon. And the Sodomite and his neighbours had beene the tributaries of Cbedarlaqmer King of Elam, and not of Amraphel King of Shinar; vnklesse we say that violent things are not permanent, and the yoake imposed before by the Assyrians, was now in Ninus dayes reiected: Semiramis being weakened with her Indian expedition, and Ninus by killing her, giuing occasion of discontent to her followers, the men of warre, which might heereupon (contemning this effeminate King, who had suffered his mother to possesse the Scepter so long) fall to sharing for themselves, and erect pettie Kingdomes. Arius (happily) restored the Empyre thus decayed, if it be true that Buntingus writeth, that he was a great warrior, therefore called Arius and Mars, and, as the God of warre, inuocated by the Assyrians. When Tentamos reigned, <sup>m</sup> Diodor lib. 3. testifieth that Priamus, then besieged by Agamem- <sup>m</sup> Diodor. Sic. lib. 3. cap. 7.
non, as vassall and tributarie to the Assyrians, sent to him for ayde, who sent to his succour Memnon, with twenty thousand souldiers.

But to descend vnto times neerer both vs and the truth, and to view the ruine of that great estate: we reade in the same Author, and in <sup>n</sup> others, that Arbaces (whom <sup>n</sup> Iustin lib. 1. Orofius lib. 2. s. 3.
Iustin calleth Arbatus; Orofius Arbastus) was by Sardanapalus made Captaine of the Armie which was yearely sent to Niua, or Niniue, where a conspiracie was contracted betweene him and Belus a Chaldean Priest, Captaine of the Babylonians, who by his Chaldean skill in diuination, had foretold Arbaces this destined Empire, and was promised for his share the Babylonian principality. Thus the Medes, Babylonians, and Arabians, enterprising rebellion, assembled to the number of foure hundred thousand, whom Sardanapalus ouerthrew in battell twice; but being still animated by <sup>o</sup> Belus predictions, which (said hee) the Gods by the Starres fore-signified: and by corrupting of the Bactrian Armie, sent to succour the King, and adioyning themselves to the enemy, they at the third battell ouerthrew the forces of Sardanapalus, ledde by Salamennus his wiues brother. The King fled into into Ninive, trusting to a prophetic; That the Citie should neuer be taken till the River were enemy to it. After two yeares siege, by extreame raines, the River swelling overflowed part of the Citie, and cast downe twentie furlongs of the walls. Whereupon despayring (as seeming to see God and man against him) he, which before had chambered himselfe with women, and accustomed himselfe to the Distaffe, in a womans both heart and habite; now in a manly resolution (if it may not more fitly be called a Feminine Dissolution, which thus runneth from that danger which it should encounter) gathered his treasures together, and erecting a frame in his Pallace, there burnt them, himselfe, his wives and Eunuchs together. The Ashes, vnder pretence of a Vow thereof, made to Belus, Belus obtained of Arbaces the new Conquerour and Monarch, to carry to Babylon. But the couenage being knowne, and Belus condemned for the treasures, which with the ashes he had conueyed, Arbaces both gave them, and forgave them; adding the praefecture of the Babylonians; according to promise. <sup>a</sup> Some say that Belus, whom they call Phul Beloch, shared the Emperie with him, Arbaces reigning ouer the Medes and Persians, the other ouer Ninive and Babylonia: following herein the forged Mesasthenes, who (as Annius maketh him to say) out of the Sufian Librarie penned his Historie, hauing before fabled a Catalogue out of Berosus of the ancient Kings, contrary to that which out of the fragments of the true Arosus before is deliuered.

Sardanapallus is written (saith Scaliger in his Notes vpon Eusebius) with a double ll. Sardanapallus, a name fitting to his effeminate life. sa and pa signifie the same, whence are those words of Cicero 3. De Repub. Sardanapallus ille vitij multo quam nomine ipso deformior. Sardanapallus built Tarsus and Anchiale (saith Eusebius) at the same time: the one famous for the most famous Diuine that euer the Sunne saw (except the Sunne of Righteousnesse himselfe) Paul the Apostle and Doctor of the Gentiles: The other for the Authors Monument and stony Image, with this Assyrian Epigramme; Sardanapallus, the sonne of Anacyndaraxis, built Anchiale and Tarsus in one day; and thou O stranger, eate, drinke, play. And Verses were annexed, which I haue thus Englished:

Mortall, thou knowst thy selfe: then please thine appetite
With present dainties: Death can yeeld thee no delight.
Loe, I am now but dust: whilome a Prince of might.
What I did eate I haue; and what my greedy minde Consum'd: how much (alas) how sweet lest I beinde?
Learn this (O man) thus line: best wisdoms thou canst finde.

This his Legacie hee hath bequeathed to all Epicures, the living Sepulchres of themselves, breathing graues (not of so many Creatures onely better than themselves, which they deuoure, but) of Reason, Nature, Religion, Soule, and (if it were possible) of God, which all lie buried in these swine, covered with the skins of Men.

The Babylonian Empire renewed by Nabonassar, continued till Cyrus, of which times we haue little record but in the Scripture; as neyther of those Assyrian Kings, which before had captiued Israel, and invaded Iuda. Senacherib is famous, euen in the Ethnikal history, although they had not the full truth. For thus Herodotus telleth, That Senacherib King of the Arabians and Assyrians warred on Egypt, where Serbus (before Pulchus Priest) then reigned: who being forsaken of his souldiers, betooke him to his deuotion, amidst the which hee fell asleepe. And the god appearing, promised ayde, which he performed, sending an Armie of Mice into the Armie of Senacherib, which did eate his souldiers quivers, and the leathers of their shields, and arrows, in so much, that the very next day they all fled. In witness whereof, the Image nidge of the King, made of Stone, standeth in the Temple of Unkum, holding a Mouse in his hand, uttering these wordes: He that taketh me, let him be religious. This Historie the Egyptians, in vanitie and ambition, had thus perverted and arrogated to themselves.

Funcius and Osiander make Nabopolassar and Nabuchodonosor to be one and the same, and diuers Commenters vpon Daniel hold the same opinion; whom Scaliger and Catullus confute at large. Nabopolassar is supposed to begin his raigne Anno Mundi 3335, which hee continued nine and twentie yeares: in his seuenteenth yeare Nebuchadnezzar (so the Masorites misse-call him, saith Scaliger) or Nabuchodonosor his sonne was sent by him, to subdue the rebellious Egyptians, Iewes, and Palestina: at which time hee carried away Daniel into captiuitie. He began his raigne Anno Mundi 3354, and in the yeare 3360, destroyed Ierusalem. In the yeare 3386, Balsaradach his sonne succeeded him, whom Nerigissorus (as Scaliger affirms) slew, thereby to aduance his owne sonne the Nephew of Nabuchodonosor, called Laborsoarchadus, to the Scepter; which himselfe swaied as Protector in the minority of his sonne. But he being dead, and his sonne more fit for a chamber then a Throne, Nabonidus conspired against him, and slew him. This Benidus, saith he, is Darius Medus, and Laborsoarchadus is that Balsasar mentioned by Daniel, after Scaliger's interpretation of the Prophet out of Berosus and Megasthenes.

It is a world to see how the Catholikes (so they call themselves) sweat in finding out that Nabuchodonosor mentioned in Isaiah 13. Petrus would make it a common name to the Babylonian Kings, as Pharao to the Egyptians: Petrus will haue two of the names; others will haue him to be Cyrus; others, Cambyses, Artaxerxes, Ochus. Once, Babel is a Mother of confusion to her children, and makes them babble, while they will Canonize Apotrypha-Scriptures.

Cyrus ended the Babylonian Monarchie, and hauing wonne Babylon, and taken Darius Medus at Borsippa, he gaue him his life, and the gouernement of Carmania. Anno Mundi 3409. As Nabuchodonosor had by Edict proclaimed the God of Daniel, so Cyrus ended the captiuitie of his people; giuing libertie to such, as would, to returne. But many Iewes abode there still, and thence sent their yearely offerings to the Temple. In the time of Artabanus the Parthian (when Caligula tyrannized at Rome) Simon and Ananias, brethren of the Iewish Nation, grew mightie, and haughtie withall, forgetting God and themselves; which caused the Babylonians to conspire against them, and (after the death of the brethron, with thousands of their partakers) they slew in Seleucia fiftie thousand of the Iewish Nation. Neerda and Nisibis were then much peopled by the Iewes. And thus Religion partly held the ancient course, partly was mixed (according to the custome of Conquests) with the Persian, Macedonian, Parthian, besides the Iewish and Syrian, vntill the Apostles preached here the Christian veritie.

About the same time, Helena and her sonne Izator King of Adiabena (which is in these parts of Assyria) became Iewish Proselytes. Seleucia built by Seleucus (as it were the marriage-Chamber of Euphrates and Tigris, which there mette and mixe their waters: Nature being by mans industrie forced to yeeld to the march) as Plinie saith, for that purpose, emptied Babylon of her Inhabitants, and inherited her name also, with her people. It was from Babylon ninetie miles, or, as some reade it, fortie, inhabited with sixe hundred thousand Citizens. To spoile the spoyler, the Parthians built Ctesiphon three miles from thence, and failing of their purpose, Vologesus built another Towne by, called Vologesocerta. Yet did Babylon it selfe remaine (but not it selfe) in the time of Ammianus Marcellinus, and after.

Ortelius thinketh that Bagdat was called Babylon (as Seleucia before had bene) because it stood neare to the place where Babylon had stood. For that old Babylon in Pausanias time, had nothing left standing but the Temple of Bel, and the walls; sometimes, saith he, the greatest Citie that euer the Sunne saw.

In Ieromes time, within those walls were kept beasts for the Kings game. It was after inhabited with many thousands of Iewes, and was laid euen with the ground, as

Ios. Scaligen affirmeth in the years after the Jewish account 4797. and after the Christian, 1037. Master Fox hath a little lengthened the date and fate thereof, shewing that Almaricus King of Jerusalem rased and ruined it, and that it was never after inhabited Ann. 1170. There now remaineth nothing but the small part of that great Tower, eyther of ornament, or of greatnesse, or of place inhabited.

Before that time was Bagded built by Bugiasar, as Barrius calleth him, or after Scaliger, Abugaphar Elmantzar, who beganne to reigne in the one hundred thirtieth and five, and died in the one hundred fiftie and eight years of their Hegira. Scaliger and Lydus agree of this place (which in their Emendations of Time disagree so eagerly) that it was Seleucia, or built in the place, and of the ruines thereof: an opinion not improbable, as theirs is altogether which thinke the present Bagded to be the olde Babylon. The storie of this Bagded or Baldach, and her Califs, ye may reade in our Saracenicall Historie. Authors agree, that Hasan the Tartar, sacked it about the years one thousand two hundred and threescore. Masnunem being then Caliph, the foure and fiftieth, and last of those Saracenicall Popes. He found a miserable death, where others with unseemly blasse seek a blessed life, being shut up and starved amidst those Treasures, whereof he had store, which niggardie forbade him to distribute in his owne defence.

There is yet a bone left of this Caliph's carcase, or some ghost and shadow of that great and mightie body, I mean that ancient name and power of the Caliph's, which magnificent Solyman the Turkish Emperour, in his conquest 1534. would seeme to acknowledge, in accepting the royall ensignes of that new conquered state at the handes of their Caliph: a ceremonie which the Soldans in Egypt and Persia vsed, more for forme then necessitie; this Assyrian and that Egyptian Caliph hauing but getture and vesture, the Soldans themselves enioying both body and soule of this authoritie.

In the yeare one thousand one hundred fiftie nine, the Riuer Tygris overflowed Bagded, and desolated many Cities. Barrius affirmeth out of the Arabian and Persian Tarigh, which he saith he had seene, that Bagded was built by the counsell of an Astrologer, a Gentle named Nobach, and hach for ascendent Sagittarius, was finished in foure yeares, and cost eighteene millions of gold. These studies of Astrologie did there flourish. One Richardus a Frier Preacher saith, That here was an Vniuersitie, the Sudents whereof were maintained at publique charge, of which number himselfe was one. That Caliph that founded it, for the preuenting of sects, banished Philosophie out of these Schooles, and accounted him a bad Saracen which was a good Philosopher. The reason whereof grew from some, which, reading Aristotle and Plato, relinquished Mahomet.

Mareo Palo or Paulus the Venetian saith, that they studied here in his time, the Law of Mahomet, Necromancie, Geomancie, Physiognomy, Physicke, and Astronomie: And that it was then a great Staple of the Indian Commodities. This was within few yeares after the Tartar had won it. He addeth, that there were many Christians in these parts; and that in the yeare one thousand two hundred twenty and five, in derision of the Gospel, the Calph commanding by a day that the Christians should remove a mountain in testimonie of their faith; according to the wordes of Christ, or else to abide the perill: this was effected by a Shoemaker, and the day in remembrance thereof yearly solemnized with fasting the Euen. The Iewes goe still to visite the Denne which is there shewed, as the place of Daniels imprisonment, with his terrible Gaolers, or fellow-prisoners, as Master Alto tolde me.

A certain Merchant (the Discourse of whose voyage Ramusius hath published) speaketh of Orpha, a towne in the way from Byr to Babylon, wherein the people foolishly suppose, that Abraham offered Isaac: at which time (say they) there sprang a fountaine which watereth their Countrey, and driueth their Mills. Here was a Christian Temple called Saint Abraham, after turned into a Mahumetane Moschee, and now called Abrahams Well, into which if any enter so many times (they haue a set number)

Nisibis, Carræ, and <sup>m</sup> Edeffa, were chiefe Citties of Mesopotamia: at Edeffa reigned Abogarus, betwixt whom and our Sauour passed (if we may beleue it) those Epistles yet extant.

At Carræ <sup>n</sup> there was a Temple of the Moone, in which, they which sacrificed to the goddesse Luna were subiect to the gouernment of their wiues: they which sacrificed to the god Lunus were accounted their wiues Masters. He saith, that the Babylonians allowed marriages of parents and children. <sup>n</sup> Cae is two dayes iourney from Bagdet & religious for the buriall of Hali and his sonnes, Hassan and Ossain: whereunto is resort of Pilgrims from Persia, whose Kings were wont here to be crowned. But this City Curio calleth Cusa, assigneth it to Arabia, and saith that of this accident it was called Massadale, or the house of Ab, slaine here by Muan his competitor.

Mesopotamia is now called Diarbeck. The chiefe Citties in it are Orta, of seuen miles compasse, famous, say some, for the death of Crassus. Caramit the mother-Citie of the countrey, of twelue miles compasse. Mosul and Merdin, of which in the next Chapter. Betweene Orpha and Caramit, was the Paradise of Aladenles, where he had a fortresse destroyed by Selim. This his Paradise was like to that which you shall find in our Persian Historie. Men by a potion brought into a sleep, were brought into this supposed Paradise, where at their waking they were presented with all sensuall pleasures of musicke, damosels, dainties, &c. which (having had some taste of another sleepe drinke) after came againe to themselves. And then did Aladenles tell them, That he could bring whom he pleased to Paradise, the place where they had bene: and if they would commit such murders, or haughty attempts, it should be theirs. A dangerous deuice. Zelim the Turke destroyed the place.

CHAP. XIII.

Of Ninine and other neighbouring Nations.

We haue hitherto spoken of Babylonia, but so, as in regard of the Empire, and some other occurrents, necessity now and then compelled vs to make excursions into some other parts of Assyria, Mesopotamia, &c. And I know not how, this Babylon causeth confusion in that Sea of affaires, and in regard of the diuision of the pens (as sometimes of tongues) of such as haue written thereof. Hard it is to distinguish betweene the Assyrian and Babylonian Empire, one while vnited, another while diuided, as each party could most preuaile: and no lesse hard to reconcile the Ethnike and Diuine History touching the same. Ptolemy <sup>u</sup> straitneth Assyria on the North, with part of Armenia neere the riuer Niphates; on the West with Mesopotamia; on the South with Sufiana; and Media on the East. But her large Empire hath enlarged the name of Syria, & of Assyria (which names the Greeks did not wel distinguish) to many countries in that part of Asia. The Scripture deriueth Syria from Aram, and Assyria from Asour. Both were in their times flourishing, and mention is made from Abrahams time, both of the warres and Kingdomes in those parts: yea before, from Asour and Nimrod, as already is shewed.

Mesopotamia is so called, and in the Scripture Aram or Syria of the waters, because it is situate betweene Euphrates and Tygris: the countries Babylonia, and Armenia, confining the same on the North and South. Whereas therefore we haue in our former Babylonian relation discoursed of Assyria, extending the name after a larger reckoning: here we consider it more properly. Euphrates is a Riuer very swift; for they which goe to Bagdet buy their boats at Birra, which serue them but one voyage, and sell them at Felugia for seuen or eight which cost fifty, because they cannot returne. But Tygris is swifter: the Armenians bring victuals downe the same to Bagdet, on rafts made of Goats skins, blown full of wind, and boords laide vpon them, on which they lade their goods; which being discharged they open the skins and carry them backe on Camels. Dionysius and Strabo tell of this river, that it passeth through the Lake Thonitis without mixture of waters by reason of this swiftnesse, which also giueth it the name; for the Medes call an Arrow Tygris. Lucan saith it passeth a great way vnder ground, and weary of that burthen some journey, riseth againe as out of a new fountaine.

The chiefe Citie in these parts was Ninive, called in Isa. <sup>a</sup> A great and excellent Citie of three dayes journey. It had (I borrow the words of our reuerend Diocesan) <sup>b</sup> an ancient testimony long before in the booke of c Genes. For thus Moses writeth, That Ashur came from the land of Shinar, and built Nineveh and Reborth, and Calah, and Resin. At length he singeth out Ninive from the rest, and setteth a speciall marke of prebeminence vpon it, This is a great Citie: which honour, by the iudgement of the most learned (though standing in the last place) belongeth to the first of the foure Citties, namely to Ninive. Others <sup>d</sup> imagined (but their coniecture is without ground) that the foure Citties were closed vp within the same walls, and made but one, of an vnusuall bignesse.

Some ascribe the building of Ninive to Ninus the sonne of Belus: of whom it tooke the name, so be called eyther Ninus, as we read in Pliny; or after the manner of the Hebrewes, Ninive. They conceine it thus, That when Nimrod had built Babylon, Ninus disdayning his gouernement, went into the fields of Ashur, and there erected a Citie after his owne name, betwene the rivers Lycus and Tygris. Others suppose that the affinity betwixt these names, Ninus and Nineveh deceiued profane writers touching the author therof, and that it tooke to name Nineveh, because it was beautifull or pleasant. Others holde opinion that Ashur and Ninus are but one and the same person. And lastly, to conclude, the iudgment of some learned, is, that neither Ashur nor Ninus; but Nimrod himselfe was the founder of it. But by the confession of all, both sacred and Gentile Histories, the Citie was very spacious, hauing foure hundred and fourescore furlongs in circuit, when Babylon had fewer almost (as some report) by an hundred: and as afterwards it grew in wealth and magnificence, so (they write) it was much more enlarged. Raphael Volaterranus affirmeth, That it was eight yeares in building, and not by fewer at once then ten thousand workmen. There was no Citie since, by the estimation of Diodorus Siculus, that had like compass of ground or stateliness of walls: the height whereof was not lesse then an hundred foot; the breadth sufficiently capable to haue receiued three Carts on a row: and they were furnished and adorned besides with fifteen hundred Turrets. Thus far our reuerend and learned Bishop.

Diodorus <sup>e</sup> telleth out of Ctesias, that Ninus, after he had subdued the Egyptians, Phœnicians, Syrians, Cilicians, Phrygians, and others, as farre as Tanais, and the Hyrcanians, Parthians, Persians, and other their neighbours, he built this Citie. After that, he led an Armie against the Bactrians of seuentene hundred thousand footmen, and two hundred thousand horse: in which expedition he tooke Semiramis from her husband Menon, who therefore (impatient of loue and griefe) hanged himselfe. He had by her a sonne of his owne name, and then died, leauing the Empire to his wife. His Sepulchre was nine furlongs in height (each of which is sixe hundred feete) and ten in breadth. The credite of this History I leaue to the Author, scarce seeming to agree with Moses narration of the building of Ninive, any more then Semiramis building of Babylon. Some write That Semiramis abusing her husbands loue, obtained of him the swaying of the Empire for the space of fife dayes; in which she depriued him of his life, and succeeded in his estate.

But least the name of this Citie call vs backe againe too much to those Assyrian Relations, before dilated as much as concerneth our purpose; let vs see what can be said of their Religion here. Of this we finde little, but as before is shewed of the Babylonians.

Nisroch

Nisroch was the Idoll, in whose Temple Senacherib was slaine by his owne sonnes. But what this Nisroch was, I cannot finde. Certaine it is, that he which had vpbraided confidence in the true God, findes his Idoll, even in the place and time of his worship, his Traitor; and hee which had blasphemed the God of heauen, findes Heauen and Earth, and his owne Bowels, against him.

Venus Vrania is reckoned among the Assyrian deuotions, and Adad was their chiefe God, which they interpret One, (and Macrobius, the Sunne, which, as before is said, they worshipped) and Atargatis, the Earth. Belus also was here worshipped, as witnesse Dion, Eusebius, and Cyrrillus.

Lucian saith, That the Assyrians sacrificed to a Dove; the touching of which Fowle required much ceremonie for expiation: Whereunto accordeth the fable, that Semiramis was turned into a Dove.

Concerning Adad and Atargatis, Macrobius saith, That the Assyrians ascribe all power to these two. The Image of Adad shined with raies or beames downwards, designing the Sunnes force: That of Atargatis, with beames vpwards, as it were ascribing to the heauenly influence all her plentie: vnder the same Image were the shapes of Lyons, as also the Phrygians fained the Mother of the Gods, that is, the Earth, to be borne on Lyons. But of this Atargatis more in the next Chapter.

Ionas was sent to preach to the great Citie of Niniue; as some thinke in the dayes of Sardanapalus, his next Predecessor. Broughton (with some other) thinketh in the daies of Pul, or Phul-assur. Their repentance staid that iudgement. Nabur after deniounced the like iudgement, which accordingly came to passe. Phraortes King of the Medes (mentioned in the former chapter) besieged it. His sonne Cyaxares succeeded in the Kingdome, and in this siege. After that, the Scythians inuaded Media, and held it eight and twentie yeares, according to the prophetic of Ieremie 49. 34. and in the same Expedition obtained Niniue. But Cyaxares after preuailed against the Scythians, and Astyages his Sonne ouer-turned and destroyed Niniue, that it should no more be a receptacle or encouragement to the Assyrians, to rebell against the Medes. Nabum threatneth opening of the gates of the River and destruction to the Temple, as Tremellius readeth it, noting thereon the casting downe of the Forts on Tigris, and amongst them the Temple of Belus there erected; out of whose notes on the first Chapter of Nabum, I inserted the former Relation. Herodotus in the Historie hereof saith, That Phraortes there perished in the siege, with most part of his Armie. Cyaxares, to reuenge his Fathers death, renewed the siege, but was not able to hold his owne against the Scythians, vntill, after eight and twentie yeares, that the Scythians had enioyed the Empire of Asia (vnder pretence of feasting being entertained in a banquet) the most of them, in their drunkenesse, were slaine by the Medes: and so the Scythians loosing what before they had gotten, Cyaxares recovered the Empire, and destroyed Niniue. Thus was that Citie destroyed, whose Riches, Beautie, Antiquitie, Largenesse, and Puiſſance, the Scripture so often mentioneth.

A man may compare Ecbatana of the Medes, Babylon on Euphrates, and Niniue on Tigris, to the Triumvirs at Rome: So did they both emulate and share the Eastern Empire, as each could make her selfe strongest; now Babylon, another while Niniue, and sometime Ecbatana preuailling; which is the cause of no small difficultie in these Histories, Master Carrwright, an eye-witnesse, hath beheld. (hee saith) the ruines of this Citie, and agreeth with Diadorus in the inequalitye of the sides: two of which contained an hundred and fiftie furlongs, the two other but fourescore and ten on a side.

Mosul is supposed to be Niniue, happily for the nearenesse; or for that (as a post-hume issue) it hath sprung from the former. The ashes yet haue not yeelded such a Phoenix as the former was, rather a witnesse of the others mightinesse, saith Gr. Ant. Sherley, and Gods iudgement, then of any magnificence in it selfe. Mosul is in fame for Cloth of Gold, and Silke, for fertilitie, and for the Patriarchall Sea of the Nestorian Christians, whose authoritie stretched to Cathay and India. Mardin, a towne on the same River, is also a Patriarchall Sea of the Chaldees (or Mahometane Sect.)

p M. Paul. l. 1. In Paulus Venetus his daies <sup>p</sup> they were in the Prouince of Mosul, partly Mahumetans, partly Christians: and in the mountaines dwelt the Curdi, that were Particples or Mungrels in Religion, professing partly Christ, partly Mahumet, in practise robbers and wicked. The Christian Patriarch hath Archbishops and Bishops vnder him, as the Roman Pope. The Mahumetans are called Aratri.

q Magin. Geogr. Assyria (saith <sup>q</sup> Maginus) is now called by Niger, Adrinfa; by Girara, Azemia; by Pinetus, Mosul; by Mercator, Sarh; and of Castaldus, Arzerum. It sometime contained the Prouinces Arapachire, Adiabena, and Sittacene, now called (after some) Botan, Sarca, and Rabia.

r J. Boem. l. 1. Boemus <sup>r</sup> telleth of a strange fashion, anciently vsed in Assyria; That the maides which were marriageable were yearly brought forth in publike, and set to sale to such as would marrie them. The monie which was giuen for the fairest, was giuen to the more deformed for their portion in marriage.

The Assyrians vsed to wash themselves daily, but chiefly after carnall companie.

As for the Saracenal Religion, we shall more fitly handle the same by it selfe, then tediously repeat the same things. For this therefore, and other Countries subiect to Turkish or Persian seruitude, the Reader may reade of their superstitions in their due place, when we speake of the Saracens, Turkes, and Persians. The relation of their Christian Rites belong to another Tome.

But let vs come out of Assyria into Syria; the Histories of which are not a little, as is said, confounded together, and many Rites were common to them both; and to all these parts, from the Persian gulfes to Asia the lesse, as being so often subiect to one Empire, or rather still parts of that one Empire, which receiued often alterations vnder the Assyrians, Babylonians, Medes, Persians, Macedonians, Scythians, Parthians, &c.

SYRIA is called, in Scripture, Aram, of Aram the sonne of <sup>a</sup> Shem, as before is said. And Strabo calleth the Syrians Arammazi. Hence also his <sup>a</sup> Arimi are deriued, and Arami (lib. 13.) It is diuersly bounded by diuers Authors: some confounding the names of Syria and Assyria. Eusebius doth reckon these fiue parts thereof, viz. Commagena, Seleucide, Cœlesyria, Phœnicia, and Iudæa. <sup>b</sup> Mela extendeth it further, and <sup>c</sup> Plinie nameth, as part of Syria, Palæstina, Iudæa, Cœle, Phœnice, Damascena, Babylonia, Mesopotamia, Sophene, Commagene, Adiabene, Antiochia. And in this large sense doth <sup>d</sup> Postellus and Bracardus stretch it beyond Tigris Eastward from the Mediterranean Sea, and from Armenia to Arabia. But Dom. Niger, and before him <sup>e</sup> Ptolemie (whom wee especially follow) make it a Butte on the North vpon Cilicia, and part of Cappadocia, by the mount Amanus; on the South, vpon Iudæa, and part of Arabia Petrea; on the East, vpon Arabia Deserta and Euphrates; on the West, vpon the Syrian Sea.

This Countie is thought to haue beene the habitation of our first Parents, before the flood, and of Noah and his sincerer Familie (as wee haue said) after. Yet how soone, and how much, they degenerated in the wicked off-spring of cursed Cham, whose posteritie peopled a great part hereof, till they werethence by the Israelites expelled, the Scripture is sufficient record. Yea, euen from Noahs time did they deriue their Idolatrie, as appeareth by <sup>f</sup> Lucianus Narration of the Syrian Goddesse, which hee partly saw with his eyes, and partly receiued of the Priests report. This Goddesse was with godlesse Rites serued and obserued at Hierapolis; which, although Strabo <sup>g</sup> placeth it beyond the Riuer in Mesopotamia, is by <sup>h</sup> Plinie accounted counted in Cœlesyria, called also Bambyce, and, of the Syrians themselves, Magog; and by Ptolemy named among the Syrian Cities of the diuision Carristica, in 71. 15. Longit. and 56. 15. Latit. And Lucian (who himselfe was there; for he calleth himselfe an Assyrian, and was borne at Samosata in Commagena) placeth it on this side the Riuer. Plinie and Strabo (deceiued in the name) mention the worship of Atargatis (called of the Greekes Derceto) in this place: Athenagoras in his Apologie for the Christians, hath these wordes: Semiramis the daughter of Derceto, a lecherous and bloudie woman was worshipped by the name of the Syrian Goddesse; but Lucian (other-where a scoffer, here an Historian) at large describeth it, making this difference betweene This and That, that Atargatis was halfe a fish, but the Syrian Goddesse wholly resembled a woman.

The Citie he thinketh to haue receiued the name Hierapolis (Holy Citie) of these holy things here obserued; in which respect it giueth place to none other place in Syria: hauing a stately Temple, enriched with gifts, statues, and (as they esteemed them) miracles. Arabia, Phœnicia, Babylonia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, and Assyria, brought her presents, and celebrated her solemne Feasts.

This Temple was (in the Syrians opinion) first founded by Dencalion, whose Historie you would thinke Lucian had learned of the Hebrewes, nor of the Syrians, or Greekes; so liuely doth he expresse the Infidelitie and crueltie of the old world; the manner of the flood; the Arke wherein, with himselfe, his wife, and children, hee saued also all other creatures that liued on the earth, which came to him by couples, by dispensation of Iupiter. Hereunto these Hierapolitans adde, That in their Territorie was made a great Clift, which swallowed vp those waters: which Clift (but then very little) was shewed to our Author: to whom also they reported, That in memorie hereof, Dencalion instituted that Rite, which to his time continued; that twice euery yeare, not the Priests only, but many out of all Syria, Arabia, and beyond Euphrates, went to the Sea, and from thence brought water, which they poured downe in the Temple that he had built ouer that Clift vnto Inno; all which water was receiued into the same.

There was another Hierapolis in Phrygia, wherein was a famous Temple of Apollo, with a Caue or Vault vnder it deadly to all entrers but the Priests yea to the birds also which flew ouer it, Damasci in uita Ihsidori ap. Phos, 242.

Some ascribeth the building of this Temple to Semiramis, in honour of her mother Derceto: others to Attes, for the worship of Rhea: which Attes was a Lydian, and was Author of the superstitions of Rhea, to the Phrygians, Lydians, and Samothracians: but the opinion most probable was, that Diomysius or Bacchus was founder of it; two substantiall witnesses, besides others, affirming the same, namely two Phalli, or Priapi (huge Images of the priuie part of a man) erected at the entrie of the Temple, with an inscription, That Bacchus had consecrated them to Inno. That ancient foundation being consumed by Time, this later Temple was erected by queene Stratonice, who being in a dreame enioyned this office of Inno, and for neglecting the same, punished with sicknesse, vowed vpon her recouerie to performe it. The King ioynd in Commission with her, as Generall of his Armie, and ouer-seer of these holy workes, a beautifull yong man, named Combabus, who fearing what might happen, gelded himselfe, and closing those his dismembred members (first for their preservation embalmed) in a boxe sealed, as some great treasure, he committed to the Kings fidelitie, to be safely reserued to his vse. Which his practise saued his life accordingly, being after produced to cleare him of adulterie with Stratonice, which had been laid to his charge by his eniuous accusers, and by the jealous King greedily apprehended. In memorie whereof, a brazen statue of Combabus was set vp in this Temple, and both then (whether to solace Combabus, or by inspiration of Inno) and yearly euer after, many in this Temple gelded themselves, and put off together the nature and habit of men, attyring themselves like women. These Man-women Priests were called Galli.

The Temple was built in the midst of the Citie, compassed with a double wall; the Porch looking Northwards, almost an hundred fadome high; where stood those Priapi aforesaid, about the height of three hundred fadome: vp to one of these one ascendeth twice a yeare, and abideth in the top thereof seuen dayes. He carryeth with him a long chayne, which hee letteth downe, and thereby draweth vp to him such things things as he needeth. Many offer gold, and silver, and brasse, and one appointed receiveth their names, which he sheweth to him above, and he maketh his prayers for every of them, sounding, while he praith, a little Bell. The Temple within shineth with gold, and the Roofe is wholly of this mettall; it yeeldeth so fragrant a smell, that the garments of those, which come thither, retaine this sent long after.

There is also another inner Roome or Quire, whereinto the chiefe of the Priests only haue entrance; yet is it open without any doore. In this Sanctuarie are the Images of the Gods; Iupiter, supported with Bulls, but Iuno sitteth vpon Lyons, holding in one hand a Scepter, and in the other a Distaffe, in some thing or other resembling diuers other Goddeses, by the Egyptians, Indians, Armenians, Babylonians, Ethiopians, and Medes, adorned with many Jewels: and among the rest shee hath on her head a stone called the lampe, of the effect yeelding light in the night season, as if all the Temple were hanged with Lamps. This statue goeth twice a yeare to the Sea, for the water before mentioned; neither of the Syrians is called by any name, but only the Image, not expressing of whom.

In the Temple is the Image of Apollo clothed, with a beard, (contrarie to the custome of the Greekes, and in a farre more glorious manner) giuing forth Oracles: for it moueth it selfe; which, the Priests espying, lift it vp aloft (otherwise it sweateth and moueth it selfe forward neuerthelesse) and bring thus supported, it turneth it selfe and them about, and leapeth from one place to another. Then doth the chiefe of the Priests, make supplication and request for all things: which if it misliketh, it goeth backwards: if it approueth, it carrieth them forwards: and without these Oracles they enterprife nothing neither priuate nor sacred: and Lucien, saith he, saw it leauing the Priests (the supporters) and mouing it selfe about in the ayre. Here are also the statues of Ailae, Mercurie, and Lucina, and without, a great brasen Altar, and many brasen Images of Kings and Priests, and many others recorded in Poets and Histories. Among others standeth the Image of Semiramis, pointing to the Temple with her finger, which (they say) is the signe of her repentance, who hauing giuen commandement to the Syrians to worship no other God but her selfe, was by plagues (sent from heauen) driuen to reuoke that former Edict, and thus seemeth to acknowledge and point out another Deitie. There were also places inclosed, wherein were kept and fed sacred Oxen, Horses, Eagles, Beares, Lyons,

The Priests were in number about three hundred, some for killing sacrifices; some for offerings; some ministring fire to others at the Altar; their garment all white; their head couered; and euery yeare was cholen a new High Priest, which alone was clothed with purple, and a golden head-tire. A great multitude there was besides of Musicians, Galls, and Propheticall women: they sacrificed twice a day, whereat they all assembled: To Iupiter they vse neither song, nor instrument, in sacrifice; as they doe to Iuno.

Not farre hence was a Lake of two hundred fadome depth, wherein were preserved sacred Fishes, and in the middest thereof an Altar of stone, crowned alwaies with Garlands, and burning with odours. They haue a great feast which they call the going downe to the Lake, when all their Idols descend thither.

Their greatest and most solemne feast was obserued in the Spring, which they called the fire: which they solemnized in this sort. They felled great trees, and laid them in the Church-yard (as we may terme it) and bringing thither Goats, Sheepe, and other beasts, they hanged them on these trees; and together with them, fowles, and garments, and workes of gold and silver, which being set in due order, they carrie the Images of the Gods about the trees, and then set all on fire. They resort to this feast out of Syria, and the coasts adioyning, & bring hither their Idols with them: and great multitudes resorting to the sacrifices, the Galls, and those other sacred wights beat and wound each other. Others play on instruments, and others, rauished by diuine furie, prophetic: and then doe the Galls enter into their orders: for the furie rauisheth many of the beholders. Whatsoeuer yong man commeth prepared to this purpose, hurling off his garments, with a great voice he goeth into the middest, and drawing his sword geldeth himselfe; and runneth thorow the Citie, carrying in his hands, that which he would no longer carry on his bodie. And into whatloever house he cometh the same, he receiveth from thence his womanish habite and attire. When any of them die, his fellowes carrying him into the Suburbs, couer him and his horse with stones, and may not enter into the Temple in seven daies after: nor after the sight of any other carcasie in one day, but none of that familie, where one hath died, in thirty daies: and then also with a shaven head. Swine they hold for unclean beasts. And the Dove they esteeme so sacred, that if one touch one against his will, he is that day unclean. This causeth Doves in those parts to multiply exceedingly: neither do they touch Fishes: This because of a Derceto, halfe a woman, halfe a fish: that, for Semiramis which was metamorphosed into a Dove. Julius Hyginus hath this fable, that an egge of marvellous greatnesse fell out of heaven into Euphrates, which the fishes rolled to land: on the same did Doves sit, and hatched there-out Venus, who was after called the Syrian Goddesse, at whose request Jupiter granted the Fishes their heavenly constellation: and the Syrians for that cause eate not their Fish nor Doves, but number them amongst their Gods.

Many are the ceremonies also to be performed of the religious Pilgrims, or Votaries that visite this holy Citie: for before he setteth forth, he cutteth off the haire of his head and browes, he sacrificeth a sheepe, and spreading the fleece on the ground, he kneeleth downe on it, and layeth vpon his head the head and feete of the beast, and prayeth to be accepted: the reil he spendeth in the banquet. Then doth he crowne himselfe, and his fellow pilgrims, and after sets forward on his pilgrimage, vsing for his drinke and washing cold water, and sleepeeth alwayes on the ground till his returne home. In this Citie were appointed publike Hostes, for diuers Cities diuers, called DoElors, because they expounded these mysteries: They haue also one manner of sacrificyng, to hurle downe the beasts destinied hereunto, from the top of the porch, which die of the fall. They haue a like rite to put their children in a Sacke, and carry them downe, branded first on the necke or palme of the hand: and hence it was that all the Assyrians were branded. The yong men also consecrated their hayre from their Natiuitie, which being cut in the Temple, was there preserued in some boxe of gold or siluer, with the inscription of the owners name thereon. And this did I (saith Lucian) in my youth: and my hayre and name remaine in the Temple still. Of Atergatis, see more in the Chapter of Phanicea.

Suetonius tells of Nero, that he contemned all Religions but this of the Syrian Goddesse: of which also he grew wearie, and defiled her with Urine. After which he obserued a little Needle, supposed to haue a power of fore-signifying danger: and because soone after he had it, he found out a conspiracie intended against him, he sacrificed thereto three times a day.

Plutarch calleth the Syrians an effeminate Nation prone to teares: and saith, that some of them after the death of their friends haue hidden themselves in Caves, from the sight of the Sunne many daies.

Rimmon the Idoll of the Syrians, and his Temple is mentioned, 2. King. 5. 18. But I haue little certaintie to say of him.

Antiochia built by Seleucus, (to whom, in honor of his memorie, in mount Cassius they obserued sacred solemnities, as to a demi-god) sometimes the seate royall of the Syrian Kings, third Citie of the Roman Empire, third seate of the Christian Patriarkes, and first, where that melodious name of Christian was heard: is now the Sepulchre (saith Boterus) of it selfe, or, (as Niger) a greater wilderness, wherein it selfe is the least part of it selfe, being left but a small Village (saith another) in the midst of it's owne walles.

About fise miles from Antiochia, was that faire and sacred Daphne, which Ortelius in his Theater hath presented to the spectators, with a peculiar description, and of which the elder Authours haue plentifully written. It was ten miles about: a place euery way enuioured with many stately Cypresses, besides other trees, which suffered not the Sunne to kisse their mother (Earth:) whose lappe was according

A spring there was, deriuing (as men supposed) her water from the Castalian Fountaines, to which ancient superstition (and therefore superstitious Antiquitie) attributed a diuining facultie with like name and force to that at Delphos. This also was furthered by the Legend of Daphne,<sup>k</sup> recorded by the Poets, beleueed (and what will not Superstition beleuee, but the truth?) by the credulous multitude: who was said to haue fled from Apollo, and heere turned into a tree. But thus could not Apollo be turned from his loue, which hee continued both to the Tree and place. This was Lettice futable to the lips of vaine youth.<sup>l</sup> Et quia consimilem luserat (saith amorous Cherea of Iupiter in the Comicke)

There needed no other lecture of sensuality to them, then this Legend, especially in this schoole, where every place might be a place of argument (vnder pretence of reason and religion) to shut true Religion, and reason out of the place, especially with schollers greedie of this conclusion.

Inl. Capit. verna.

Here you might haue heard the whisking winds in a murmuring accent breathing this lustfull Oratorie: the Enamelled floore did offer her more then officious courtesie, (a soft, sweet, and inlayed bed) to lie in; the ayre with Temperature, seemed to further Intemperance: The eie of the day, and watchmen of the night, were prohibited by the Cypresse roose, with their vnwelcome light, to testifie those workes of darknes, which those guilty boughes conered from discovering: Once, the concurring objects of each sense, did in silence speake and perswade to sensuall pleasure, insomuch that by a generall Decree, Temperance and Temperate men were hence exiled, and scarce would the vulgar allow him the name of a man, which heere would not be transformed into a beast, or would presume, without a Curtesan, to tread on this holy ground. Needs must they go whom the diuell driueth: such God, such religion. Heere were erected sumptuous buildings: the temple of Apollo Daphneus, with a stately Image therein; the work (as was thought) of Selencus; also Dianas chappel & sanctuary. Iulius Capitolinus writeth that Vernus a voluptuous Emperour spent foure summers here, and wintered in Laodicea and Antioch, Senerus (more truely answering his name) did to death certaine Tribunes, by whose negligence the souldiers here were suffered to riot. The Oracles added renowne to the place, which were deliuered out of these Daphnean waters by a certaine winde or breath. Hadrian the Emperour is reported to haue hence receiued the facultie of Diuining, by dipping a Cypresse leafe in the Fountaine. Julian resorted hither often for that purpose. But his elder brother Gallus, whom Constantinus had called to be Cesar, & after (saith Ammianus) for his outrages executed, had in the time of his abode at Antioch, remoued the bones of Babylas their Bishop, & other holy martyrs his companions in suffering to this place, where also he built a church. Now when as Julian in his Persian expedition had sent others to visit all the other Oracles in the Roman Empire, himselfe here consulted with Apollo, (an Apostata Emperour with an Apostata Angell) about the successe of those warres. But all his sacrifices obtained no other answer, then that he could not answer, by the countermand of a more diuine power there liuing in those dead bones. Hereupon Julian commanded the Christians to remoue those ill neighbours: which they did (saith Theodoret), with a solemne procession, singing the Psalmes & dancing with the hart of Dauid, making this the burthen, and foot of each verse, Confounded be all they that worship graven Images: wherewith, Julian enraged, persecuted the Christians. Euagrius affirmeth that he built a temple in honor of Babylas; how truely I know not. But the True God confounded both the Idol & Idolater, shortly after, calling the one to giue account of his ill employed stewardship; vncertaine whether by diuine or humane hand: and for the other, his temple was consumed with fire from aboue, together with the Image, one pillar wherof remained in Chrysostomes daies. The Pagans attributed this fire to the Christians: and no maruell: for what did not that fire of blind Idolatry (kindled with zeale) attribute to the innocent Christians? herein testifying that it came from hel, & must to hell againe, again, by that hellish Character and impression, of sa great fire, and as great darknes. Such is Hell, and such is ignorant Zeale: a fire, but no light. Apollon Priest by no tortments could be forced to confesse any author thereof: and the Officers of the Temple affirmed it was fire frō heauen, which certain country-people cōfirmed by their own sight. Julian, to satisfie his rage, caused some Temples of the Christians to be burned. Nicophorus <sup>o</sup> wellsh of the continuance of this Daphna grove, honored with Buildings and spectacles, by Asymbrianus & Chosroes. Apollon Image was made of wood, covered ouer with gold. Theodosius forbade the cutting of any of those Cypresses.

Oronces is a River which riseth in Cœlesyria, and payeth tribute to all the three brethren: it viseth Plutus passage, running with a long tract vnder the Earth, and then heauing vph his head, maketh his glad some homage to Iupiter; and after his customs payed to the Antiochians, in fine powreth himselfe into the lappe of Neptune, emptying the Sea neere to Seleucia. <sup>o</sup> it was called Typhon, vntill Orontes, building a bridge ouer it, caused it to be called by his name. They had heere a tale of Typhon a huge Dragon, which diuided the earth, as he went seeking to hide himselfe, and perished by the stroke of a Thunder-bolt. Thus did he indent a passage for this River. Not farre hence was a sacred Caue, called Nymphœum; also Mount Casius, and Antiochian, and Hierapolis; and nigh thereto the Temple of Minerua. In Laodicea was this Goddess honored, to whom they offered <sup>o</sup> in yearly sacrifice in old time a maid; after that in stead thereof a Hare.

It may heere mention also that, which Tacitus <sup>o</sup> reporteth of the Mount Carmel (as hee placeth it,) betwixt Iudea and Syria, where they worshipped a God of that name with Ethnickē rites. They had not any Temple or Statue to this God, an Altar onely and Reuerence was heere seene. Vespasian did in this place offer sacrifice, where Basilides the Priest viewing the entralls, foretold him of his good successe. Damasius in the life of Isidorus, mentioneth a Syrian Goddess, named Babia, of whom infants newly borne, whereby the Syrians, especially at Damascus, called also Babia; perhaps they were esteemed vnder her tutelage; and our English word, Babes, may hence borrow the originall.

Of the Syrian Kings, and alteration in Government, and Religion;
in those Countries.

SYRIA quickly grew into Peoples and Kingdomes, although Time hath long since deuoured both them and their memories. Of Menon the husband of Semiramis (mentioned by Diodorus) is spoken before. Adad <sup>o</sup> was in Danids time, King of Aram Zoba, which some take for Chobal in Syria, some for Sophene in Armenia, and some for the Nubri; whatsoeuer they were, Dauid made them tributarie Anno mundi 2903. Benhadad, Hazael, and others, the Scripture also mentioneth: but certaine succession we finde not recorded of these Syrian Kings, till the time of Alexander, which conquering all from Macedonia, to India, by his unexpected death, left his huge Empire to be shared among his chiefe followers. Seleucus, the sonne of Antiochus, a Macedonian, first, master of the Elephants; then Tribune; after that Deputie of the Babylonians, at last obtained the Kingdome of Asia, Anno Mundi 3638. of whom Appianus thus writeth: The first King of Syria after Alexander was Seleucus, called Nicator, because he was of verie great stature; and as a wilde bull had in a sacrifice of Alexander broken loose, he held him with both his hands. He built sixteene Cities, called by the name Antiochia, of his father Antiochus; and sixe Laodicea's, in memorie of his mother Laodice; nine Seleucia's of his owne name: three Apamea's, and one Stratonicea, after the names of his two wiues. He prospered in his warres, tooke Babylon, subdued the Bactrians; pierced to the Indians, which had slaine Alexanders Gouvernours (placed amongst them) after Alexanders death. Hee slew Lysimachus, and seven monethes after was circumvented and slaine of Ptolemie (whose sister Lysimachus had married) being seuentie three yeares old.

To him succeeded his sonne Antiochus, fir-named Soter. Anno 367. who had obtained Stratonice his mother in law, of his father (moued therunto by his sonnes violent loue, and his Physicians subtile perswasion.) His sonne Antiochus Theos was (contrarie to his name) poysoned by his wife: whose sonnes Selencus, Callinicus, and Antiochus succeeded: and after them Antiochus Magnus, the sonne of Callinicus, who much enlarged his Empire, adding thereto Babylonia, Egypt, and Iudea: but invading Græcia, prouoked the Romans against him, with whom hee compounded on base and meane conditions: Hee did yet comfort himselfe for this losse amongst his friends, saying, that he was beholding to the Romans, that eased him of so weightie a burthen, and lessened his cares of government: (for they had cooped him in a corner of his Kingdome beyond Taurus.) After this hee was slaine: exhibiting in himselfe a true example of the worlds false-hood, that playeth with Scepters, and vieri Diademes, vsing men like Counters or Figures in numbering and casting accounts, where the same, with a little difference of place, is a pound, shilling, or penny, one, ten, or an hundred. And yet as earthly happinesse herein comes short of heauen, that it is neuer meere and vnmixed, but hath some sowre sauceto relish it: so falleth it as farre short of hell, that not onely hope, but the most miserable hap, hath some glimpse of comfort.

But to come to our Historie. Antiochus his sonne, fir-named Epiphanes, and after Epimanes for his furious insolence, (who beganne his raigne Anno mundi 3774.) was first sent to Rome in hostage, for securitie of his fathers faith: and after that Selencus, his brother (which sent Heliadorus to robbe the Temple at Hierusalem) had a while warmed the Throne, succeeded in the Syrian Kingdome. Of him and his tyrannie Daniel had long before prophecied in the interpretation of Nebuchodonosors Image, whose legges are interpreted to be this Syriani, and the Egyptian Kingdomes, both heauie and hard neighbours to the Church in Iudea, lying betwixt them: but more especially in his 4 Visions in the seuenth Chapter. Where, after other things, he fore-telleth of the ten hornes, which are the eight Kings afore-named, and two Egyptian Ptolemies, Euergetes, and Philopater, in their times preuailing in Syria, and infesting Iudea. And the last shall subdue three Kings, which were Ptolemie of Egypt, driuen out of Syria, Selencus his brother, and Demetrius, to whom, after Selencus, the right of the Scepter belonged. His policie, and blasphemie, and tyrannie, are also by Daniel plainly fore-signified, and in their euent as fully in the Historie of the Maccabees related. There you may reade his wicked life, and wretched death: Hee tooke Ierusalem Anno Mundi 3781, and slew fourestore thousand people, robb'd the Temple of eightene hundred talents, and of the holy Vessels; polluted the Temple; forbade the Sacrifice; named it the Temple of Iupiter Olympius; forced men by tortures from their Religion; with other execrable, outrages, which would require a iust volume to describe.

As hee was thus madde and raging against the true Religion: so Athenatio sheweth his vanitie in his owne, whose pompous solemnitie at the Daphnean feast hee thus relateth. Antiochus, in emulation to Paulus Emilius, proclaimed this solempne festiuitie in the Cities of Greece, and performed it at Daphne. First passed in order five thousand men, armed after the Roman manner: next followed five thousand Mysians, and three thousand Cilicians, with Crownes of gold: of Thracians, three thousand, of Galatians five thousand, of whom some had shields of siluer. Twentie thousand Macedonians, and five thousand with shields of brasse: after these, two hundred and fortie couples of champions which should fight in single combate. There followed 1000. Piszan horse-men, and 3000. of the Citie, the most whereof had Crownes and Vials of gold, other trappings of siluer: Next came the band, called Socia, nothing inferiour in pompe or number: then 1000. extraordinarie,

and another thousand in the band called Agema. Lastly, the barded horses 1500, all these in purple vestures, which many had embroidered, or embossed with gold: Chariots drawne with 6. horses, 100. and 40. drawne by foure; one drawne by Elephants attended with 36. other. The rest of the pompe is incredible and tedious: 800. youths with golden crownes: 1000. fat Oxen, and 300. persons to attend the sacrifices: 800. Elephants teeth. There were also the Images of all the Gods, and Heroes that can be reckoned, some gilded, some clothed with golden vestures, their fabulous histories being with great pompe annexed. After all these, the Images of Day, Night, Earth, Heaven, Morning, and Noone. Then came a 1000. Boyes, each hauing a peece of plate of a 1000. drams: 600. with vessels of gold: 80. women were carried in chaires footed with gold, and 500. in others footed with silver, very sumptuously attired: 200. of them out of basons of gold strewed sweet odours. These spectacles lasted 30. daies. A thousand (and sometimes 1200.) Halls or dining roomes, were furnished for bankers, the King himselfe affecting too officious familiarity therein, visiting the tables of the baser people, yea and that as a base Minstrell with musick; not of the best instruments, but such as the poorer sort vsed for want of better, as learned Casanbonus hath on that place of Athenaus obserued. So base is the pride of Ambition, tempering a confused distemper; according (in a strange harmonie) the harshest discord of proude-aspiring, and dejected baseness; where a base and seruile minde begetteth pride, and pride produceth a seruile basenesse, a changling, which the doting World fathereth on Humilitie.

Of the death of this Antiochus, the former and second books of the Machabees seeme to disagree: and, which is more strange, the second booke in the first chapter saith, * he and his companie were destroyed in the Temple of Nanxa in Persia: and in the ninth chapter saith, that in Media, at Ecbatana, he was smitten with an vncouth disease, and a fall from his Chariot, whereof he died. Some<sup>a</sup> that would haue this historie Canonically, apply it to two Antiochi, as Lyra and Rupertus, and after them Canus: but Bellarmino<sup>b</sup> seeing that they will not agree with the times of any other, but Epiphanes, proueth himselfe Epimanes, and runneth mad with loue of that Trent-Minion: affirming that in the Temple of Nanxa he fell, but escaped (as<sup>c</sup> the King of Sodom is said to fall when Lot was captiued, and yet was not slaine) and after perished, as is in the after-part of the historie expressed; whereas it is there said, that they font the doores on him, and cut him and his fellowes in peeces, and made them shorter by the heads: who yet after this (forsooth) could goe into Media, and there haue a fall from his Chariot. They must haue no delicate stomachs, that will be Iesuits, any thing must downe, when they will vp, especially, if Trent or the Vatican command, though manifest reason and sense (that I say not, Religion) countenmand, I enuie not the red hat with these labels. Well fare that modestie of the Authour<sup>d</sup> that confesseth his weakenesse: but Anathema to their Anathema's, that enact<sup>e</sup> contradictions to be Canonically.

I omit the successours of Antiochus, to wit, Antiochus, Demetrius, Alexander, (who tooke away the golden Image of Victoria out of the Temple at Antioch, in his necessitie: iesting that Iupiter had sent him Victorie, and when he would haue added Iupiter<sup>f</sup> to his sacrilege, was chased away by the multitude, and after slaine by Grypus.) The rest with the times of their raigne are before expressed. <sup>g</sup> Pompey set an end to these Seleucidan Kings: and the Romans enjoyed the Countries of Syria, till the Saracens dispossessed them; whose historie you may reade<sup>h</sup> in their due place. The Turkes displaced those Saracens; the Christians of the West, by warre, made those parts Christian; but were expelled againe by the Turkes, and they by the Tartars. The Mameluke<sup>i</sup> slaues, and their Egyptian Soldan after, held the Syrian Dominion, vntill Selim the great Turke subdued it to the Ottoman Empire, vnder which it still groneth. Of these things this our Historie will acquaint you in the proper reports of these Nations.

Aleppo, is now chiefe Citie of Syria; but Damascus both in elder and later times hath borne the greatest name, being the head of Aram, as<sup>k</sup> Esay affirmeth; call-led of Iulian the Citie of Iupiter, and eye of the whole East, Holie and Great, called also <sup>a</sup> the Trophee of Iupiter, because he there had conquered the Titans. It is interpreted drinking bloud, by <sup>b</sup> Hierom, who telleth (from the Hebrewes tradition) that in this field Kain slew his brother: <sup>c</sup> Chytrous expoundeth it saccus sanguinis, <sup>d</sup> Wolphius deriueth it of two words, signifying bloud and to spoile: which in the times of Hazael and Benhadad, and of Refin it performed: but neuer so much as when the Saracens made it the sinke of bloud and spoile, which they executed on the Christians: <sup>e</sup> and Noradine, Saladin, and the Turkes, fitting themselves and this Citie to the name, before the Aegyptian Sultans, and Ottoman Turks were Lords of it. Stephanns ascribeth the name to one Ascus a gyant, which cast Dionysius there into the riuer: Or because Damascus, the sonne of Mercury, comming hither out of Arcadia, built it: or because Dionysius there sleyd off the skin of Damascus, which had cut vp his Vines.

The Turkes now call it, as Lenncianus, and Chytrous testifie, Scham, and so is the whole Region called in the Arabian Chronicle, whose extract you may find <sup>f</sup> in our Saracenicall historie.

The Armies of Dauid, Abab, Toglat phalasar preuailed much against it: The Babylonians subverted it: After that the Ptolemies repaired it: Pompei wanne it: Paul hallowed it: The Saracens (as is sayd) polluted it. The Christians in vaine besieged it, in the yeere one thousand one hundred fortie and seven. <sup>g</sup> Haalon the Tartar, one thousand two hundred threescore and two, obtained it, and about one thousand foure hundred Tamerlane besieged it; and as he had done at Aleppo, filling the ditch with the bodies of captiues and slaine carkasses, cast wood and earth vpon them, and at last forced it and the Castle. He spared the Citie for the Temples sake, which had fortie Porches in the circuite, and (within) nine thousand Lampes of Gold and Siluer. But the Aegyptians by a wile possessing it, hee againe engirt it, and recouered it. He commanded Mahomet the Pope or Chalife, and his priests, which came to meet him, to repaire to the Temple, which they did with thirtene thousand Citizens, where he burnt them all: and for monument of his victorie, left three Towers erected of skulles of dead men. The Aegyptians regained and held it till Selim the Turke dispossessed them 1517.

Now in thus many alterations of State, who doubteth of diuersitie in Religions in Syria: First the true Religion in the times of Noah, and the first Patriarkes. Next, those superstitions of Rimmon, and the rest before related, in the Assyrian, Babylonian, Persian, Macedonian, and Roman governments: After which long night, the Sunne of Righteousnesse shone vnto the Syrians, and made a more absolute Conquest then all the former, not by Legions and Armies, but by a handfull of Fishermen, (manifesting his Power in their weakenesse) the Reason of Men, and Malice of Devils, not being able to withstand their Euangelicall weapons, which <sup>h</sup> were mightie through GOD to cast downe holds and bringing into captiuitie every thought to the obedience of CHRIST, insomuch, that hence the Christian world receiued first that name. And, how sweet would thy name remaine, O Syrian Antiochia, euen now in thy latest fates, which first was christened with the name Christian, hadst thou not outliued thy Christianitie, or rather, (after the soule departed) remained the carkasse of thy selfe; which ceasing to be Christian, hast long since ceased to bee, had not the Diuine hand reserued a few bones of thy carkasse to testifie this his iustice to the world! And what harmonic could haue beene more gratefull to the Gentiles eares, then thy memorie (Damascus) where the Doctor of the Gentiles was first taught himselfe, and made a Teacher of others? But in thee was the Chaire of Pestilence, the Throne of Sathan, the sinke of Mahumetan impietie to the rest of the world, infecting with thy contagion, and subduing with thy force more Nations then euer Paul by preaching conuerred. Syria, first in the first and principall Priuiledges of Mankind, embracing in her rich armes (if some bee right Surueiours) the promised Possession (the Seale of a further and better Inheritance) was with the first subdued to Saracene seruitude: vnder their Caliph, vnder the Turkes, vnder the Christians from the West, vnder the Tartars from the East, vnder the Mamalukes Mamelukes from the South, and from the North the Ottoman, by new successions and vicissitudes of miseries and mischiefs, become a common Stage of blood and slaughter.

And in all these later changes of State, and chaunces of Warre, Religion was the life that quickened those deaths, and whetted those murdering swords: no crueltie or sacrilege against God, or man, so irreligious and inhumane, but Religion was pretended to be the cause, and bare the Standard to Destruction; a new Religion alway erected with a new Conquerour. The rest of which, as professing their own peculiar rites, haue their peculiar standing in this field of our Narrations, assigned them: this one (which followeth) as a confusion and gallymaufry of diuers, I thought fittest here to insert.

The Drusians are accounted reliques of the Latine Armies, which here warred against the Turkes for recouerie of the Holy Land: These are circumcised as the Turkes, they take the libertie of Christians, in drinking Wine, and the licentiousnesse of beasts, in incestuous copulations with their owne daughters. They serue their owne Lords, and are not subiect to the Turkes. Their habitation is not farre from Damasco. Knolles in his Turkish Historie saith, That the right Drusians are not circumcised, otherwise agreeing with the former report; and addeth: That they follow one Isma a Prophet of their owne. A friend of mine, one master John Pountesse, who hath been acquainted with them, saith they are circumcised. Selim and Amurath laboured to deprive them of their freedome, which was in part by Turkish policy, and their owne discords, atchieued by Ebraim the Turkish Bassa Anno 1585. Onely Monoglis or Ebraiman, a Drusian Lord, kept himselfe out of his hands, and deluded his subtil practises. And thus these Drusians, with some Arabians in the middelt of the Ottoman Empire, retaine some freedome from the Turkish thraldome.

Maginus saith, That Tyrus still called Suri, or Sur, is an habicacle of those Drusian Robbers. Some place them betweene Ioppa and Damasco: I thought this the fittest place therefore for their mention, as being accounted to Syria, and neighbours to Damasco, and of this hoth-potch Religion. The Country hereabouts is repleat euen naturally with all the blessings the earth can giue to man, for the most part cultivated (they are the words of our Honourable Countreiman, an eye-witnesse) here and there, as it were sprinkled with miserable Inhabitants, which in their fashion shew rather the necessitie they had to liue, rather then any pleasure in their liuing.

d The Grecians because they could not pronounce the letter T, sadi, they turned it into T. & made it Tyr or Tyrus.

CHAP. XVII.

Phœnicia is the Sea coast of Syria, after Plinie, or that coast or tract bordering on the Sea from Orthosa (now Tortosa) to Pelusium. This Sea coast (saith Andreas Masius) was of the Greekes called Phœnicia, and of the Hebrewes peculiarie stiled Chanaan, and the Inhabitants Chananites. So the spies tell Moses, the Canaanites dwell by the Sea. The woman in the Gospell which Mattheu calleth a Canaanite, is by Marke named a Syrophœnicæan: and the Septuagint in this place, for the kings of Chanaan read the kings of Phœnicia. And in the Scripture it is appellatiuely vsed for a Merchant, because the Phœnicians or Chananites were famous for Merchandise as appeareth both by diuine and prophane testimonie. Most properlie the Northern part is Chanaan or Phœnicia, the Southerne Palestina, although it is sometime extended as we haue said euen to Egypt. Dionysius (which maketh the Phœnicians the first Mariners, Merchants, and Astronomers) placeth Gaza and Ioppa in Phœnicia. Sachoniatbo a Phœnician, supposed to haue liued before the Trojan warre, wrote in his own language, the History of his Nation, which Philo Biblius translated into Greeke. This Philo in the beginning of his Worke saith, That his Author, Sachoniathe, as hee was generally learned, so especiallie he searched out those things, which Taanus, called of the Egyptians Tboyth, of the Greekes Mercurus, the first inuenter of Letters, had written: hee also blamed those, that by Allegories and Tropologies peruert and obscure the Historie of their Gods; affirming plainly, That the auncient Phœnicians, Egyptians, and others adored those men for Gods, that had bene the Authors of good things to men, applying to them also the names of those Naturall Gods, the Sunne, Moone, &c. so making some Gods mortall, some Immortall. According to this Taanus therefore, the first beginnings of all things were a darke disordered Chaos, and the spirit of the darke aire. Hence proceeded Moth which wee may interpret Mire, from whence issued the seedes and generation of all creatures in the Earth and Heauen; The plants first, and from them the reasonable Creatures called Tbophasunin, that is, the beholders of Heauen, formed in the shape of an EGGE. From Moth also came the Sunne, Moone, and Startes. The Sunne by his heate separating these new-formed Creatures, their consist in the aire produced Thunder, which noyse awaked, and caused to leape out of their earth, this slimie generation; after of the Winde Calpis, and Baan (which signifieth Night) were borne men, named <sup>a</sup> Age and First-borne; Age, taught men to liue of the fruites of trees, of these came Kind and Generation, who beeing troubled with heate lifted vp their hands to the Sunne, which they tooke for a God, calling him Beelsamen (which signifieth the Lord of Heauen) whom the Greekes call Iupiter. Kind begate Light, Flame, Fire. This last by rubbing of stickes together found out fire: From these descended in succeding generations those Giants, that left their names to the hilles where they dwelt, Cassius and Libanus, that contended against their brother Vson, who first aduentured the sea in the bodies of trees burned, (in which manner the Indians, euen yet, make their canoes or boats) and hee erected two Statues to the Wind and the Fire, whom he adored with the blood of beasts.

These first men after their death had Statues consecrated to them by posteritie, and yearelie solemnities. To these succeeded others, Hunter, and Eisber, which had two Sonnes, one of which was named Chusor a great Magician: From these descended Amyus and Magus, Authors of Sheepecotes and flockes or herds of Castell. These were the Tyans, inuencers of Artes, hunking, fishing, building, yron-workes, tents, and such like. To Misor, one of these, was borne Taanus, first Authour of Letters. At that time was borne Elius, and Bernib his wife, which dwelt in Biblos, the Parents of Calus and Terra, (his wife and sister) who deified with rites and ceremonies their father Elius, being torne of wild beasts. To these were borne Saturne, Basilus, Dagon and Atlas,

But Calus taking other wiues, there arose a great quarrell betwixt him and his former, aided herein by by her sonnes: of whome Saturne the eldest, created Mercurie his Scribe, by whose Magicall Artes, and by those Weapons (first by him, and Minerua the daughter of Saturne deuised) Calus was ouerthrowne: who, after two and thirtie yeares warre betwixt them, was taken by his sonne, and deprived of his genitories.

Saturne had issue (besides his daughters Minerua and Proserpina) Amor, Cupido, Saturne, Iupiter Belus and Apollo, of his Sisters, Ascarte, Rhea, Dione. Then also were borne Typho, Nereus, Pontus, the Father of Neptune. Saturne suspecting his brother Atlas, buried him in the ground, and cast vp an high hill ouer him: where, not long after, was a Temple erected to him. Dagon was inuenter of Tillage, and therefore called <sup>b</sup> Iupiter of the Plough. But Saturne becomming a great Conquerour, bestowed Egypt on Taanus or Mercurie, who first made a mysterie of their Theologie, as the Sonne of one Thaion the Phœnician priest, first did among the Phœnicians; applying allegoricall interpretations thereof to Nature; and instituting rites to Posteritie. This allegoricall Theologie of Taanus was interpreted by Synmobolus and Thurro. It followeth in the Historie, That it was then a custome in great calamities, for the Prince to appease the angry Demon with his best beloued sonne

Some, and that (in the time of a perillous warre,) was Lud, the sonne of Saturne, by a Nymph, named Anahit, clothed in royall apparrell, offered on an Altar erected for that purpose. This was practised long after by the King of Moab, who being besieged by three Kings of Israel, Iuda, and Idumæa, sacrificed his eldest sonne: which yet some interprete of this eldest sonne of the King of Idumæa.

Tamuz ascribed Divinity to the Serpent, as being of a most sene and spirituall nature, mouing it selfe swiftly, and in many formes, without helpe of feet, and a creature which reneweth her age. The Phœnicians and Egyptians followed him herein, they calling it a happy Spirit or God, these, Enath; and stamped thereto the head of a Hawke: of which in his place we haue spoken. And thus farre haue wee benee indebted to Eusebius. In the time of those warres betwixt Sargon and Calus was borne Hercules: to whom was a Temple of great Antiquitie at Tyre. To Hercules were also celebrated games at Tyre, every five yeeres, to which Iason sent three hundred drammes for a sacrifice. Hiram in Salomons time pulled downe the old Temple of Hercules and Astarte, and built new. He first erected a statue to Hercules, and in the Temple of Iupiter consecrated a golden Pillar.

The Sydonians also worshipped Astarte in a stately and auncient Temple to her builded: to whome some interprete Luna, in some Venus, and one of her Priests, to Lucian, Europa. Shee was worshipped of the Phœnicians (a Phœnician colony) by that name of Iuno. But Philo Byblistensis saith it was Venus, which may bee all one: for Herodotus saith Vrania (which was also Iuno) was Venus; and Luna also after Lætan. And so it appeareth by her borne head, wherewith Philo saith shee was painted: the Arabians called her Ahlat, the Chaldeans Milista. Lucian saith, that he saw also at Biblos the Temple of Venus Biblica, wherein are celebrated the yere-ly rites of Adonis; (who they say, was slaine in their Countrey) with beariings and wofull lamentings; after which they performe Obsequies vnto him, and the next day they affirme him to bee aliue, and shauē their heads. And such women as will not bee shauē, must prostitute their bodies for one day vnto strangers, and the money hencee accreuing, is sacred to Venus. Some affirme that this ridiculous lamentation is made, not for Adonis, but Osiris; in witness whereof, a head made of Paper once a yere in seven daies space commeth swimming from Egypt to Byblos, and that without any humane direction: Of which Lucian reporteth himselfe an eye-witness. This is called the mourning for Tamuz, which Innius interpreteth Osiris, whence the fourth moneth (commonly their Haruest) is called Tamuz. For Ipsi which influenced these rites was their Ceres. Hierom interpreteth it Adonis: but it seemeth the difference is more in the name then the Idoll or rites. Women were the chiefe lamenters, if not the only, as Ezekiell testifieth, and the pronenesse of that sexe to teares, and to superstitious deuotion also (which they seeme to acknowledge, whose praying stile is pro denoto famineo sexu) likewise Ethonike Authors are witnesses. Plutarch saith, the women kept the Adonia, or feast of Adonis, euery where through the Cittie, setting forth images, obseruing exequies and lamentations. Ammianus reporteth of this featiuall solemnized at Antiochia, at the same time when Iulian entred the Cittie then filled with howlings and lamentings; and elsewhere, compareth the women which lamented the death of their young Prince, to the women which obserued the rites of Venus in the feasts of Adonis. Iulius Firmicus affirmeth that in most Citties of the East Adonis is mourned for, as the Husband of Venus, and both the smiter and the wound is shewed to the standers by. For Mars changed into the shape of a Bore, wounded him for the loue of Venus. Hee addeth, that on a certaine night they laye an Image in a bed, and number a set bead-roll of lamentations; which being ended, light is brought in, and then the Priest annoynerth the chappes of the Mourners, whispering these words. Trust in God for wee haue saluation or deliuerance, from our grieues. And so with ioy they take the Idoll out of the sepulchre. Was not this mourning, thinke wee, sport to the Deuill? especially when this Adonia was applyed vnto the buriall and resurrection of Christ, the Pagan whereof followed the Good-friday and Lenten fast of the Papists. Yet is this worse then the former, not only because Corruptio optima pessima, the best things by abusing are made worst; but also because the treason of Judas and Peters denial is proposed in adition to the peoples laughter, & inter tot sceleribus & impijs solus ubiustus est serius & fœnerus saith L. Vives, complaining of this great wickedness of the Priests (magna scelere atque impietate sacerdotum) but here and elsewhere often, when he telleth tales out of Schoole, the good mans tongue is shorned, and their Indax purgeth out that wherewith hee seeketh to purge their leaven. But let vs backe from Rome to Biblos: Hereby runneth the River Adonis also, which once a yeare becommeth red and bloudie: which alteration of the colour of the water, is the warning to that their Mourning for Adonis, who at that time they say is wounded in Libanus: whereas that redness ariseth indeed of the winds, which, at that time blowing violently, doe with their force carry downe alongst the streame a great quantitie of charred Earth or Mimum of Libanus whereby it passeth. This constancy of the wind might yet seeme as meruailous as the other, if diuers parts of the world did not yeeld vs instance of the like. In Libanus also was an ancient Temple dedicated to Venus by Cynirus.

Astarte or Astarte was worshipped in the formes of sheepe, not of the Sydonians onelic, but of the Philistines also, in whose Temple they hanged the armour of Saul. And wise Salomon was brought by doring on women to a worse dotage of Idolatrie with this Sydonian Idoll among others. And nor then first did the Israelites commit that fault, but from their first neighbour-hood with them, presently after the dayes of Iosua. This Sidon, the auncient Metropolis of the Phœnicians (now called Saito) in likelihood was built by Sidon, eldest Sonne of Canaan, and fell to the lot of Asber, whence it is called Great Sidon. It was famous for the first Glasse-shops, and destroyed by Ochus the Persian. This faire Mother yeelded the world a Daughter farre fairer; namely, Tyrus, now called Sur, (whose glorie is sufficiently blazed by the Prophets Esay, and Ezechiel) being situate in an Island seven hundred paces from the shore, to which Alexander in his siege vnited it; whome it held out eight moneths (as it had done Nabuchodonosor thirteene yeeres, which long siege is mentioned in Exec. 26. 7.) in nothing more famous, then for helping Salomon vnder Hiram their King, to build the Temple, a hundred fiftie five yeeres before the building of Carthage. This Hiram (as Iosephus reports it out of Dius a Phœnician Historiographer) enlarged the Citie, and compassed within the same the Temple of Iupiter Olympius, and (as hee addeth out of Menander Ephesus) therein placed a golden Pillar: he pulled downe the old temples and built new, and dedicated the temples of Hercules and Astarte. Ithobalus, Astartes priest slew Phelles the King, and vsurped the Crowne. He was great Grandfather to Pygmalion the brother of Dido, Founder of Carthage.

The Phœnicians, famous for Marchandise and Marrinership, sailed from the red Sea round about Africke, and returning by Hercules pillars, arriued againe in Egypt the third yeere after, reporting (that which Herodotus doubted of, and to vs makes the Storie inore credible) that they sailed to the South-ward of the Sunne: They were sent by Pharaoh Neco. Cadmus a Phœnician was the first Author of Letters also to the Greekes. At Tyrus was the fishing for purple: not farre off was Arad, a populous Towne, seated on a rocke in the sea, like Venice.

Alongst the shore is Ptolemais, neere which runneth the Riuer Belus, and nigh to it the Sepulchre of Memnon hauing hard by it, the space of a hundred cubites, yeelding a glasse sand: & how great a quantity soeuer is by ships carried thence, is suppli- ed by the Winds, which minister new sands to be by the nature of the place chaunged into glasse. That would seeme strange, if this were not yet stranger, that this new glasse if it be cast vpon the brinks of this place, receaueth the former nature of sand againe.

Belus and Hercules Tyrinus and the Sunne, called of them Helogabalus, were Phœnician Deities. Drusus is of opinion that diuers of these Phœnician idolls were deriued from names vsed in the Scriptures, so interpreting the words in 1. Mas. 3.

48. Taanets of the Phœnicians, and the Egyptian Tboth from Tbohu, and Baud from Bobu, Bel from Baal, as Beelsamem; also Astarte, Astareth, from the store of sacrifices offered to her. <sup>a</sup> Eusebius relateth other Phœnician abominations, both bloudie and beastly: the one in yearly sacrifice of the dearest pledges of Nature to Saturne: the other in that temple of Venus, built in the most secret retire of Libanus, where Sodomie (burned with fire from above, and drowned in a dead sea) seemed to revive: such was their practise of impure lusts; intemperately vsing the Naturall sexe, and vnaturally abusing their owne: worse in this then the Sodomites, that these intended sensualitie; they pretended Religion. Constantine raised these fabricks of Hell, and destroyed both the customes, statues, and temple it selfe. <sup>b</sup> Augustine saith, That the Phœnicians prostituted their daughters to Venus, before they married them. Of Moltanbor, Vfor, and other their gods (sometimes men) I forbear to speak. Alexander <sup>c</sup> ab Alexandro, affirmeth, That the preist of the sun in Phœnicia, was attired with slong sleeued garment, hanging down to the feet, and a golden Crowne. Wee may adde to these Phœnician superstitions, their mytheall interpretation by Macrobius. Hee expoundeth Venus and Adonis, to signifie the Earth and the Sun. The wild Boare which wounded Adonis, is the Winter, which for the absence of her Lover maketh the Earth to put on her mourning weedes (at whose approach she after putteth on her new apparell, saith our English Arcadian Oracle;) This was shadowed in a certaine Image in mount Libanus, portrayed in mourning habite. And to this sence he applyeth the Egyptian rites of Osiris and Isis, and of Orus, which is Apollo or the Sunne, and likewise the Phrygian mysteries of Atinis, and the mother of the Gods. He saith that they abstained from Swines flesh.

The Philistims and all that Sea-coast, by <sup>f</sup> Strabo and Plinie, and Dionysius (as is said) are reckoned to the Phœnician. Their originall is attributed to Misiram, whose posteritie the Cashims and Capstorsims chased the Atims, which formerly had inhabited Palestina, and by dint of sword purchased their Countrey. They had five principall Cities, Ascalon, Accaton, Azorus, Gath, Gaza. Of their sheephish Astarte yee heard euen now, and of their Legend of Dagon. Their superstitions the scripture often <sup>h</sup> mentioneth. What this Dagon was (saith <sup>i</sup> Martyr) is not well knowne. But by the deriuation of his name (which signifieth a fish) it seemeth hee was a Sea-god. For such Sea-deities had the Greekes and Latines, as Neptune, Lencothea, Triton: about his bellie hee was of humane shape, beneath like a fish. Such is Idolatry; diuine it will not be, it cannot content it selfe with humane, but proueth monstrous in the vglie and deformed Image, exhibiting the character of the true Authour of this falshood. When Cicero <sup>k</sup> saith, the Syrians worshipped a fish; it may bee construed of this Dagon. Happily (saith <sup>m</sup> Martyr) they intended Neptune, or I know not what Deuill. <sup>n</sup> Tremellius thinketh Triton. This may we see and say, when men are giuen ouer to themselues, then they become beasts, monsters, deuills: yea, worse then such, for while they worship such, they professe themselues (as Clients and Votaries) to be worse and baser then their Deities. Drusus deriueth not this Dagon of Dag a fish; but of Dagon, which signifieth Wheat, whereof Eusebius saith, Dagon invento frumento & arato vocatus est ἑὐκλειδης; & Philo Byblius, Dagon, ὁ ἀριστος that is, is called Wheat or Breadcome. But Scaliger <sup>o</sup> blameth Philo for that interpretation, and agreeth to that fish-deity: for Dagon (saith he) is one, and Dagan another. He addeth that they worshipped gods in the likeness of stones, which they called Betul or Baitul, whence came the fable of the stone giuen to Saturne in stead of his children, to be deuoured. This seemeth borrowed from Iacobs annoyning the stone at Bethel. Saturne had many names, Il, Israel, Malkom. The Tyrians worshipped his star, Amos 5. 26. not the planet Saturne, but Lucifer. They had their purifications in the midst of their gardens to Adad, of which is spoken before.

When the Philistims had placed the captiued Arke in Dagon's Temple, hee fell on his face before the Arke: But they placing him againe in his room, with a second fall, his head and hands were cut off vpon the threshold: The stumpes (or as Tremellius and Vatablus read it) Dagon, or that part of him which resembled a fish, remained.

And, therefore the Priests of DAGON, and all that come into DAGONS house, tread not on the threshold of DAGON. Thus true Religion, the more opposed, the more it flourisheth: the prison-house of her captivité is the throne of her Empire: blind superstition the more it is detested, the more enraged, addeth new devotion, to encrease (not caring to amend) the former.

Of Astaroth, wee have before shewed, why it is vied in the plurall number, as Ribera affirmeth for her many Idols, as wee say our Ladie of Walsingham, our Ladie of Loreto, &c. The word Aster signifieth a flocke of sheepe: and it is likely, this their Aster was in the forme of a Sheepe worshipped, as Iupiter Ammon in likenesse of a Ramme. Their Dagon, it seemeth (seeming wee have, no true being or being of truth, in Idols) was the same which Poets call Derceto or Dercetus, the mother of Semiramis, whose Image Lucian saith hee sawe in Phœnicia, not vnlike to that which is reported of the Mermayd, the vpper halfe like a woman, the lower like a fish: (therefore of Plinia called Prodigiosa) in reuerence of whome the Phœnicians were said to abstaine from fish. Authors doe also call this Idoll Atergatis and Athenais reporteth, That the Countrey-law of the Syrians deprivied them of fish: and that Gatis (a Syrian Queene) prohibited the eating of fish Ater Gatis, that is, without Gatis, without her licence, and therefore was called Atergatis, as a fore-staller of the fish to her owne delicate tooth. Mopsus, a Lydian, after drowned her in the lake of Ascalon, where this fish-devourer was of fishes deuoured. They yet esteemed her a Godesse, and offered vnto her fishes of gold and siluer: and the Priests all day long set before her true Fishes roasted and ioddens, which after themselves did eate; and it is not to bee doubted but the metall-mawes of those Ostriges could also digest the other.

Diodorus Siculus telleth, That hard by a lake full of fish, neere vnto Ascalon was a Temple dedicated to this Fish-woman: her Storie followeth, That shee yeelding to the lust of a young man, had by that copulation Semiramis, whome (now too late repenting of her follie, shee exposed on the rockes, where shee was nourished by Birds: of which Birds (called in their language Semiramis) shee receiued that name. The Shepheards after espying this hospitalitie of the Birds, found the child, and presented her to Simus the Kings Shepheard, who brought her vp as his owne daughter. The mother (not able to swallow her shame and griefe) cast her selfe into the lake to bee swallowed of the water, but there by a new Metamorphosis, was turned into a Fish, and hallowed for a Goddesse; and (for company) the fishes of that lake, and the Birds of that Rocke were canonized also in this deifying deuotion.

In Ascalon was a Temple of Apollo: and Herod Father of Antipater, & Grandfather to Herod the Great, hence called Ascalonita, was seruant to Apollo's Prieth. At Accaron was worshipped Baalzebub, that is, the Lord of Flies, either of contempt of his idolatrie, so called; or rather of the multitude of Flies, which attended the multitude of his sacrifices; or for that hee was their Larder-god (as the Roman Hercules) to drive away flies: or for that in forme of a Flie, in which he was worshipped, as Naxianzene against Iulian reporteth. Hee was called Symbius, and as some saye Myiodes and Myiagrus, howsoever one of these names commeth from Mice, and the other from Flies: such moufe-eaten, flie-blowne diuinity did they professe. Nec Muscam querent deum Accaron, saith Naxianzen, of this Baal or Beelzebub. The Arcadians sacrificed and prayed to Myiagrus, and by that meanes were freed from danger by Flies. Plinia reporteth, that at Olympian games, they sacrificed a Bull to Myiodes, which done, clouds of Flies departed out of that territorie. And in another place hee sheweth that the Cyrenians sacrificed to the God Achor (haply the God Accaron here mentioned) when the multitude of Flies caused a pestilence, all which Flies therevpon presently dyed. The Iewes in detestation of this Idoll tearmed him Beelzebub, that is, dung-hill, or dung-Iupiter. Yea Sealiger saith the name Beelzebub was in disgrace also, and that the Tyrians and Sydonians did not so call him, Baal or Belus, being a common surname to their Gods, which they they distinguished with some addition, as Iupiter was named Beelsamen a Lord of Heaven: but the Hebrewes (and not the Phœnicians) in contempt called him Beelzebub or fly-Lord. This was Iupiter Olympius. So Inno was entituled apasia or Heavenly. Shee was painted at Carthage sitting on a Lion with a Thunderbolt in her right hand, in her left a Scepter. But for Beelzebub hee was their Æsculapius or Physicke-god, as appeareth by Abaziah: who sent to consult with him in his sickness. And perhappes for this cause the blaspheming Pharisees, rather applied the name of this then any other Idoll to our blessed Saviour, to whome they saw indeede to performe miraculous cures, which superstitions had conceived of Baalzebub, and if any thing were done by that idoll, it could by no other cause, bee effected but by the Diuell, as tending (like the popish miracles) to the confirmation of Idolatrie.

What the deuill had at Beelzebubs Shrine to this end performed, blinded with rage and malice, they imputed to the miracles of Christ, which, in regard of the Efficients, were more excellent then could be Satans impostures, as countermaunding him and all his projects: for the matter, were merely supernaturall; in the Forme were acted by his will, signified by his naked word: and for the end (which is the onely touch-stone for vs to trie all miracles) were to seale no other truth then was contained (for substance) in the Law and the Prophets, which hee came not to destroy, but to fulfill. If an Angell from heauen, yea with heauenlie miracles, (if it were possible) should preach vnto vs otherwise, Paul biddeth vs to hold him accursed: and cursed be that deuill of Hell, that vnder colour of miracles (one of the Antichrists ensignes) * hath taught the World to worship the m Lipsian n Lauretan, and I know not what other Ladies: not that Virgin, on Earth holie, in Heauen glorious; but their idol-conceits, and idol-blockes of her. Our Lord hath taught vs plainlie in Matthew, to serue God onely, without sophisticall distinctions.

As for the Heathenish and Popish, and all those other packets of miracles, which we recieue by the Iesuites annuall relations from the East and West Indies; I esteeme them with Doctor Hall (a hall of Elegance, all-Elegance.) That they are either falsly reported, or falsly done, or falsly miraculous, or falsly ascribed to Heaven. But I know not how (pardon it Reader) I am transported to Hale, Zichem, and Loretto, from our Phœnician ports. The name of Beelzebub hath bene occasion of this parentthesis. But the power of Beelzebub (I feare) hath induced Bellarmino, to fall downe, and thus to worship him, for his purple aduancement. For amongst the Notes of the Church, he hath reckoned for one, this of miracles: Maius ipse miraculum, a greater miracle he, than now will not belieue without miracles that gospel, which at first was thereby sufficiently proued. We reade that the o Iewes seek for signes, and are therefore called, an euil and adulterous generation; and not onely false Christs and false Prophets, and Antichrist himselfe, but the heathens had their Legends of miracles: as the whole course of our History will shew, Goe now and reckon a Catalogue of miracles through all Ages, euen to the time of blessed Ignatius and his Society: and aske of vs miracles for prooffe of our doctrine. Our doctrine hath already by the Apostles and Prophets (Pen-men of holy Scriptures) bene proued that way; and wee leaue to you the stile of Mirabiliarij Miracle-mongers, which Augustine for like bragges of things miraculously wrought by them, giueth the Donatists. With vs, Miracles must be proued by the Truth and the Church, and not they by miracles. But let vs come backe to Phœnicia.

The Phœnicians are accounted first author of Arithmeticke and Astronomie; as also of the Art of Nauigation (Primaratem ventis credere docta Tyrus saith Tibullus) and obserued the North-starre to that Sea-skill. The Sidonians are reputed first authors of Weights and Measures. Herodotus affirmeth, That the Phœnicians, which came with Cadmus into Greece, taught the Græcians both other Sciences, and also Letters * which before that time they knew not. These letters afies chaunged their sound and forme, being by the Ioniks principally leaened, who called them Phœnicians, and called their Skinnies or Parchments biblos (haply of Byblos in Phœnicia.) saw the Cadmean letters engraven in a Temple at Thebes, much like the Ionike letters. * Scaliger hath given vs a view of the one and the other, the auncient Ionike, then the onely Greeke letters, but of certaine old inscriptions, much resembling the present Latine letters; and the auncienter Phœnician (I may say with him, the auncientest) vsed by the Canaanites and Hebrewes of old, and by the Samaritanes at this day: For those which the Iewes now vse, he affirmeth to be new, corrupted from the Syrian, and these from the Samaritan. His learned discourse thereof were worthe the reading, but here would be too prolix.

Hieronymus (I know not by what authoritie) saith that the Phœnicians before the Israelites departed out of Egypt, vsed Hieroglyphicall letters, which hee thinketh they learned of Abraham, the same which Seth and Henoch had vsed before. Moses (if ye belieue it) receiued the first Alphabetarie letters in the table of the decalogue: and from the Hebrewes the Phœnicians. Out of an old booke he citeth these verses which I thought not vnworthie the transcribing, concerning the first Authours and inventors of letters.

Mente Phœnices sagaci condiderunt Atticas:

He addeth also that the ancient learning which the Phœnicians had receiued from the Hebrewes and Caldees, passed into Europe by Cadmus who founded Thebes, and into Affrica by Elissa (after her selfe-inflicted death called Dido, i. Virago, a woman of resolution and courage) who fleeing Pigmalion first seased on the Iland Cothone, and 9. yeres after rooke Thasus, which the posteritie of Gomer had there built, which she called Karthada, that is halfe citie, because the one halfe thereof were Phœnicians: to which agreeth the testimony of Salustianus, that Carthage had in it Schooles of liberall Arts and Philosophie. He citeth Aristotles testimonie of Hog a Phœnician Philosopher, whome he thinketh to be that king of Bashan which Moses conquered. Dillys Cretensis (if his testimony bee authentical) testifieth that the Grecian Gallants which besieged Troy, chose Agamemnon for their Generall, writing his name in Punike letters. And this storie was also written in Punike letters, as the Interpreter affirmeth.

But how the posteritie of Letter-inuenters were by letters circumvented, it will not be an vnwelcome stratageme to our reader. When the Christian forces in the time of Ludovicus Crassus besieged Tyrus by sea and land, a Dove was seene to come flying, and deemed by expert men which had seene experience of the like, to carrie letters to the besieged: wherenpon a terrible shout was raised through the armie, which rent the aire with such violence, or else so amazed the felie Dove, that downe shee fell; They rooke her letter from her, wherein was contained that the Tyrians should be of good courage, and shortly reliefe should bee sent. This they rooke away and fastned another of contrary tenure to this swift Carrier, which presently conveyed the same to her home at Tyrus, and with her counterfeit newes caused the Tyrians to yeeld. Dionys. Alexandrinus called Tyrus tyrologus for the antiquitie.

Of the Phœnician kings here might be inserted a large Historie; but I feare tediousnesse. Their Catalogue is thus in Scaligers b Canons; first Abibatus, two yeares; Hierom, the sonne of Abibatus, 28. yeares; Bleazarus, 7; Abdestartus, 9; the Nurces sonne, 2; Astartus Dalanstri, 12; Asrymus, 9; Phetes, 8 moneths; Stobbaal, the Priest of Astarte, 32 yeares; Balezornus, 6; Margennus, 9; Pygmalion, 47. In his time Dido fled into Libya. A long time after this reigned another Stobbaal, 19. yeares; Baal, 10; and then Iudges ruled: Ecnibatus, 2. moneths; Helbes, 10. moneths; Abibatus, the high Priest, 11. moneths; Balator, 1. yere; Mysgonus and Gerestranus, 6; Mer-

CHAP. XVIII.

Of Palastina, and the first inhabitants thereof, the Sodomites, Idumeans, Moabites, Ammonites, and Canaanites, with others.

Phœnicia is stretched by some (as you haue read) euen to Aegypt, all alongst that Sea-coast, and in that respect partly, and partly because they obserued some neereneffe in Religion, I haue adioyned the Philistims to the Phœnicians: howbeit, others do confine Phœnicia betwixt the Riuer Valania and Mount Carmel. Thus hath Brocard written, and after him Maginus; who doe reckon vnto Palastina, a Brocard. de script. Terra sancta, Maginus Geog.

Galilza, Samaría, Judza, and Idumza, leauing out Phœnicia, bounded as aforesaid, to make a part of Syria by it selfe. Of this Region I purpose to make larger discourse in the next Chapter; heere intending to rake out of their dust the auncient Nations which inhabited this Land, before the Israelites were Lords thereof. The Sodomites sometimes inhabited a pleasant and fertile valley, watered by Jordan, which Moses compareth to the garden of the Lord, and the Land of Egypt, for pleasure and plenty. To the Sodomites I reckon also those other Cities partakers of the same fertilitie and vengeance, Gomorrha, Adma, Zeboim, and little Zoar, saued at the request of Lot. Their Kings and their Warres are mentioned, Gen. 14. Their wickednesse in many places of Scripture; which Ezechiel reduceth to these foure heads, Pride, Gloriousness, Idleness, and Crueltie, or hard-heartednesse. Their iudgement both Moses and others, and the place it selfe doe record. Their Religion was an irreligion, and prophane contempt of God and Man. Europe (I would I could not say England) can now yeeld the like: sauing that in our subtilie, and more warie age, Policie, haueing eaten vp Religion, hath with the bloud thereof dyed her cheekes, and would seeme more shamefast then those former Sodomites. Thus did Esay speake to the Princes of Sodome (in his time) and the people of Gomorrha, in respect of that their wickednesse, which suruiued them, and hath fructified vnto vs, among whom yet the Lord of Hosts (as with them) hath reserved a small remnant from this worse plague then Sodoms brimstone, a Reprobate sence. The difference betwixt ours and them is, that they were more open, ours more close, both in like height, but not in like weight of wickednesse; our darknesse excelling theirs both in the sinne, and in the punishment, in as much as a greater light hath shined, which we with-hold in vnrightheousnes. And if you will haue the maine character of difference betwixt these and those; the one are beastly Men; the other are Devils in the flesh.

First, from a sparke of Hell Concupiscence, (guided by Sensuall Lust, attended by Ease and Prosperitie, and further inflamed and blowne by the Deuill) an vnnatural fire, (which still beareth the name of Sodomie) was kindled, which gaue coales to a supernaturall flame, rained by the Lord in Brimstone and Fire from the Lord out of Heauen, and burning euen to Hell againe (the a and a of wickednesse) where they suffer (sayth Iude) the vengeance of eternall fire. This is written for our learning on whom the ends of the world are come, their ashes being made an example vnto them that shold after liue vngodly. Let not any obiect the Preacher here, and require quire the Historian, seeing that Historie builds not Castles in the ayre, but preacheth both ciuill and diuine knowledge by examples of the passed, vnto the present Ages. And why should not I preach this, which, not my calling alone, but the verie place it selfe exacteth?

They being dead, yet speake, and the place of their buriall, is a place to our memorie, being turned into a Sea (but a Dead Sea *) which couereth their sinnes, that it may discouer ours; which, as astonished at their vnnaturalnesse, hath forgotten her owne nature: It drowneth the Earth, which it should haue made (as whilome it did) fertile: it stayes it selfe with wonder and indignation, and falling in a dead swowne, sincketh downe with horreur, not weakened, not mooued vvith the windes blustering; refusing the light of the Sunne, the lappe of the Ocean, the commerce of Strangers, or familiaritie of her owne, and (as it happeneth in deepe passions) the colour goeth and commeth, changing three times euerie day: it gaspeth forth from her dying entrailes a stinking and noysome ayre, to the neere dwellers pestiferous, sometimes voyding (as it were excrements) both lighter ashes, and grosse Asphaltum: The neighbour fruites participate of this death, promising to the eye toothsome and wholesome fooode, performing onely smoake and ashes. And thus hath our G o d shewed himselfe a consuming fire, the Lord of anger, to whom vengeance belongeth; all Creatures mustering themselves in his fight, and saying at his first call to execution, Lo we are here. That vvhich I haue said of these miracles, still liuing in this Dead-Sea, is confirmed by testimonie of many <sup>b</sup> Authours. Brocard telleth of those Trees, vvith ashes growing vnder Engaddi, by this Sea; and a vapour, rising out of the Sea, which blasteth the neighbour-fruites; and the <sup>c</sup> slime-pittes on the brinckes of the Sea, which hee saw. Neither strangers nor her owne haue access there, where Fishes (the naturall inhabitants of the Waters) and Water-fowles (the most vsuall guests) haue no entertainment, and men, or other heauie bodies cannot sincke. Vespasian proued this experiment, by casting in some bound, vnskillfull of swimming, whom the waters (surfettted with swallowing her owne) spewed vp againe. This is mentioned by Aristotle <sup>d</sup> also, who saith that the saltnesse thereof is the cause why neither man nor beast (though bound) can sincke in it, nor any fish liue therein; which yet in the salt-sea we see otherwise. The Philosopher could see no further then reason, nor all that neither: but Moses guideth vs beyond Philosophie to diuine vengeance, which thus subuerted Nature, when men became vnnaturall. The Lake, Iosephus saith, is fise hundred and fourescore furlongs in length, (Plinie hath an hundred myles) the breadth, betweene sixe, and fise and twentie, myles. Strabo telleth of thirteene Cities still, (whereof Sodome was chiefe) of threescore furlongs compasse; whereof some were consumed by fire, or swallowed by Earth-quakes and sulphurous Waters, the rest forsaken: some Remainers (as bones of those carcasses) then in histime continuing. <sup>e</sup> Vertomannus saith, That there are the ruines of three Cities on the toppes of three Hilles: and that the Earth is without water, and barren, and (a greater miracle) hath a kinde of bloodie mixture, somewhat like red waxe, the depth of three or foure cubites. The ruines of the Cities are there seene still.

Idumæa lyeth Southward from Iudæa: it had name of Edom, the fir-name of Esaü, sonne of Isaak. The Historie of this people, and the Horites, whom the children of Esaü expelled, succeeding in their inheritance, is related by <sup>f</sup> Moses. It was subdued by Dauid, according to the Prophecie, The elder shall serue the younger. They rebelled vnder Ioram, the sonne of Iehosaphat; as Isaak had also prophesied. From that time they continued bitter enemies to the people of God, & till Hircanus, the sonne of Simon, compelled them to accept both the Iewish Dominion and Religion: after which they were reckoned amongst the Iewes. Of the Idumæans were the Amalekites, <sup>h</sup> destroyed by Saul. They were South from Juda, <sup>i</sup> Eliphaz, the Themanite, it seemeth, was of Esaü his generation, and of the right Religion. The Idumæans, Moabites, and Amonites, are by some placed in Arabia, of which I will not contend: I heere mention them, as both borderers and subiects to the Israelites; of which wee reade much in the Scripture; little else where that maketh to our purpose. South from Amalek was Kedar, a Countrey abounding with flockes of Sheepe and Goates. But I may not now dwell in the Tents of Kedar, till I come to the Israelites.

o On the East-side of the Lake of Sodome, is that Region which the Moabites (so often in Scripture mentioned) sometimes inhabited: and before them the Emims, which were Gyants, tall as the Anakims, Deut. 2. 10. The Moabites were the posteritie of Lot, by incest with his daughter. p Moab had on the East the Mountaines of Horeb; on the West the salt Sea, and part of Iordan; Arnon on the South, and the North border stretched from Iabbok to the Mountaines of Pisga. That part of their Countrey, betweene Iabbok and Arnon, Sihon King of the Amorites had taken from them; and lost againe to the Israelites. Balac their King fearing to lose the rest, sent for Balaam the Wizard to curse the Israelites; who yet, by Divine power, was forced to blesse them. Yet the lustre of Balacs promises so dazeled his eyes, that q hee taught Balac to put a stumbling-blocke before the Israelites, and by sending amongst them their women, to draw them to carnall and spirituall whoredome; so to prouoke the wrath of GODS ieaousie against them. But the zeale of Phineas stayed it; and Balaam, in his returne homeward to his Countrey of Mesopotamia, was slaine by the Israelites among the Madianites, pertakers with the Moabites in Balaams idolatrous proiect. These Madianites descended of Abraham, r by Keturah, and dwelt in a part of Arabia, neere to the Moabites, on the East. Some of them dwelt neere to Mount Sinai, Exodus 2. 15. and in the Desert, on the East-side of the Red Sea. Their mightie Armie was miraculously destroyed by s the Sword of the LORD, and Gedeon. The Moabites were subiects to Israel by David, and so continued to the Kings of Samaria, till, that State being rent, they freed themselves. It seemeth they worshipped the Sunne: as the names Kuchereseth, Beth-Baalmeon, and Balacs high places doe shew, and wee haue obserued before in the worshippe of Bel and Baal. Chemosh was another Idoll of theirs, to which Salomon built an high place. Pebor also, and Baal-pebor, and the rest, whose Rites are now rotten, and the memorie worne out.

In their Rebellion Against Iehoram King of Israel, hee and Iehoshaphat, King of Iuda, with the King or Vice-roy of Idumæa, went to recouer them by force. The Moabite, in despair, offered a bloudie Sacrifice of his eldest sonne and heire; or, as Tremellius readeth it, t The King of Edoms sonne: which caused the Israelites to returne. The Ammonites and Moabites might not enter into the Congregation of God, vnto the tenth Generation, because u they met not the Israelites with bread and water in their way, when they came out of Egypt, and for hiring Balaam against them. Arias Montanus saith, That the Moabites were circumcised in imitation of the Israelites, but worshipped nor their God, but their owne Idols.

x The Ammonites (their brethren in the euill both of Lot their father, and their owne) inhabited Northward from Moab; on the East were the Hills Acrabim; on the West the Amorite; the hills Luith Basan, &c. made it a valley. Their chiefe Citie was Rabbath, after called Philadelphia. These Ammonites had bene troublesome to the Israelites, in the times of y Iephthæ and of z Saul. And after, David in iust reuenge, for violating the Law of Nations, destroyed them. Moloch, or Melcham, was their Idoll, which is supposed a to be Saturne, whose bloudie butcherly sacrifices are before spoken of. It was a hollow Image (saith b Lyra) of Copper, in forme of a man. In the hollow concauitie was made a fire, with which the Idoll being heated, they put a child into his armes, and the Priests made such a noyse with their Timbrels, that the cries of the childe might not moue the parents to compassion, but they should rather thinke the chilles soule receiued of the God into rest and peace; others c adde, That this Moloch had seuen Roomes, Chambers, or Ambries therein; one for Meale;

Some interprete Moloch and Ramphan, Alt. 7. to be the Sunne and Moone. The Talmudish<sup>a</sup> would perswade men that they did not burne their children in this Moloch-sacrifice, but onely the father tooke his children and moued them to and fro thorow the fire, none otherwise then at this time on Saint Iohn Baptist's day, when the Sunne passeth thorow Canaan, children vse to leape thorow bone-fires. There was a valley neere Hierusalem (sometime possessed by the sonne of Hinnom) where the Hebrewes built a notorious high place to Moloch: it was on the East and South part of the Citie. It was also called Topheth, or Tymbrell, of that Tymbrell-Rite, which those Corribantes and bloudie Priestes did vse; or else for the spaciousnesse of it. <sup>e</sup> Jeremie prophecieth, That it should bee called the Valley of slaughter, because of the iudgements for the idolatrous high places in it. Vpon the pollution hereof, by slaughter and burials, it grew so execrable, that Hell inherited the same name, called Geheenna, of this place: first, of the lownesse, being a Valley: secondly, for the Fire, which heere the children, there the wicked, sustaine: thirdly, because all the filth was cast out of the Citie hither, it seemed they held some resemblance. The Ammonites also were (as Montanus affirmeth)<sup>f</sup> circumcised.

Canaan was the sonne of Cham, Father of many Nations, as <sup>f</sup> Moses declareth, Sidon and Heth, Iebusite, Emori, Girgashai, Hivvi, Arki, Sini, Arvadi, Zemari, Hamathi; the most of which were expelled their Countrey, slaine or made Tributarie by the Israelites. Their border was from Sidon to Gaza West, and on the East side from Sodome to Lasha or Callyrrhoe. <sup>g</sup> Arius Montanus is of opinion, that according to the number of the twelue Tribes of Israel, so were the people of Canaan: and therefore to those eleuen before rehearsed, he addeth their Father Canaan, who left his name to them all; and where hee liued, retained a part to himselfe, betweene the Philistims and Amorites. Of those his sonnes, Sidon, the eldest, inhabited the Sea-coast: and Eastward from him Heth, vnto the hill Gilboa: of him came the Hittites, Iebus went further, on the right-hand; Emor inhabited the mid-land Countrey Westward from the Iebusites. The Girgashite dwelt aboue the Hittite, next to Iordan, and the Lake Chinnereth (so called, because it resembleth the forme of a Harpe) after called Gennezareth. The Hevite or Hivite inhabited betweene the Amorite and the Philistim. The Arkite possessed the rootes of Libanus. The Sinite dwelt beyond the Hittite, Eastward; neerer to Iordan. Arvadi enioyed the Countrey next to the Wildernesse of Cades. Zemari obtained the Hills, called of him Semaraim. The Hamathite possessed the Countrey nigh to the Fountaines of Iordan. As for the most notable Mountaines and Cities, which each of these Families enioyed, they which will, may reade further in the same Author.

Of these and their ancient Religions and Polities we finde little or nothing but in the Scripture, where the Lord testifieth, that for their sinnes the Land spued them out. Some of them (as some thinke) fled into Africa: where Augustine<sup>h</sup> saith, that the Countrey people, inhabiting neere Hippon, called themselves in their Punicke Language Chanani.

Procopius, in the fourth booke of the Vandale Warre, affirmeth, That all the Sea-coast, in those times, from Sidon to Egypt, was called Phœnicia: and that when Ioshua inuaded them, they left their Countrey, and fled into Egypt, and there multiplied, pierced further into Africa; where they possessed all that Tract, vnto the Pillars of Hercules, speaking halfe Phœnician. They built the Citie Tingo or Tanger in Numidia, where were two pillars of white stone, placed neere to a great Fountaine, in which, in the Phœnician Tongue, was ingrauen: We are Canaanites, whom I O S H V A the Thesfe chased away. Which if it were so, the name of Hercules might therefore be ascribed to those Pillars, as accounted the chiefe Phœnician Idoll.

Philo <sup>i</sup> (or the Author of those fabulous Antiquities) saith, That the Israelites <sup>i Pseudo Philo, de Ant. Bib.</sup> found, among the Amorites, seven golden Images, called Nymphes, which, as Oracles, directed them in their affaires, and wrought wonders: the worke of Canaan, Phut, Selath, Nebroth, Elatb, Desuat, of admirable workmanship, yeelding light in the night, by vertue of certaine stones, which could not by mettall be broken, or pierced, or be consumed by fire, but must needs haue an Angell to burie them in the depth of the Sea, and there let them lie.

This people was not vtterly at once destroyed, but sometime, as in the dayes of Labin and Sisera, conquered their Conquerours, and retained some power and name of a people, till the times of Dauid, who destroyed the Iebusites, and dwelt in the Fort of Sion, calling it after his owne name, <sup>k Iud. 4. 2.</sup> <sup>l 2. And all the people that were left of the Amorites, Hittites,

Perizzites, Hivites, and Iebusites, whom the children of Israel were not able to destroy, those did Salomon make tributaries vnto this

FORM THE BEGINNING

THE SECOND BOOKE.

CHAP. I.

The Preface of this Booke: and a Description of the Region of Palestina, since called Iudaea, and now Terra Sancta.

IN the former booke we haue traced the foot-steps of Religion, following her in her wanderings from the truth, and her selfe through diuers Nations, till we came into this Land, sometime flowing with milke and honey, whose first inhabitants we last tooke view of. The Hebrewes were, by the Soueraigne Lord of all, made heires of their labours, and possessed both their place and wealth: Houses and Cities which they builded not, Vineyards which they planted not, and which is more, these were a type vnto them of the true and heavenly Countrey, which not by their merits, but by the meere mercie of the Promiser, they should enioy. These did God chuse out of all the kindreds of the earth, to make vnto himselfe a Kingdome of Priests, a holy Nation, and his chiefe treasure above all people, though all the earth be his: He made them the keepers <sup>b</sup> of his Oracles, bestowing on them <sup>c</sup> the Adoption, and the Glorie, and the Covenants, and the giuing of the Law, and the Service of God, and the promises: of whom were the Fathers, and of whom concerning the flesh Christ came, who is God ouer all, blessed for euer, Amen. These things were not onely communicated, but appropriated to them: <sup>d</sup> He shewed his word vnto Iacob, his statutes and his iudgements vnto Israel: He dealt not so with any Nation, neither had the beathen knowledge of his lawes: he was their prerogative, and they his peculiar: In <sup>e</sup> Iewry was God knowne, his name was great in Israel: In Salem was his Tabernacle, and his dwelling in Zion. And Christ himselfe ratified it, acknowledging himselfe <sup>f</sup> sent to the lost sheepe of the house of Israel, & a Minister of the Circumcision, and said to the Cananite woman which besought him for her daughter, It is not good to take the childrens bread, and to cast it to Dogges. Such, in spirituall reputation before God were all people, excluded (as vnclane Dogges) out of his heavenly Ierusalem, till this <sup>h</sup> partition wall was taken downe, and they which had bene farre off, were made neere by the blood of Christ, who abrogated: through his flesh that hatred, and made of twaine (Iewes and Gentiles) one new man in himselfe. So that the Gentiles (the name of all the world, excepting this people)

ple) which had been without Christ, and aliens from the Common-wealth of Israel, strangers from the covenants of promise, had no hope, and were without God in the world; were now no more strangers and forreiners, but Citizens with the Saints, and of the household of God; built upon the foundation of the Prophets and Apostles, Iesus Christ himselfe being the chiefe corner stone. Let it not be tedious to heare of this which the Angels reioyced to learne, <sup>h</sup> a Myserie which from the beginning of the world had bene hid in God: and unto principalities and powers in heavenly places, was made knowne by the Church. But the Word (whereby we haue fellowship in this myserie) came out of Sion, and the preaching began at Ierusalem. This (and not Rome) by the confession of Essensaus, a learned Papist*, was Emporium fidei Christianae, & Ecclesia mater: The mart of Christian faith, and mother of the Church. Yea, it was necessary that the word of God should first be spoken unto them, which they by incredulity put from themselves, and gave place to the Gentiles. <sup>k</sup> The fall of them became the riches of the world, and the diminishing of them the riches of the Gentiles, as a Glasse wherein we may behold the bountifulnesse and severitie of God, and in both the deepenesse of the riches of the wisdom and knowledge of God, whose iudgements are vnsearchable, and his wayes past finding out. I may fitly compare them to Gideons Fleece, which received the dew, when all the earth besides was drie, and after, it was drie vpon the Fleece onely, when the dew couered all the ground. Sometimes they alone receiued those dewes, showers, riuers seas of Saving bountie, and all the world besides was a parched Wildernesse. Now <sup>m</sup> he turneth the fruitfull land into barrennesse, for the wickednesse of the inhabitants; but that Wildernesse he turneth into pooles of water, and the drie land into water-springs. He bath<sup>n</sup> called them his people which were not his people, and her beloued which was not beloued; and where it was said, Ye are not my people, there they are now called the children of the living God. Thus hath he <sup>o</sup> shut vp all vnder vnbefeefe, that he might haue mercie vpon al, that his free election might appeare (not of workes, lest any should boast themselves, but) of grace. Behold therefore, all Atheists, and wonder! The Iewes branded with iudgement, wander ouer the world, the contempt of Nations, the skumme of people, the hissing, derision, and indignation of men, for refusing him whom they expect, denying him whom they challenge, hating him whose name is in life and death vnto them, the sweetest tune, and most melodious harmony; still wayting for, and glorying in that Messias, whom (vunknowne) they crucified and slew; and still pursue with the deadliest hatred in all his followers: God they please not, and are contrary to all men. Yet such is Gods manifold wisdom in his deepest iudgements, that his enemies shall fight for him, euen against themselves: the Midianites shall sheath their swords, which they haue drawne out against God, in their owne bowels, and Christian truth shall preuaile, and let our <sup>q</sup> enemies themselves be iudges. Out of their premisses which they maintaine, as earnestly as thou (O Atheist) securely deridest, which they will seale with that which thou makest thy heauen, thy God; wee will and doe conclude, against thee and them, that, in which, for which we will liue and die. Let the olde Testament yeelde the Proposition in prophecie, and the new Testament will Assume in Historie, and euen be thou the iudge, if that Reason, which thou hast as a man, and peruertest as a Diuell, will not by force of their Scriptures, which they preferre before their liues, necessarily in the Conclusion, demonstrate the Christian Truth. Neyther (I appeale vnto our common Reason) canst thou more wonder at vs for beleeuing, things in thy seeming incredible, absurd, and impossible, then at them (vpon such grounds which with vs they holde) not beleeuing.

For what beleue we, but, for the maine and chiefe points of our faith, are as plainly in their Euangelicall Prophets, as in our Propheticall Euangelists? All the Historie of Christ, in a more Diuine way, seemeth rather told then foretold, a Historie, not a Prophecie; as is easie by conference of both to shew, and thou, if thou beest not idle, or wilfully malicious, mayest finde. That then which thou seest come vpon them, a spirit of slumber, eyes that they should not see, and eares that they should not heare; which yet haue the light of the first Scriptures (had they not a veile over their heere) the same see in thy selfe, that when greater light doth offer it selfe, willingly shuttest thine eyes, as though there could be no light, because thou liu'st in, and louest thy darkenesse.

<sup>r</sup> The Iew is a witness against the Atheist, that we faine not those prophecies of Christ, seeing the Iew holdes the prophecies dearer then his blood, and yet hateth Christianity more deadly then the Atheist. Peior persecutor in Christianis quam Ethnicius, ait Hieron. in Abd. 1.

It is the same hand that giueth vp both thee and them, because yee will not beleue the Truth to be faued, to strong delusions, that ye might beleue lies, and be damned. To me, and all Christians; let the Iewes be both reall and verball teachers of the Truth, which they let fall, and we take vp; the one in their Oracles of sacred writ, the other in their exemplaric iudgement. And to them, Let (O thou Lord of all heare and grant it) let all Christians be that which Moses prophesied, a prouocation to emulation, not of enuie and hatred, which hitherto hath bene in these, amongst all the Christian enemies, the most implacable and despitefull, but of imitation, that as their casting away hath bene the reconciling of the world, their retaining may be life from the dead, which Paul seemeth plainly to fore-signifie.

THUS much being premised as a preparation to our Iewish Historie, which as of more importance then any other deserueth more ample view; let vs in the next place suruey that country which their progenitors had with those priuiledges, and their posteritie (together with those priuiledges) haue lost.

This country was first<sup>a</sup> called the Land of Canaan, after that the posteritie of Canaan, the sonne of Cham, had possessed it. <sup>b</sup> Moses and Ioshua conquered it to the posteritie of Iacob, of whom it was called the Land of Israel: after the diuision of the tenne Tribes from the house of Dauid by Ieroboam, in the time of Rehoboam the sonne of Salomon, the name of Israel was more particularly appropriated to those ten rebellious Tribes, and the other two were knowne by the name of the Kingdome of Iuda. Yet Israel remained in a generall sense the name of them all, especially in the new Testament. Paul of the Tribe of Beniamine calleth himselfe an Israelite, and all Israel, saith he in that Chapter, shall be saued. After the Babylonian captiuitie they were called Iewes, of the chiefe and royall Tribe, and their countrey Iudæa: It was also called Palæstina, of the Philistims, which inhabited the Sea-coast. And after in the times of the Christians it was generally called the Holy-Land Phœnicia also being vnder that name comprehended. It is situated betweene the Mediteranean Sea, and the Arabian Mountaines, Ptolemy calleth it Palestina Syria and Iudæa, abutting it on the North with Syria, on the East and South with Arabia Petræa, on the West with part of Egypt, and the Sea. Adrichomius, who hath bestowed a large volume on this subiect, which he calleth the Theater of the Holy-Land, on the East confineth it with Syria and Arabia; on the South the desert Pharan, and Egypt; on the North Mount Libanus; on the West, the Sea. Maginus placeth a part of Phœnicia on the North; on the North-east Libanus; on the South, and part of the East, Arabia; on the West, part of the Mediteranean Sea. It is extended from the South to the North, from the one and thirtieth degree, to the three and thirtieth, and somewhat more. Others set it downe in other words; but these and they agree for the most part in substance. It is commonly holden<sup>c</sup> to be an hundred and sixtie Italian Miles in length from Dan to Bersabee, and sixtie in breadth. An exact diuision thereof into twelue shires or shares, Ioshua setteth downe at large, with their bounds and Cities, from the thirteenth Chapter of that booke, to the one and twentieth as they were by lot and diuine dispensation allotted to the twelue Tribes, the posteritie of Iacob twelve sonnes; onely Ephraim and Manasses, the sonnes of Ioseph, constituted two Tribes, and therefore had the double portion, descending of Iacobs eldest sonne, by Rachel his first intended wfe: and Leui had no portion, but was scattered in Israel, to keepe Israel from scattering, and to vnite them in one Religion to one God, who disposed that curse into a blessing.

Ruben, Gad, and halfe the Tribe of Manasses, had their portion on the East side of Iordan: the other halfe of Manasses, with Simeon, Iuda, Beniamin, Ephraim, Naphthali, Asser, Dan, Issachar, Zabulon, had their portions assigned betwixt Iordan and the Western Sea. They which would be fully acquainted with their seuerall diuisions may finde in Ioshua himselfe to satisfie them, and in the Commentaries which Andreas Masius, and others haue written on that Scripture. Laicstaine, More, Stella, Adrichomius and Arias Montanus haue in Maps presented them to the eye. Neyther in the whole world beside is there (I think) found any region hauing more Cities in so small a space, then this sometime had, except we beleue that which is told of the thousands of<sup>b</sup> Egypt. d Plin. lib. 5.

And first let me dip my penne in Iordan. This, saith Pliny, is a pleasant riuer, and as farre as the situation of places will permit, ambitiously; prodigally imparting it selfe to the inhabitants, and (as it were vnwilling) passeth to that cursed Lake Asphaltites, of which at last it is drunke vp, losing his laudable waters, mixed with those pestilent. As soone therefore as the valleyes giue opportunity, it spreadeth it selfe into a Lake called Genesara, sixteene miles long, and sixe broad, enuironed with pleasant Townes; Iulias and Hippo on the East; on the South, Tarichea; and Tiberias on the West, made wholesome with his hote waters. The fountaines of this Riuer are two, called Ior, and Dan, which compounding their streames, do also compound their names, as Tame and Isis with vs bring forth (happy parents) our Tames or Thamisis. Here was the Cittie Dan, so called of the Danites, before Laish Jud. 18. 29. and Leshem, Ios. 19. 47. But before this time both the Riuer had the same name, Iordan, and the place it selfe at the foot of Libanus, whence the fountain springeth was called Dan, Gen. 14. 14. When Moses wrote; except we beleue Mafius, that the Pentateuch and other Scriptures were by Esra after the captiuitie digested into that forme with those names which we now haue. Here was after built Cæsarea Paneadis, called afterward of Philipp the Tetrach Cæsarea Philippi, and after that by Agrippa, Neronia. This ioyning of Ior and Dan is the beginning of the apparant streame: but the true and first conception of it is in Phiale, one hundred and twenty furlongs from Cæsarea, a fountaine of vnsearchable depth, whi h yet (like some miserable Churle) alwayes containeth the waters in it selfe, till sinking, and as it were buried in the earth, those treasures being by Natures stealth conveyed vnder ground vnto Dan or Panæus, who is liberall of that vsurers wealth (for into that Phiale poure as much as you will, it neuer increaseth or decreaseth) and thence it becommeth a Riuer. Philipp the Tetrach of Trachonitis, by casting chaffe therein, which was paid him againe at Dan, first found out this vnder-earth passage. The Saracens call that Phiale, in this respect Medan, that is, the waters of Dan. Before it maketh the Lake of Genesareth, it maketh another called Samachonitis. This is especially filled, when the snowes on Libanus are melted, which causeth Iordan then to swell, and ouer-flow his bankes, in the first moneth, yearely (and made the miracle in Ioshuas passage thorow it the more miraculous) but in Summer it is almost drien vp; and by reason of that matter which therein groweth is a harbour for wilde beasts. It is called the waters of Meron, halfe-way betweene Cæsarea Philippi, where the marriage betweene Ior and Dan is solemnized, and the Lake of Genesareth. Elias, and after his assumption, his cloake, diuided these streames: Naamans leprosie was here cleansed; and a greater Leprosie then Naamans is daily cleansed in the Church by the lauer of Regeneration, first sanctified to that vse in this streame, where the holy Trinity did first yeelde it selfe in sensible apparition to the world, thereby to consecrate that Baptisme, wherby we are consecrated to this blessed Trinity, the Father, Sonne and Holy Ghost. In which respect Pilgrimes in memory therof, do still wash themselves in this Riuer, sporting themselues further (I feare) by this washing with some myre of superstition.

I cannot blame this sacred streame, if it seeme loath, as Pliny saith, to leaue so fertile a country, and lingereth as long as it may in lakes by the way, not onely for that salt Sea or hellish lake, which shutteth vp his guiltlesse waues in perpetuall imprisonment, but also for those pleasures in the passage the fruits of the earth without exaction freely yeelded, as Roses, Sage, Rue, &c. of the trees, in Oliues, Figs, Pomegranats, Dates, and Vines

Vines (which last the Mahumetan superstition doth not cherish, and the Westerne Christians did so husband, that one Vine * by their arte and industrie, yeelded three Vintages in August, September, October.) The * grapes of Eschol, which could lade two men with one cluster, were not so famous as the Balmé of Gilead <sup>b</sup>, which the * first Marchants we read of, from that Mart, vented to other parts of the world. These Balmé-trees grew in the Vale of Iericho, which being cut, yeelded this precious liquor; whereof, besides the admirable effects in cures, other wonders are told by ancient and later Writers, too long here to relate. Belonius <sup>d</sup> will doe it for me, if any list to read his Observations. He is not of their minde, which thinke there is now no true Balsam in the world (these in Iudza being perished) but thinketh in Arabia-Fœlix it groweth naturally, from whence some shrubs he saw in Cairo <sup>e</sup>. But I should bee too tedious if I should insist on this argument: That instance of such a world of people, in such a parch of the world, doth sufficiently declare the fertilitie, when as David <sup>f</sup> numbred them, 1 100000. Israelites, and of Iuda, 470000. or as in 2. Sam. 24. 9. 500000. which drew sword; and yet Beniamin and Leui were not reckoned in this number: and in the dayes of Ieroboam, & Abiya King of Iuda, brought into the field 400000. and Ieroboam 800000. and on this part were slaine in one battell 500000. all choice men; which Historie cannot be matched with the like in all ages and places of the world: that a Countrie, an hundred and sixtie miles long, and not aboue sixtie in breadth, should nourish at once, or lose in a battell such multitudes, not to speake of impotent persons, women and children. But this multitude by ciuill warres and inuasions of enemies decreased, till first the reliques of Israel, and after, the remnant of Iuda, were by the Assyrians, and Babylonians led captiue, and the Land enjoyed her Sabbaths.

For the Kingdome of Israel consisting of ten Tribes, (some reckon Simeon also to Iuda, because of his portion mixed with Iudæes, as Beniamin was adioyning thereto, to whom the Leuites <sup>b</sup> likewise, and Priests forsaking their Cities, and all the religious Israelites annexed themselves) forsooke <sup>i</sup> not the house of David only, but the house of the Lord, and set them vp Calues (Egyptian superstitions) at Dan and Bethel, and made Priests for their Idolatrous purpose. This their rebellion and Apostasie God plagued with ciuill dissension and forren hostilitie, vntil at last the Assyrians <sup>k</sup> remoued them altogether, and repeopled those parts with new Colonies. Such is the end of Religion, which hath not God for the beginning, but is grounded on humane policie, a sandie foundation. Iuda could not take warning, but prouoking God by Idolatrous courses, at last was carried to Babel, and thence, after seuentie yeares, returned. The Historie of these things, so fully related in Scripture, I should but marre in the telling.

After this their returne the Land was not, as before, named after the portions of the seuerall Tribes: but was called by a generall name, <sup>l</sup> Iudæa, and the people Iewes, because the Tribe of Iuda had before inhabited those parts, or at least the principall of them, dilating themselves further, as they increased in number and power. But more especially Iudza was the name of one <sup>m</sup> third part of the Countrie, by that name distinguished from the other two, Samaria, and Galilea, which two last are sometimes referred to Phœnicia.

Galilæa was the most Northerly, confining on Libanus and Antilibanus toward the North, Phœnicia Westerly, Cœlesyria on the East; and Samaria, with Arabia, inclosing her Southerly borders, Jordan parteth it in the midst. It was diuided into the higher and lower Galilee: the higher called also Galilee of the Gentiles, containeth the Springs of Jordan, and those Cities which Salomon gaue to Hiram. The lower was also called Galilee of Tiberias, that Citie giuing name both to the Lake and Region: in which Nazareth was famous, and the hill Thabor.

Samaria is seated betwixt Galilee and Iudza, much lesse then either of them. Iudza is the most Southerly, betweene the Mediterranean and Dead Seas, Samaria, and Idumea, Plinie <sup>n</sup> maketh Galilæa a part of it, and Perza another part, separated from the rest by Jordan. The rest he diuideth into ten Toparchies; Ierico, Emsas, Lidda, Ioppe, Acra, Barena, Gophnitica, Thamninitica, Betholene, Tephene, Orine, in which was Ierusalem farre the fairest of the Cities of the East, not of Iudza alone: Herodium, with a famous famous Towne of the same name. He addeth vnto these the Region of Decapolis, so called of the number of the Townes, and the Tetrarchies; Trachonitis, Paneas, Abila, Arca, Ampeloessa, Gabe. Those ten Townes of Decapolis were Cæsarea, Philippi, Asor, Cedes, Neptalim, Sephet, Corozain, Capharnaum, Bethsaida, Iotapata, Tiberias, and Bethsan, otherwise called Scythopolis, and before Nysa, where Bacchus buried his Nurse. But these are parts of those former parts aboue mentioned; and so may we say of the rest, sustayning, in diuers respects, diuers diuisions, best fitting to the present politics, and little to our purpose.

Those things which of old were famous in those places, are mentioned in the Scripture: Those things which since haue beene more remarkable; I purpose in the next part of this Worke, of Christian Religions, to handle, and especially the rarities of Ierusalem, sometimes the holy Citie, and Citie of the great King, now a Den of Thieves; a habitation of Mahumetans, or rather now not at all: for this which is now, is a new Citie, called by the Founder * Ælia Capitolina, built by Ælius Adrianus, who caused the plough to passe through, and salt to be sowne in the old, as testifying her eternall desolation, and fulfilling Christs prophetic to the ymost, not leauing a stone vpon a stone, if Titus had not fully accomplished the same before. Arius Montanus in his Nebemias affirmeth, that Ierusalem was founded on three Hills; to wit, Sion, on which the Iebusites built their Tower; and which in *Dauid*s time was further builded on, and called the Citie of Dauid. The second Hill was Mount Moriah, which Dauid bought of Aranna, to erect thereon the Temple. The third was the higher Acra, called the Suburbe. These were compassed with one wall without; and within diuided with three walls, by which the Citie of Dauid, and Moriah, and the higher Acra were seuered. In the circuit of the walls were nine gates. Hee that desireth further to reade, or rather to see the old Ierusalem, with her holy Fabriques, let him resort to Arius Montanus his Antiquitates Iudaica, where he both relateth, and in figures presenteth these things. It is supposed that Melchisedech built it about the yeare of the World 2023. and called it Salem. Hierome in his 129. Epistle hath these wordes: Ipsa Metropolis tua prius Iebus, postea salem, tertio Hierosolyma, et nunc Ælia; As if it were called Iebus before it had the name of Salem, which is not so probable. The Kings thereof were anciently called Melchizedek, or Adami-zedek, that is, Kings or Lords of iustice; or of Zedek, which some will haue the first name thereof, and Salem the second; this signifieth Peace, Righteousnesse b indeede and peace did here kisse each other, when the c Lord our righteousnesse here preached peace and was made our peace, and righteousnesse the true Melchizedek whose Kingdom d is righteousnesse, peace, and ioy in the holy Ghost. It was after called Ierusalem by addition of the word Iereb, as some thinke, to the former name Salem. For so it is said of Abraham e when God tried his obedience in here offering his sonne, he called the place Iehoua-iereb, the Lord will provide, from which and Salem by composition ariseth this name, so fitting both the Citie and myserie. Iosephus f saith it was first called Solyms, and by Melchisedech named Hierosolyma of a Temple by him there built; as if israhel had beene the language of Ierusalem: elsewhere g he attributeth it to Dauid, from an Hebrew deriuation, which and other like Etymologies haue caused Masius h to pronounce him ignorant of the Hebrew, and educated only in the Greeke; as Scaliger somewhere affirmeth of Philo his companion in Nation, learning, and in that Grecian eloquence wherein they neuer had Companions, neither of their owne, nor scarce of any other Nation. The Iebusites after possessed (and of them some deriue the name Ierusalem, quasi Iebussalem) till Dauid expelled them: who had before reigned in Hebron (called Cariatharbe, the Citie of foure men, say some, because of Adam, Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob, both dwelling and buriall there; yet Adam, others say, was buried in mount Caluarie, with others speculations curious and vncertaine.) Hee translated the highest seat both of spirituall and temporall Regiment to Ierusalem, where he reigned after, three and thirtie yeeres; to whom succeeded Salomon, and the rest in order. It then contayned in circuit fiftie furlongs, compassed with a great ditch threescore foot deepe, and two hundred and fiftie broad. Nabuchodonosor destroyeth it, Nebemias reedified it, three and thirtie furlongs in circuit: The Machabees, Herod, and others, added to her excellence, till Titus be sieged ged and tooke it; in which siege are said to haue perished 1700000. people; and being now a sepulchre of dead carcases, was made a spectacle of diuine vengeance, for murthering the Lord of Life. But those struggling spirits, and small remnants of life which remayned in this forlorne carcasle of the sometime Ierusalem, breathed a new rebellion, in the time of Adrian, and thereby breathed her last, as before is said. Bernard de Breidenbach saith, hee neuer saw any place which had a fairer prospect then Ierusalem, presenting to the eye Arabia, the Plaine of Iericho, and the Dead Sea. The Saracens haue therein the Temple of Salomon, or as they call it, the holy Rock; for in the midst thereof is a little Rock, grated about with yron, whereto they come from farre in Pilgrimage, yet dare not touch it for the holinesse. For on this did Melchisedech offer; Isaac slept when he dreamed of the Ladder; David saw the Angell with the sword; Isaiah inclosed in it the Arke, which still (as some thinke) continueth therein. And a world of wonders they tell you thereof. Our Author had like to haue bene slaine with his Associates for offering to enter this Temple. There were alway kept burning therein 700. lamps: it was round and couered with lead. Another Temple he saw there, which sometime had bene called Salomons Porth, after that, the Church of St. Marie wherein the Saracens kept burning 800. lamps, vnder which was a vault, which had roome sufficient for 600. horse. Ludolphus Susebensijs telleth, that in his time about the yeare 1336. some Greekes which had entred that Church of the holy Rock, were put to their choice either to turne Saracen or to die: but they remayning constant were cut a-sunder in the midst. But what doe wee now in Asia or the now Ierusalem: whose rarities the iournals of many* testifie. Concerning the former, The Historie of this Citie the Scripture hath recorded; and where Diuine Historie endeth, Iosephus and Hegesippus (that I speake not of late Writers) haue largely supplied, especially concerning her latest fates, and as I may terme it, in her funerall Sermon. <sup>b</sup> Strabo, Iustine, and others, haue written of this people, but not sincerely. But the fountaines are cleare enough to acquaint vs with their true originall, which commeth next to be considered.

Of the Hebrew Patriarkes, and their Religion before the Law: also of their Law and Politie.

HHe name of Hebrewes some deriue from Abraham, as if they were called Hebrai quasi Abrahæi. Arias Montanus<sup>c</sup> telleth vs, that this name of Hebrewes was not appropriate to any familie, but common to all such, as hauing passed ouer the Riuer Euphrates fixed their Tents, and abode betweene that Riuer and the great Sea. He gathereth this from the Hebrew word<sup>a</sup>, which signifieth to passe ouer. Such an one first of all was Heber, seeking a life answerable to his name: whose example (saith he) Thare imitated: and after, Abram for his twofold transmigration from Chaldaea, and from Haran, deserued that name, and left it to his posteritie. But <sup>e</sup> Iosephus, <sup>f</sup> Augustine, and others, more fitly (in my minde) of Heber the fourth from Shera, the sonne of Noah, with whose familie, as we haue said, continued the ancient language of the world, called of his name, Hebrew: his sonne Peleg or Phaleg, bearing the name of that diuision, which at the time of his birth the rest of the world in their languages sustayned. This Peleg was grand-father to Serug, whom some affirme to haue bene the first maker of Idols, which were afterwards worshipped by Nabor his sonne, and Thare his Nephew, the father of Abram, who preached openly that there was but one God, Creator and Governour of all things; and by this doctrine prouoking the Chaldeans against him, warned by Oracle, departed towards Canaan.

<sup>b</sup> Bellarmine so eagerly swalloweth this opinion, that he taxeth Caluin of heresie, for attributing to Abraham the contrarie; namely, that Abraham, before God called him out of Ur; was an Idolater: an opinion so much more probable, then the other, as ha-

uing better authoritie. For Ioshua * obieſteth to the Iſraelites their fore-fathers Idolatrie, and nameth Abraham amongſt them. And Genebrard <sup>a</sup> doth ſo interpret it; and Maſius <sup>b</sup> in his Commentaries on that place, both zealous and learned Papiſts: yea Lindanus <sup>c</sup> ſpeciſieth the Idolatrie, and calleth him a worſhipper of Veſta. <sup>d</sup> Suidas ſaith, that Abraham by the obſervation of the Creatures in his ſtudie of Aſtronomie, liſted vp his minde aboute the ſtarres, and by the glorie, and order of them, learned the knowledge of God, neuer ceaſing that Diuine ſearch, till God appeared to him. Which opinion may reconcile both the former: that firſt hee was, and after ceaſed to be, an Idolater, before God appeared in viſion to him. He alledgeth Philo for his Author, that as ſourteeene yeares Abraham reprobued Thara for ſeducing men vnto Idolatrie (moued by his priuate lucre) with Images: and ſeeing the Heauen ſomtime cleare, ſometime clowdie, he gathered, that that could not be God. The like he concluded of the Sunne, and Moone, by their Eclipſes (for his father had taught him Aſtronomie.) At laſt God appeared, and bad him leaue his countrie. Whereupon hee tooke his Fathers Images, who (as before is ſaid) was an Image-maker, and partly broke, partly burnt them, and then departed. Suidas further thinketh him the firſt inuenter of Letters, of the Hebrew tongue, and of the interpretation of dreames; which I leaue to the Authors credit. But for the fault of Abraham before his calling, & other blemiſhes after, in him and the reſt of the Patriarkes; what <sup>e</sup> doe they elie, but in the abounding of mans ſinne, ſet out the ſuperabounding grace of God? and are profitable, as learned Morton <sup>f</sup> in his anſwere of this cauill, bath out of one of their owne ſ obſerued againſt them, what he had obſerued out of Auguſtine, to theſe ſoure purpoſes: Faith, Inſtruction, Fear, and Hope: the Faith of the Hiſtorie which flattereth, or conſealeth the faults of none: Inſtruction to vertue, by ſeeing others faults taxed: Fear, for what ſhall ſhrubs doe, if Cedars fall? and Hope, that we imitate their repentance, by ſeeing their pardon.

But to returne to our Hiſtorie. Many of the Ethnike hiſtories mention him: Berosus commendeth him for his iuſtice, and ſkill in Aſtronomie. Nic. Damascenus ſaith, that he reigned at Damascus, and that in his time, his houſe continued in Damascus, and was ſtill called by his name: Hecataeus wrote a booke of him; and Alexander Polyhiſtor telleth that hee was borne in the tenth generation after the flood in Carrprine (or Vrien) a Citie of Babylon. Iosephus <sup>h</sup> addeth, that when famine draue him into Egypt <sup>i</sup>, he diſputed with the Priests, and moſt learned Egyptians, in queſtions of Diuinitie; and in their diuided ſects, hauing confuted one by another, he communicated to them the truth, both in this, and in Arithmetike and Aſtronomie, whereof before the Egyptians were ignorant. Abram (ſaith Maſter Broughton in his Conſent) was borne ſixue yeeres later then the common account; as appeareth <sup>k</sup> by computation of Terahs Age, who died at two hundred and ſiue yeeres, and after his death Abraham went from Charan into Canaan, the threeſcore and fifteenth yeere of his owne life; and therefore was borne in the hundred and thirtieth, and not in the ſeuentieth yeere of his Father, in the 352. yeere after the flood; whereas the common opinion reckoneth the 292. To Abraham God had giuen commandement, ſaying: Go from thy Countrie, and from thy Kindred, and from thy fathers houſe into the Land which I ſhall ſhew thee, and I will make of thee a great Nation, &c.

His Hiſtorie is fully related by Moses, and his progenie alſo; whereof Iſmael his Sonne by Agar, and other his ſonnes which he had by Keturah his ſecond wife, he ſent to inhabite the Eaſt Countrie (Arabia) in his life-time: but Iſaac was made his Heire, both Temporall and Spirituall: to whom Iacob ſucceeded in the promiſed bleſſing: who with his ſonnes and familie went downe into Egypt, where his poſteritie multiplied exceedingly, and were called ſometime Ebreweſ of their ancient pedigree; ſometime Iſraelites, of the name Iſrael, giuen to Iacob by the Angell, Gen. 32. 28. Their whole Hiſtorie ſo largely and plainely in holy Writ recorded, I feare to make <sup>m</sup> Mim, by euill reciting: Thoſe Fountaines are more open to all, then that any ſhould neede ours, or others Brookes. mixed with ſome myrie earth (at leaſt) in the paſſage: (and my intent is to bee laſteſt in relation of thoſe things which are not in the Scriptures; only touching thoſe things briefly for order ſake.) Their Religion, meane while, was the beſt best amongst the best, though stayned in some, as Rachel, which stole her Father Labans Idols; and Jacob was forced after to reforme his Familie in this respect; and after in Egypt they were corrupted with the Egyptian superstition, as Ezechiel protests against them. The manner of Diuine worship was not so straitly limited, as afterwards to persons and places. By Reuelation and Tradition they receiued the religious worship; wherein they instructed their posteritie: vntill that in their extreamest thralldome God sent Moses and Aaron to deliuer them: vnder whose conduct they passed through the Sea and Wildernesse to the brinks of Iordan, receiuing in the way that Law, which as a Tutor, or Shooe-master, was in that their nonage to traine them vp, vntill that full and ripe age; when God sent his Sonne made of a Woman, made vnder the Law, that he might redeeme them that were vnder the Law, that we might receiue the adoption of Sonnes. Of this Law, although Moses hath giuen vs an absolute relation in the Scripture, whereof hee was the first Pen-man (of that at least which remaineth vnto vs) yet if wee shall out of him, bring them into their order, and ranke them vnder their severall heads, as Sigonius and others haue done; it shall not bee, I thinke, ouer-tedious to the Reader.

The Law is diuided vsually, into the Morall, Ceremoniall, and Iudiciall, as parts of the same: the first deliuered on the Mount Sinai, by the dreadfull voice of the Almighty God, and by the finger of God, written after in Tables of stone, called ten words; summarily abridged into two Commandements, by the Law giuer himselfe; The first and great Commandement enioyning the loue of God; the second, of our NEIGHBOURS; that God, who himselfe is Charitie, imposing nothing but the louely yoke of Loue and Charitie vnto his seruants. This Law is Eternall, written first in the hearts of our first Parents, which being defaced, it was written againe in the stonie Tables of the Law, where it was but a killing letter, till Grace and Truth by IESVS CHRIST indited and indented it in the fleshie Tables of the Gospell, as Christs new Commandement written in renewed hearts, and shall for euer bee then grauen in those spirituell Tables, when wee that heere are Naturall men; shall rise againe Spirituall men; and shall bee the Law of that holy Citie, the new Ierusalem; this being then perfected, when Faith, and Hope, and this World shall bee finished. The other parts Ceremoniall and Iudiciall, were (for the particulars) proper vnto that Nation, the one respecting the manner of Diuine seruice, the other of ciuill Gouvernement: not giuen (as the other) immediately to the Israelites by God himselfe, but communicated in the Mount to Moses; that hee might acquaint the people withall.

This Nation was diuided, as is said already, into Tribes, according to the number of Jacobs sons, amongst whom Leui had no portion (but the Lord was their portion, they seruing at the Altar, and liuing of the Altar) but 48. Cities with their suburbs assigned for their habitation, amongst other Tribes, that being so dispersed, they might disperse also, and preach the Law to the rest; and were reckoned to that Tribe with which they dwelled: and whereas others might not marrie, for feare of alienation of their inheritances, into another Tribe, this of Leui either had, or tooke liberty herein, as Iudg. 19. and 2. Chro. 22. Tosada married the Kings sister; and thus Elizabeth, wife of Zacharie the Priest, might be Cosen to Marie the Mother of our Lord. The number of twelue remaind yet entire; in reckoning of these Tribes, because Ioseph had a double portion, and his sonnes, Ephraim and Manasses, made two Tribes. Neither were they alone reckoned Israelites, that naturally descended from some one of these twelue sons of Israel, but such also of other Nations as embraced their Ceremonies and Religion, being for distinction sake called Profelytes, The Hebrew word which is interpreted a Profelyte, signifieth extra ded, or drawne forth, because they esteemed such, drawn forth of hel: whom yet they made the children of hel, more then themselves, in burthening their consciences, not only with those Ceremonies whereunto the Law and their Tradition tyed them, but with diuers others also. The name Profelyte, as Drusius affirmeth, is either taken largely for any stranger, or strictly for a conuert to their Religion. A Profelyte was made with obseruation of three things, Circumcision, Baptisme or Washing, and Oblation. The first was a signe of the Couenant, in which they were recei-ued: the second, as a badge of their cleanness; (for all the Gentiles were unclean) the third, for the attonement with God. This was while the Temple stood, and now is not in force: but whether Baptisme be still vsed, I know not. He ought to be circumcised in the presence of three. And if by nature * or accident he were before circumcised, and wanted that fore-skin, yet did they cut him there and made him bleede notwithstanding: and when his wound was whole, then before three witnesses was he baptised, in which ceremonie they couered the whole body with water. This manner of baptising they vsed also in reconciling and receiuing penitents, which had giuen scandall by notorious offences, in token of repentance, and newnesse of life, hauing first before this washing testified their humiliation by fasting and prayer. Of this washing they were so scrupulous, that <sup>a</sup> Clemens Alexandrinus testifieth, they were often washed in their beds. A woman Proselite was admitted by Baptisme only, and the offering of two Turtles, or two Pigeons. Serarius saith, Baptisme and Circumcision are still required: the like is written by P. Ricius and <sup>b</sup> Munster, who adde, that when any desireth to become a Proselite, they propound to him the hardest things of the law: with the promises of future happinesse, as of the Sabbath, not eating fat, &c. with some penances, that he should not after say, had I wist; and they would seeme to be willing by these meanes, to driue them from their Religion, as being corrupted by such new commers: but Christ affirmeth otherwise.

The gouernement of this people was, as <sup>c</sup> Betrannus thinketh, (before Ietro's aduise had brought in those Gouernours of thousands, hundreths, fifties, and tens) vnder seuentie Elders, according to the number of persons, which descended with <sup>d</sup> Isaah into Egypt: and that the seuentie assigned after to Moses for Assistants in the gouernement, were continued in their former office with further ratification and increase of gifts, and not newly instituted. Yea this number, he saith, gouerned in Egypt, howeouer Pharaoh's tyrannie did afterward much Eclipse their authoritie, and were by Moses and Aaron assembled together Exod. 4. 29. So that the thirteene Tribes, consisted of seuerall Families, according to the number of the chiefe heads thereof mentioned by <sup>e</sup> Moses, to which the thirteene Princes of the thirteene Tribes being annexed made vp the number. His reasons let such as will, learne of himselfe.

The gouernement in that time of Moses was mixt, the Monarchie being in Moses, but qualified with an Aristocratie in these seuentie, and the other Officers before mentioned; a Democratic also appeared in the assemblies so often mentioned. In lighter matters the Chiliarchs, Centurions, Quinquagenarij, and Decurions iudged: in more weightie the seuentie. Thus it continued in Ioshua's time till they had conquered and inhabited Cities. And then each Citie had their Senate or Councell of the Chiliarchs, and other Officers before named, proportionable to the greatnesse thereof. <sup>f</sup> Iosephus numbred seuen Elders, and two Leuites in euery Citie, which seemeth more to agree with his time then this former. Euen in Bethlehem the least of the thousands of Iuda, Boaz assembled ten Elders about the matter of Ruth. It seemeth that they had Leuites assisting in the iudgements, and Tribunals as men learned in the Law: and so we reade of the times of Dauid and Iehoshaphat. But I had rather send my Reader for these things to the Scriptures, and to the labours of Betrannus and Sigonius: from all which it is also apparant that the state was after Moses & Ioshua, managed by Iudges of diuers Tribes, not by election nor inheritance succeeding in that office, but by appointment of God, till they desired a King, whereas before God was their King. and by his Law partly, partly by Oracle ruled the State, being, as some thinke, an Aristocratie. There were also in the times of these Iudges, Princes of each Tribe, and the heads of Families: there was also a gouernement in each Citie by the Elders or Senate, exercised in the Gates thereof, as before is obserued. They had accordingly their Councels or Assemblies, either of the whole Nation, or of a whole Tribe, or of some one Citie.

The Kingdome of Israel, after it was diuided from the house of Dauid, continued the like forme of gouernement, as is most probable. After the captiuitie, it appeareth by the Histories of Hezra and Nehemiah, that the chiefe sway was vnder the Lieutenant or Deputie of the Persian King, according to commission from him. Other Offices happily receiued some alteration in regard of their numbers and estate, weaker and and lesse then in those former times of prosperitie, so that what Iosephus hath written of seven Elders in each Citie, and those things which in the Talmud are written of their Politie, had now first (as some thinke) their beginning. Concerning this, because it is not so common, lesse we have leave for a larger discourse out of the Talmudicall Sanhedrin, which thusse recordeth. * Matters which concerne goods are determined by three; Criminall cases, by a Councell of three and twentie. But such things as belong to a whole Tribe, a false Prophet, or the high Priest, by the great Councell at Ierusalem of seuentie and one. The high Priest iudgeth and is iudged: he sitteth at Funerals on a little Seat, all the multitude sitting on the ground. The King iudgeth not and is not iudged, giueth testimonie against none, nor none against him. Hee maketh Warres, but not without consent of the Sanhedrin: he may not haue aboute eightene wives: he ought to haue the Booke of the Law written, and hanging about his necke. In ciuill causes, each of the Litigants chooseth a Iudge or Arbitrator<sup>b</sup>, and both these thus chosen chooseth a third. Of this office are incapable, Diggers, Vluters, and such as practise dishonest courses for gain: They also which are of neare Kindred to the parties may neither be Iudges nor Witnesses. Their Companions or Aduersaries may giue testimonie, but not iudgement. * Women and Seruants might not be witnesses, Ios. Antiq. 4. 7. Nor a Theefe, Robber, Vsurer, Publican, Child, or Keeper of Doues, Ph. Ferdinand. This last Ricinus doth not mention, but addeth a Gentile, Foole, Deafe, Blinde. The ancientest witness is first examined: and that from his owne sight, or the debtors mouth, or else it is nothing. Thirtie dayes after sentence giuen the Defendant may alledge what he can for himselfe. The odde number is the casting voice. In criminall causes decided by three and twentie, one odde voice absolueth, but there must be aboute twelue of the three and twentie to condemne; and when sentence is giuen nothing may be alledged further for accusation, which for absolution is lawfull. And he which hath spoken for the accused may not after speake against him. Ciuill causes are examined in the day and sentenced in the night, but criminall<sup>c</sup> only by day: and sentence of condemnation may not bee pronounced the same day, and therefore on holy-dayes Euens examinations are forbidden. Profelytes and Bastards may determine ciuill causes, Priests and Leuites with other Israelites, are required in criminall. These Iudges sate in a semicircle hauing one<sup>d</sup> Scribe or Register on the right hand, and another on the left: In the Session-house were present besides three orders of Students which sate on the ground according to their degree, out of which the number of the Senators were supplied when neede was, so that one of the first order being made Senator, another was chosen out of the second order into his place, and out of the third in the roome of the second, and out of the people into that third order. The witnesses must testifie only from their owne sight, and that exactly what<sup>e</sup> seuenth year of the Iubilee, what yeare of that seuenth, what moneth, what day of the moneth, and weeke, and in what houre, and place, he saw it. For to saue or loose an Israelite is as much as to preferre or destroy the frame of the world; if one witness be ignorant of any of those circumstances, or contradicteth another, his testimonie is vaine. None of the Students which sit by may be suffered to accuse, if they can say any thing in defence of the partie they may. If they cannot find sufficient to absolve him that day, the Senators or Iudges scanne that matter seriously, two or three together all night, yling a spare dyet. If twelue condemne, and the rest cleare him, they adde to the number of Iudges vntill they make vp seuentie and one to make further search. When sentence is pronounced, the condemned person is carried away and brought againe foure or fve times to see whether he or any other can say any thing for his purgation. And if nothing bee alledged sufficient to reuerse the sentence, he is led to execution, <sup>f</sup> the Cryer going before him and proclaiming the crime and sentence and accusers, that if any can then say any thing in his behalfe, he may speake. When he cometh within ten cubits of the place of execution, he is admonished to confesse his fault, and so he shall haue part in the life to come: and if he know not the forme of confession, it is enough for him to say, Let death be vnto me the remission of all my sinnes. Being within foure cubits he is stripped naked all but his priuities, if it bee a woman she is led forth in her clothes. The stoning place was built twice the height of a man, from whence by one of the witnesses he was cast downe head-long, the ground beneath being set with flints; and if hee dyed not with the fall, another of the witnesses smote him neere the heart with a flint, which if it did not finish his death, the whole multitude cast stones at him. They might not condemne aboue one in one day, to death. Hee which was stoned, if hee were a man was presently hanged on a Gibbet, and after taken downe and buried with other persons which had before suffered in like manner. When the flesh was there consumed his bare bones might bee laid in his owne or his fathers Sepulchre. After this, his friends and kinsmen went to the Iudges and witnesses, and saluting them, acknowledged the iustice of their fact. Besides this punishment of stoning, * they punished with the fire, sword, or strangling. The manner of burning was, to put the condemned person in dung vp to the arme holes, and one executioner on one side, and another on the other, grased him with a linnen cloth about his neck, pulling the same till they forced him to gape, and then a bar or rod of burning mettall was thrust downe into his bodie. The sword was vsed in beheading. Strangling was done with a course peece of linnen, pulled close about his neck, till he were dead. It would be too long to shew what faults were appropriated to each of these kindes of execution. If a man had deserued two of them, hee was to bee punished with the most seuer. In some cases of homicide the guiltie person was put in a little-ease prison, where he was forced alway to stand, and was fed only with Barly till his belly rotted, and his bowels fell out. Any one might presently slay him which had stolen any of the holy Vessels, or blasphemed the name Iehoua. The Priest which exercised his function while he was polluted, was not brought to iudgement, but other Priests chosen to that purpose led him out of the holy place and knocked out his braines. From the Sanhedrin was no appeal: They were also called Mehokekim, that is, Scribes or Law-giuers, because whatsoever they deliuered or writ was received for a Law.

Their College, saith Galatinus <sup>b</sup>, (who from their sayling proueth that the Mefias is come) represented that Scepter, by the holy Ghost in Iacob promised to Iuda: and therefore not only vnder the Kings and Iudges did exercise iudgements, but also when there was no King, or Iudge in Israel. Of their qualitie it is thus written. They appointed none (saith R. Iohanan) but men of wisdom, stature, and of goodly presence, and of old age, and cunning in exorcismes, and vnderstanding the ieuensie tongues, that they might not neede interpreters. Their stature and comlinesse, Rabbi Selomoh saith, was required, to acquire them reuerence; and skill in enchantment, to conuince such Wisards. There were required the whole number of seuentie and one, in determining the going to Warre, in adding to a Citie, or the reuenues of the Temple, or in conuentioning the ordinarie Iudges of the Tribes; To constitute one of this number, they vsed imposition of hands; R. Iuda saith of siue. A Wolfe, Lyon, Beare, Leopard, and Serpent, were to be slaine by the three and twentie.

The great College called Sanhedrin ghédola, consisted of seuentie and one, the lesse of three and twentie. That odde number aboue seuentie, was to supply the roome of Moses, which was ouer those first seuentie. Hereby Galatinus gathereth, that in the Councell that condemned Christ, there was the whole number of seuentie and one, which is true, if Herod had not before disannulled that societie. The greater Sanhedrin ordayned the lesse; for those seuentie ordayned all the Sessions of Iudges, which in other Cities and Places ruled the people: and to this Court of the seuentie in Ierusalem they were all subiect. The place where they sate was called Gazith, that is, Carued, whereof this Court had the name (as the Star-chamber with vs.) Other Courts or Houses of Iudgement, they had diuers, of the three and twentie. One <sup>d</sup> of them sate in the Gate of the Mountaine of the Temple: another in the Gate of the Court: others in euery Citie. And when there was a controuersie, it was first brought to that Citie or Towne, and so to the rest, if occasion required (in order) to that in the Gate of the Mount, after to that in the Court-gate, and last to the Gazith Consistorie, in which they sate from morning till night. On Sabbath and solemne dayes they sate on the Wall.

But when Herod obtrayned the Scepter, he slew Hircanus and his sonne Antigonus, which had beene King and Priest, and also all of the seed Royall, and burnt the Genealogies logies of their Kings: and further to stablish his Throne in bloud, he killed the Scribes and Doctors of the Law, and caused all the Sanhedrin to be done to death. Because the Rabbanan (they are the words of the Talmud) had said according to Deut. 17. From among thy brethren thou shalt set a King over thee: he slew the Rabbanan or Masters, reserving only Baba, the sonne of Bata, whose eyes he after put out. And therefore the Sanhedrin perished: for, as is said, five, or at least after R. Ismael, three were necessarie to the ordination by the imposition of hands. But there were by Herods permission other Iudges instituted to be vnder the King, like the former Colledge but had no authoritie of sentence in waightie and criminall causes: and therefore they said to Pilate, It is not lawfull for vs to put any man to death, as some thinke. But others maintaine the contrarie. Betramus taketh a middle course, that the Iewes might examine and condemne, but then were to present the condemned partie to the Roman Magistrate for execution: except in the cause of stoning, wherein they tooke more libertie, as in the Acts of the Apostles, by Stephen and Pauls example appeareth. After their false sentence pronounced against Christ, they were expelled from the Consistorie Gazith, fortie yeares before the destruction of the Temple: and afterwards, by the commandment of the Romans, were all slaine. They being expelled Gazith, held their Consistorie at Hamith, another place in Ierusalem; but, saith R. Abdimi, with the place they lost their power in criminall iudgements, which might not be given but in Gazith. So doe the Rabbins interpret the words, Deut. 17. 10. According to the words which they of that place shew thee, thou shalt doe. They had inferiour punishments with the whip for smaller offences: in which the Law had limited them at fortie stripes, and they abated one of that number for feare of exceeding: as Paul saith, He had five times receiued fortie stripes saue one. The whip was of calues leather, as Drusus affirmeth. Betramus saith that they had in each Citie seuen Iudges in money matters, whereof three were principall, two Levites, and one of the rest, from whence the number is said to be but three. They had also ten Aediles, Taskers or Iudges of the Market, one of which was of the Priestly stocke. They had in Ierusalem an vnder Prouost, or a Captaine of the Temple. In other Cities of their dispersion, they had Synagogues and Magistrates, as at Alexandria, Antiochia, Sardis and other Cities, where they had obtained priuiledges and immunities. The manifold mutations of their State by the Babylonians, Persians, Macedonians, Egyptians, Syrians, Romans, and ciuill warres amongst themselves, did both then change the face of Government, and haue made it now to vs obscure and vncertaine.

Now concerning the Iewish Excommunications, Drusus hath obserued, that the Iewes had three kinds and degrees of Excommunications, Niddui, Herem, Sabbata: the first signifieth a Remouing; the second, Anathema; the third, the same which the Apostle calleth Maron-atha, by the first they are made ἀνομιμα (of which is an example. Gen. 4. 4) excommunicated from the Ecclesiasticall Assemblies. Hewhich was thus Excommunicated was called Menudde, and the denouncers Menaddim. There were foure and twentie causes for the which it was inflicted. If any died therein without repentance, they iudged him worthy of stoning, and therefore stoned his coffin: whereof they giue example of one Eleazar the sonne of Henoah. They might enter the Temple when they were excommunicated; but that they might enter the Synagogue is vnlikely. Thus they write, Salomon made two doores, in the Temple, one for mourners and excommunicates, the other for the newly married: at this, if any entred, the Israelites which came on the Sabbaths, and sate betwixt those doores, said, He whose name dwelleth in this house, glad thee with children: If any entred at the other doore with his vpper lip couered, they knew that he was a mourner, and said, He which dwelleth in this house reioyce and comfort thee if his lip were not couered, they knew that he was Menudde, excommunicate, and said, He which dwelleth in this house put into thy heart to heare the words of thy fellowes &c. When the Temple was destroyed, they decreed that the Bridegromes and Mourners should enter the Synagogue, and the men which saw them reioyced with the one, and sate on the ground with the other. If they did not amend, they were excommunicated with a greater curse, or Anathema: and if they persisted obstinate, they did Samatize them. The word Ana-

For by Sem, and more emphatically, Hassem they vsed to signifie the name, meaning that Tetragrammaton, and ineffable name of God; now commonly pronounced Iehovah. ## Of the Religious Places of the Israelites.

Templis cap. 1.

IN the discoverie of their ancient Religion, it seemeth fittest to discourse first of Places, secondly of Times, thirdly of Rites, fourthly of Persons consecrated to Religion. And first, of the first. Neither were the first men, nor first Hebrewes, very religious in this point of dedicating Places to Religion; as appeareth in Histories both holy and prophane; and if for some vision, made vnto them in some places, they did for a time hallow the same with Altars, and Sacrifices: yet neither were they alway, or only thus esteemed. But He, whose is the Earth, and all that therein is, did by his Law appoint, as it were, a place of his residence amongst these, whom he had chosen for his owne people: and commanded them to erect a Tabernacle in the wilderness, fitting that their peregrination. Afterward Salomon built him an house in Ierusalem: which therefore is called the holy Citie, and the Citie of the great King.

m Josh. 18. 1.

The Tabernacle (a moueable Temple that might bee taken asunder, and ioyned together againe) was, by Gods commandement, erected in the wilderness, in the same manner, and of the same matter, which God had both commanded and shewed to Moses in the Mount; the matter and forme whereof, with all that thereunto appertained; the Arke, the Candlestick, the Altar, &c. in the booke of Exodus are liuely declared. It was after (as we reade in the booke of Ioshua) with great solemnitie carried miraculously thorow Jordan, by the Levites deputed to that seruice: and, after their conquest of the Countrey, placed in Shilo, a Citie of Ephraim. There did Ioshua diuide the Land to her new Conquerours: there were their solemne Assemblies for State and Religion. In the time of Heli they remoued the Arke from the Tabernacle into the armie, which they had gathered against the Philistims; of whom the Arke was taken. The Tabernacle in the time of Saul, was carried to Nob, and, in the time of Dauid, to Gibeon, where Salomon offered a thousand burnt offerings. The Philistims forced by Diuine iudgements, sent backe the Arke, receiued by the Bethsamites, curious to their cost; it was after placed in Kiriath-Iarim, in the house of Aminadab, next of Obed-Edom, and then by Dauid in the place, which he had fitted for the same in Ierusalem; whence it was remoued into the Temple, which Salomon had built: where it was till the time of the deportation: in which time it was (saith the Author of the second booke of Maccabees) hidden by Ieremie the Prophet. But that Author is beholden to the Councell of Trent for his credit: the Iewes themselves in that point, not beleeuing him; who affirme that the second Temple came short of the former, by the want of the fire from heauen, of the Arke, of the Vrim and Thummim, of the succession of Prophets, and the glorie of God betweene the Cherubims.

q 1. Cor. 12. 14

The Temple was built on Mount Moriah by Salomon, according to the paterne, which he had receiued of Dauid: to which worke he had gathered a greater masse of wealth, then easily we shall reade of in the Persian, Greeke, Roman, or any other Christian, Turkish, or Heathen Empire; namely, 100000. talents of gold; 1000000. talents of siluer, and afterward 3000. talents of gold, and 7000. talents of siluer: to which was added, by the offerings of the Princes, 10000. talents of siluer, and more then then 5000. talents of gold, besides iewels, and brasse, and iron, without weight, with Cedars and stones without number. The gold alone amounteth after the common computation of the common talent, at 6000. crownes, to sixe hundred fortie eight millions of crownes, and vward; the silver to about the same summe.

This beautifull frame I should deforme with my description, if (after a double narration of all the parts; forme, and contents thereof in the Historie of the Bible) I should recite the particulars. This Temple, fleeced by some, repaired by others, continued in varietie of state, till the sacking and ruine of it, together with the Citie by Nabuchodonosor. And after their returne, by the edict of Cyrus, and other the Persian Kings, it was rebuilded (but farre inferiour in glorie) in the space, as the Jewes say, <sup>r Joh. 3. 20.</sup> vnto Christ, of six and fortie yeares: after others it was longer in hand, by reason of impediments from their cauiling, and malicious neighbours. But this error (if we vnderstand them of the building of Zorobabel) proceeded from the Iewish ignorance of the Persian Chronologie, which knew no other Persian Darius but one, attributing to Cyrus one and thirtie yeares, to Cambyses nine, to the Magi seuen monthes: and in the sixt yeare of Darius which followed (as they accounted) was the Temple finished: all which amount to six and fortie. They confound Darius Nothus, (to whose times the most and best of our moderne Chronographers, Staliger, Innius, Caluissius, Lively and others, referre this rebuilding of the Temple) with that former Darius the sonne of Histaspes. and from that second yeare of Darius Nothus, wherein the Edict was made for the Temple, doth Scaliger beginne the reckening of Daniels seuentie weekes and a halfe (as he interpreteth) the accounting from thence to the destruction of this Temple foure hundred fourescore and thirtene yeares and a halfe. This second Temple having receiued accessie of magnificence in succession of times, was spoiled and polluted vnder Antiochus, who dedicated the same to Iupiter Olympius; but being freed and dedicated anew by Maccabeus, it recovered great part of the former beautie; till, as Josephus saith, and his abbreniator Iosippus, it was pulled downe by Herod, and built anew. Herein both that allegation of the Jewes of sixe and fortie yeares, is against this assertion of Josephus, and the Historie also of Hegesippus, who reported that he only compassed the circuit about the Temple with a wall, and beautified the same with costly buildings, erected from the foundation the porches about the Sanctuarie, and fortified it with the Castle Antonia: but some account this Hegesippus a counterfeit.

Chrysostome more probably vnderstands those words of the Jewes, Fortie and six yeare was this Temple a building, of the Herodian Temple: and herein Scaliger, Hospius, and the great Cardinall Baronius follow him: accounting exclusiue from the eighteenth yeare of Herods raigne, which Eusebius reckoneth An. M. 3947. to the yeare 3992. in which Iohn Baptised, and Christ vttered these words: in all which they coniecture that somewhat was still a doing about the new building thereof, although the principall part thereof was performed and finished by Herod in eight yeares. This they gather by Josephus his owne Testimonie, that the building continued till the time of Nero, and in another place, where he affirmeth that the East porch, which Luke calls Salomons porch, was still remaining of the ancient building, in the dayes of Nero. For thus hee saith in the last booke of his Antiquities, speaking of the times of Albinus, fourescore and three yeares after Herod began this worke, as Scaliger reckoneth, Now the building of the Temple was finished. The people therefore seeing eightene hundred work-men, which had before been wont to liue by that building, idle and unwilling that the money should be laid vp, lest it might become a prey to the Romans: carefull also to provide for the work-men: perswaded the King to reedifie the East porch, which closed vp the outside of the Temple, hanging ouer a deepe and narrow valley, borne vp by a wall of foure hundred cubits height, and the length of euery stone was twenty cubits, the thicknes sixe; the worke of King Salomon which first built the Temple. But the King, to whom Claudius Caesar had committed the building of the Temple, seeing that it required much time, great expence, &c. refused. Thus it is apparant that all the Temple was not demolished till the finall destruction thereof vnder Titus. Neither doe the Jewes in the Talmud speake of any third Temple: nor can the Prophecie of Haggais be fulfilled, That the glorie of the second Temple should exceed the glorie of the former; if Christ (of whose coming it is interpreted) had not by his presence, preaching, and miracles, not onely supplied the defects (before mentioned) but made it surmount the other in effects of Maiestie and glorie. And the zeale vnto this testimonie, nor the meanest which the Christian Veritie <sup>a</sup> vrgeth against the Jewish Incredulitie and Apostasie, (which is necessarily demonstrated and euinced, whiles yet they continue their vaine hopes of a Messias, so many Ages after the dissolution of that Temple whereof Aggee prophesied) hath caused mee to vse so many words in this matter. But to satisfie the fancies of great men, their great workes are commonly made greater: For howsoeuer it was verie great in it selfe, that Herod should haue, eight yeares together, many worke-men at worke (which Iosephus numbereth for some part of the time ten thousand and a thousand Priests) yet sustaining, no doubt, some intermission after his time, either wholly, or in part, it could not bee so great as to haue accomplished it wholly from the foundation, wherein Salomon spent seuen yeares: and besides, what any of the naturall Israelites performed in this worke, hee employed an hundred three and fiftie thousand and sixe hundred worke-men of the Strangers or Forrainers found in the Countrey. And whereas the second Temple was but halfe the height of the former, perhaps it is true, that (according to Iosephus) hee perfected it to that height of an hundred and twentie cubites, whereof twentie cubites sanke downe in the setting of the foundations: If any yet will rather thinke this Temple the worke of Herod, then Zorobabel, as a thing which Iosephus by his owne eyes might obserue. Scaliger doth neuerthelesse false that prophesie of Aggee, by distinction of the Building and of the <sup>b</sup> Continuall Sacrifice: saying, that if it had beene ten times reedified, yet the continuall Sacrifice continuing causeth that there is no interruption, and that it should still bee called but one Temple. It was builded by Herod of white stones fise and twentie cubites long, eight thicke, and twelue broad. Hee that would further reade the particulars, let him haue recourse to Iosephus in his fifteenth booke of Antiquities. This Temple was burned by Titus, in the sacke of the Citie, the same day that before it had beene fired by the Chaldzans. Adrian the Emperour <sup>c</sup> did after destroy the Reliques thereof, that a stone was not left vpon a stone; and there, in the same place, dedicated another Temple to Iupiter, that former being ouerwhelmed with earth. Julian gaue leaue to the Iewes to reedifie the Temple, in despight of Christian Religion, and contributed frackely thereto: but Ammianus Marcellinus <sup>d</sup>, a Heathen Writer, witnesseth, That fire issued out of the Earth, <sup>e</sup> and burned both worke and worke-men: when as an Earth-quake (which had before, saith <sup>f</sup> Zozomen, killed a great many, in the very attempting of this Worke) could not deterre them from proceeding in their purpose: and Cresses, miraculously fallen on the garments of many, did both teach them to forsake their Iudaisme, and to become Christians.

Chrysostome <sup>g</sup> mentioneth this, and saith, That vnder Adrian the Iewes sought to recover their libertie, and lost their Countrey. Vnder Constantine they attempted the like, who therefore cut off their eares, and branded their bodies for Rebels, as the elder of you (saith hee to his Auditors) doe know. And in our dayes, about twentie yeares since, Julian the Emperour was at great expences, appointed Officers, sent for worke-men from all places, thinking to frustrate Christs Prophecie concerning the Temple, and to bring the Iewes to Idolatrie. But so soone as they had attempted this businesse, and bared the foundation, had drawne forth the earth, and were now ready to beginne their building; a fire burst forth from the foundations, and burned many, which caused them to cease. And if you now goe to Ierusalem you may see the foundations naked: hereof we all are witnesses. Neither did this happen vnder Christian Emperours, lest any should impute it to the Christians, but vnder an Ethnicke, when Christianitie was persecuted. Thus much in effect, Chrysostome. Gregorie Nazianzen <sup>h</sup> also testifieth the same, affirming that the Earth (as it were taking a Vomit from the Diuine hand) spued out the stones, which yet till this day had continued therein, and dispersed them to the great damage of the neighbour-buildings.

Other holy places they had, which the Scripture mentioneth as high places, which were were high hills, or other open and loftie places, shaded for the most part with Trees: the Prophets inuey against them, and<sup>1</sup> they were commanded to be destroyed, together with the Groues: some yet were permitted, eyther by extraordinary command for a time, as to Gedron<sup>m</sup> and to Manoah<sup>n</sup>; or because of the Tabernacle at Gibeon, or of the Arke at Ierusalem. The not reforming this toleration of high places is reckoned as an eclipse of Iehoshaphats and Asas glorie; which Ezekiab and Iosiah quite remoued and polluted. These high and open places it seemeth were consecrated, as sitting to the celestially bodies; to which, and to Baal (who is interpreted the Sunne) they vsed for the most part on them to sacrifice. They had also their Houses and Temples for Baal, in Israel and Iuda; and Dan & Bethel were by Seroboams dedicated to his Egyptian Idolatrie: and Gilgal was a place of request in this kind. Salomon also built temples or houses for his Idolatrous wiues. And to reckon euery particular in this kind were a work endles, in the 2. Reg. 17. & 23. & other places enough is of them recorded.

Two other Temples were erected of some reputation: one by Sanballat at Samaria, on Mount Garizin, by licence obtained of Alexander the Great, whose part he followed, rebelling against Darius his true Lord. The occasion was, because Manasses brother of Iaddi the High Priest had married, contrary to Gods law, Nicasa<sup>o</sup> daughter of Sanballat, and was forced eyther to leaue his Priestly Function or Heathenish bed. Whereupon Sanballat hauing obtained licence to build that Temple aforesaid, constituted him the High Priest therof, many other Priests for the like fault, resorting thither to him. But of these Samaritans we shall haue fitter occasion to say more when we come to handle their Sects.

Ptolemaus Philometor Pabouesaid, granted licence to Onias (the sonne of the High Priest Onias, whom Antiochus had slaine (who for the same cause had heere shrowded himselfe) to build a Temple, induced hereunto by a false interpretation of the prophetic of Esay at Leontopolis, in the shire, as I may terme it, or Nomus of Heliopolis: hauing Priests and Leuites ministring therein, and other things answering in sort to that of Ierusalem. When the Temple of Ierusalem was burnt by Titus, this Temple was shut vp also of Lupus the Deputie, three hundred and thirtie yeares after it had bene builded: and after by his successor Paulinus vtterly despoyled both of the wealth and the Religion. The City was called of Onias, Onion.<sup>9</sup> It had a Tower and an Altar like that of Ierusalem, but in steade of a Candlestick, a Lampe of golde hanging on a chaine of golde, enriched by the King with large reuenues.

Synagogues the Iewes had many, both in Ierusalem where are said to haue bene foure hundred and fourescore, and in all Citties of Iudea, and among the Gentiles where the Iewes were dispersed. When they first began to be builded, is vncertaine. Cornelius Betramus<sup>1</sup> thinketh, That the eight and fortie Citties of the Leuites, had their fit places for Assemblies, whence Synagogues had beginning. In these Synagogues the Archisynagogi were in place of Leuites and Prophets, sometimes diuers in the same Synagogue, as Sosthenes & Crispus in that of Corinth, which on festiuall dayes did performe the publike prayers, and read the Law and the Prophets, expounding the same themselves, or authorising others hereunto; so that they which first were called Prophets, were afterward Scribes and Lawyers, and in the Synagogues Archisynagogi. They had authprity also, as it seemeth, of Iurisdiction in punishing offenders. The Citties of the Leuites were as Nurseries of learning, and Vniuersities for the studies of Diuinitie. And in the reformation of Religion by Elias and Elisha: the Schooles of the Prophets were as Colledges, and the sons of the Prophets students of Diuinity, which had a Rector ouer them, as may seem by 2. King. 6. and other places: where also their gesture in hearing their Lectures appeareth to be sitting; and therefore their Schooles or Academies were called Sessions. In their Synagogues also they kept both their Ciuill and Ecclesiasticall Courts. The Synagogues of Forreiners* at Ierusalem were also Colledges of Students. <sup>1</sup> Sigonius coniectureth, That their Babylonian exile ministred occasion to them to helpe themselves with these Houses of Prayer and Instruction. The worde Synagogue<sup>n</sup> is taken both for the Assemblies, whether in this place, or out of it, and for the Place it selfe; hauing a Ciuill as well as a Religious vse. And these Synagogues they haue in the places of their dispersion vnto this day.

The order they obserued in their Synagogues was this; They disputed and preached sitting; the * Elders sat in Chaires which were set in order, of which Christ saith, They loue the chiefe seats in Synagogues: those of meane sort sat in seates, and the meanest of all on the floore vpon Mats: and not onely one did dispute or interpret, but others in order, not of the Elders alone, but of the inferiour ranks also, if any thing were reuealed to them: which Tradition of theirs Saint Paul saith he applied to the Christian Assemblies of those times. They vsed to pray in their Synagogues standing, as did also the Primitiue Christians.

Besides these Temples and Houses consecrated to God, Ambition, the Ape of Deuotion, founded some of other nature. Herod the Great, erected a sumptuous Temple and Citie in the honour of Cesar, which sometime had bene called Stratonis turris, and after Cæsarea. The Temple of Cesar was conspicuous to them which sayled farre off in the Sea, and therein were two Statues, one of Rome, the other of Cesar. The sumptuousnesse of Herods ambition in this Citie, Temple, Theater, and Amphitheater, &c. Iosephus amply describeth. He built another Temple at Panium, the fountaine of Iordan, in honour of Cesar; and least this should stirre vp the peoples hearts against him to see him thus deuoutly prophane and prophanely deuoute, he remitted to them the third part of the tributes. He consecrated Games, after the like Heathenish solemnities, in honour of Cesar, to be celebrated every fift yeare at Cæsarea. He built also the Pythian Temple at Rhodes of his owne cost. He gaue yearly reuennue to the Olympian Games, for maintenance of the Sacrifices and solemnities thereof: Quis in rapacitate auarior? Quis in largitione effusior? Hee robbed his owne to enrich (or rather vainely to lauish out on) others. He spared not the Sepulchres of the dead. For the Sepulchre of Dauid had lent before to Hircanus three thousand talents of siluer; which filled him with hope of the like spoyle; and entering it with his choise friends, he found no money but precious clothes: and whiles he in a couetous curiosity searched further, he lost two of his companie, by flame (as fame went) breaking out vpon them. Hereupon he left the place, and, in recompence, in the entrie of the Sepulchre, built a monument of white Marble.

He built also a Sebaste in the Region of Samaria, wherein hee erected a Temple, and dedicated a Court of three furlongs and a halfe of ground before it, to Cesar. Thus Cesar was made a God by him, who would not allow Christ a place among men, but, that he might kill him, spared not the infants of Bethleem, no nor his owne sonne amongst the rest, as this his God iested of him, saying, That hee had rather be Herods Swine then his Sonne. For his Iewish deuotion prohibited him to deale with Swine, but not Religion, not Reason, not Nature could protect those innocents from slaughter.

He day amongst the Iewes was (as amongst vs) Naturall and Artificiall: this from Sunne-rising to Sunne-setting, to which is opposed Night, the time of the Sunnes absence from our Hemisphere: that comprehended both these, called of the Greekes Nekthupor, contrayning one whole reuolution of the Sunnes motion to the same point of the Horizon or Meridian, in 24. houres. This Naturall day the Babylonians began at the rising of the Sunne, the Athenians at the setting, the Vmbrians (as the Astrologians) at Noone, the Egyptians and Romane Priests at Midnight. The Iewes agreed in their reckoning with the Athenians, as did the Galli in Cæsars time, reporting Pluto to be the author of their Nation: & some reliques hereof is in our naming of time by a seuen night, and a fortnight; although otherwise we reckon the day between two midnights. The most naturall computation of this naturall day, is, to follow that order of nature, wherein darknes had the priority of time, and the evening & the morning were made

mada one day, or the first day : which (saith <sup>d</sup> Hospinian) the Italian and Bohemian Clockes doe yet obserue. The day was not diuided of the first Hebrewes (before the Babylonian captiuitie) into houres, but was distinguished by Vigilie, or Watches, of which they had foure; the first began at euening, the second at midnight, the third in the morning, the fourth at noon. Neither is there any hebrew word signifying an houre, although some interpret the degrees of the Dial of Abaz to be houres; some (as Tremell) halfe houres. Afterwards it was diuided into houres 12. in the night, and as many in the day; not equall as ours, but longer or shorter, according to so many equall portions of the day or night: so that with them the 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12. houre was answerable with our houres of 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6. if we consider them in the Equinoctiall, otherwise they differed from our equall houres more or lesse, according to the vnequall lengthning or shortning of the dayes, but so, that an easie capacity may conceiue the proportion. These houres sometimes they reduced into foure, the first contayning the 1, 2, 3. or with vs the 7, 8, 9. houres: the second the 4, 5, 6. or after our reckoning 10, 11, 12. of the clock, and so forwards. This was the Ecclesiasticall Computation, according to the times of Prayers and Sacrifices; imitated still in the Church of Rome in their Canonically houres. Thus is Marke reconciled to the other Euangelists, in relating the time of Christs Passion, the first calling it the third houre when they crucified him, or led him to be crucified, whereas Iohn saith, That it was about the sixth houre when Pilate deliuered him. Thus may the parable of the Labourers in the Vineyard be vnderstood, Matth. 20. and other places of Scripture. The night also was diuided into foure Watches, each contayning three houres, accordingly. They had three houres of Prayer, the third, the sixth, the ninth, as both the Jewish and <sup>b</sup> Euangelicall Writers mention: the first of which they say Abraham instituted, the second Isaac (it began when it was halfe an houre past the sixth houre, and continued till halfe an houre after the ninth: at this houre the Disciples of the Wise-men tooke their meat, which before this prayer tasted nothing) the third began when the former left, and continued till the euening. And this was obserued both for their publique and priuate prayers, although it be not likely that the whole time was that way spent, especially in priuate deuotions; for then their particular callings had bene frustrated and cancelled by this exercise of the generall.

Seven dayes were a weeke, whereof the seventh was called the Sabbath; others had no particular name, but were called the first day of the weeke, or the first day of (or after) the Sabbath, and so of the rest. The Christians called them <sup>k</sup> Feria, as the first, second or third Feria, for Sunday, Monday, Tuesday: the reason whereof was, the keeping of Easter weeke holy. For that being made in their Calendar the first weeke of the year, and by law being wholly feriata, freed from working, and sanctified to holy vses; therefore the dayes also of other weekes receiued that name from this first weeke. Touching which there is a law of Constantine the great, to keepe both it and the weeke before it also adpaxus, without working, which for the later was by custome obtained, and by a Canon enjoyed, to spend it wholly in the Church with Psalmes and Hymnes and spirituall Songs.

Their moneths, as with vs and the Grecians, tooke their name of the Moon, and with them also their measure, reckoning the order of their dayes according to the age of the Moone, and by courses they contained, one thirty dayes; the next twenty nine, and therefore were constrained euery second or third yere to intercale, or adde, as in a Leap yere one moneth of two and twenty dayes, and in euery fourth yere of three and twenty dayes. This they called <sup>m</sup> Veadar, because it followed the twelfth moneth Adar, for the supply of ten dayes one and twentie houres, and two hundred and foure scruples, which the twelue moneths of the Moone came short of the yere of the Sun, And this they were forced to doe for the obseruation of the Pasche, and their other Feasts. <sup>n</sup> Before their Babylonian thraldom, foure only of these moneths were known by proper names; the first called Erythaim the second Bul, the seventh, which after was made the first, Abib; the eight Zif; but afterwards the rest receiued names, which had bene before distinguished onely by order, and the former names also were altered; that being reckoned the first moneth of the yere, in which befell the fifteenth day of

nall Equinoctiall; that being supposed by some to be the time wherein the World was first created, every Plant and Tree hauing the fruit and seed ripe: and this reckoning of the yeare in ciuill affaires, is obserued of the Iewes vnto this day: and from hence they began their Iubilee and seuenth Sabbaticall yeare; lest otherwise they should haue lost two yeares profits, not reaping the fruit of the olde yeare, nor sowing in the next. Their Ecclesiasticall or festiuall yeare began at the Spring, as we haue said afore, by the commandement of God, at and in remembrance of their departure out of Egypt at the same time, Exod. 12. 25 with vs we haue an Ecclesiasticall yeare moueable, according to the fall of Easter, differing from the Ciuill beginning at our Lady, as with others at Christ-masse or New-yeares day.

Scaliger thus obserueth concerning the Jewish yeare. The Iewes (saith he) vse a double reckoning of their yeare; one after the course of the Moone, the other after the course of the Sunne. Tekupha anciently was that moment in which the passed year ended, and the following began. But the later Iewes diuided the year of the Sun into foure equal parts, each whereof consisted of 91. dayes, 7. houres and a halfe.
And they diuide the said yeare into 12. equal parts, each containing dayes, 30. houres, 10. 30. They begin at the fifteenth of Aprill, moued by the authority of R. Samuel, an ancient Criticke, who ascribed the first Tekupha to that moneth which before they began in Autumne: the reason was, because at that time Moses led the Israelites out of Egypt. The moderne Iewes are so superstitious in the obseruation of their *Tekupha*s; that they esteeme it danger of life to alter their reckoning of them. They also attribute to each of them his proper element, as to the Tekupha Tamuz (the Summer Solstice) the Fire; and he which should drink or eate in the moment of that Tekupha, they think should be taken with a burning feauer. Tekupha Nisan is on the fifteenth of Aprill, Tekupha Tamuz on the fifteenth of Iuly, Tekupha Tifri on the fourteenth of October, Tekupha Tebeth on the fourteenth of Ianuarie. In times past they obserued superstitiously the beginnings of euery moneth, thinking, that then the Sunne entred into that Signe, which was attributed to that moneth. Now they onely obserue the foure Tropicall Signes. Such is their folly, as though: now the entrance of Aries were not more then five and thirtie daies before the Tekupha of Moses. But their leaden braines know not what Tekupha is; nor why, nor when it was instituted. So much Scaliger.

If the new Moone happened after noone, then the moneth and their New-Moone-Feast began the next day, and the yeare likewise, which began at the New-Moone.
They were so scrupulous concerning the Moone, that Clemens Alexand. out of another Author obiects the worship thereof vnto them: they thinke (saith he) that they alone know God, not knowing that they worship Angels & Archangels, and the moneth and the Moone; and if the Moone appeare not, they keep nor that Sabbath, which they call the first, nor the New-moone, nor the vnleauened, nor the feast, nor the great day. This fabulous author cited by Clemens vnderstood not himselfe, saith Scaliger; for they still obserue the appearance or first sight of the Moone, not to ordaine the solemnities

thereby (which was done by a certaine rule) but to sanctifie it: and therefore as soone as they saw the New-moone, they say, Good lucke, or a good signe, be it to us and to all Israel. The same also doe the Muhammedans obserue. By the first Sabbath he meaneth the New-yeares day, called a Sabbath because it was holy-day: by the feast, Pentecosts; by the great day, that of Tabernacles. Although in regard of use, some daies were more holy then other, yet had euery day appointed sacrifices morning and euening.

Their Feasts were eyther weekly, of which was the Sabbath; or monethly; euery New Moone; or yearly, of which were the Easter or Pasche, Pentecost or Whitsontide, the Feast of Tabernacles. These were chiefe, to which were added the Feast of Trumpets, of Expiation, and of the Great Congregation. To these we may reckon the seuenth yeares Sabbath, and the yeare of Iubilee. These Feasts God had prescribed to them, commanding, that in those three principall Feasts euery male (as the Iewes interpreted it, that were cleane and sound, and from twentie yeares of their age to fiftie) should appeare here where the Tabernacle or Temple was, with their offerings, as one great Parish, Deut. 16. hereby to retaine an unitie in diuine worship; and a greater solemnitie; with increase of ioy and charitie; being better confirmed in that Truth, which they here saw to be the same which at home they had learned, and also better strengthened against the errors of the Heathen, and idolatrous feasts of Diuels. To these were after added vpon occasions, by the Church of the Iewes, their foure Fasts, in memorie of their calamities receiued from the Chaldeans, their Feast of Loss, of Dedication, and others, as shall follow in their order.

They began to celebrate their Feasts at Euen: so Moses is commanded, From Euen to Euen shall ye celebrate your Sabbath; imitated in the Christian Euen songs on holy Euens, yet the Christian Sabbath is by some supposed to begin in the morning, because Christ did rise at that time.

CHAP. V.

Of the Festivall dayes instituted by God in the Law.

AS they were enjoined to offer a Lambe in the morning, and another in the euening euery day, with other Prayers, Prayles, and Rites: so had the Sabbath a double honour in that kinde, and was wholly sequestered and sanctified to religious dueties. Which howsoever it was ceremonially, in regard of that seuenth day designed, of the Rites therein prescribed, of that rigid and strait obseruation exacted, of the particular workes prohibited: and of the deadly penaltie annexed, yet are we to thinke, that the eternall Lord, who hath all times in his hand, had, before this, selected some Time proper to his Seruice, which in the abrogation of ceremonies Legall, is in Morall and Christian due tie to be obserued to the end of the World: even as from the beginning of the World he had sanctified the seuenth day to himselfe, and in the Morall Law (giuen not by Moses to the Iewes, but by God himselfe, as to all creatures) is the remembrance of that sanctification urged. Friuolous are their reasons who would renew the Iewish Sabbath amongst Christians, tying and tying vs in a more then Iewish seruitude, to obserue both the last and first dayes of the weeke, as some haue preached, and of the Ethiopian Churches is practised. Neyther can I subscribe to those, who are so farre from paying two, that they acknowledge not the debt of one vpon diuine right, but onely in Ecclesiasticall courtesie, and in regard of the Churches meere constitution; and haue thereupon obtruded on many other dayes as religious respects or more, then on this (which yet the Apostles entituled in name and practise, The Lords Day) with the same spirit whereby they haue equalled traditions to the holy Scriptures.

This Cardinall Tolet allowes on the Lords day Iourning, Hunting, Working, Buying, Selling, Fayres, Fencing, and other priuate and publique workes by him

mentioned: and saith, a man is ryed to sanctifie the Sabbath, but not to sanctifie it well: (a new kind of distinction) the one is in hearing Masse, and ceasing from servile workes, the well-doing it, in spirituall contemplations, &c. Another <sup>b</sup> Cardinall is as fast as hee is loose, affirming, That other holy dayes also binde the conscience, even in cases voyd of contempt and scandale, as being truly more holy then other dayes, and a part of diuine worship, and not onely in respect of order and policie.

But to returne to our Iewish Sabbath. Plutarch thought, that the Sabbath was deuied of Σαββατον, which signifieth, to keepe Reuell-rout, as was vsed in their Bacchanals of Σαβδος, which is interpreted Bacchus, or the sonne of Bacchus, as Celsus Rhodiginus sheweth out of Amphisbeus and Mnasaeas; who is therefore of opinion, That Plutarch thought the Iewes on their Sabbaths worshipped Bacchus, because they did vse on that day to drink somewhat more largely (a Sabbathising too much, by too many Christians imitated, which celebrate the same rather as a day of Bacchus, then the Lord day.) Bacchus his Priests were called Sabbi, of this their reuelling and misse rule. Such wide coniectures we finde in others, whereas the Hebrewes call it Sabbath, of נש, which signifieth To rest, because of their vacation to diuine Offices, and not for idlenesse or worse employments. And for this cause all the festiuall Solemnities in the Scripture are styled with this generall title and appellation, as times of rest from their wonted bodily seruices. Likewise their seventh year was Sabbathicall, because of the rest from the labours of Tyllage. In those feasts also, which consisted of many daies solemnitie, the first and last were Sabbaths<sup>b</sup>, in regard of the strictnesse of those dayes rest.

Luke hath an obscure place, which hath much troubled Interpreters with the difficultie thereof, Εἰς Σαββατὸν δευτέρου, our English reads it, The second Sabbath after the first. <sup>a</sup> Isidore saith it was so called of the Pascha and Azuma comming together. (Crysostome thinks (as Sigonius cytes him) it was when the <sup>k</sup> New-Moone fell on the Sabbath, and made a double Festiuall. Sigonius, when they kept their Passeouer in the second moneth. * Stella takes it for Manipulus Frugum, alledging Iosephus his Authour. <sup>1</sup> Ambrose, for the Sabbath next after the first day of the Easter Solemnitie. <sup>m</sup> Hospinian, for the Octaues or last day of the same: * Maldonatus, for the Feast day of Pentecost, which was the second of the chiefe Feasts: But Ioseph Scaliger<sup>n</sup> saith, That the second day of the Feast was called ΔΕΥΤΕΡΑ ΤΟΤ ΠΑΣΧΑ, (being the sixteenth day of the moneth, called Manipulus Frugum) and the Sabbaths which fell betwixt that and Pentecost receiued their denomination in order from the same; Secundo-primum, secundo-secundum, &c. And hence doth Luke call that first Sabbath which fell after that δευτέρα, or second day of the Feast δευτέρου. Of this we shall haue occasion to say more when we come to the Samaritans. <sup>o</sup> The name Sabbath is also taken for the whole weeke. But I list not to stand on the diuers significations of the word.

The Iewes were superstitiously strict in the obseruation of their Sabbath: Ptolemy without resistance captiuating their Cittie and themselves by this aduantage, as did Pompey afterwards. And in the dayes of Matabias, father of Indas Maccabeus, a thousand were murdered without resistance, till that by him they were better aduised: which appeared by the Pharisees, that cauild at the plucking and rubbing of a few eares of Corne, by the hungry Disciples, and at their Master for healing on that day, though by his word: which their superstition, the Iew that fell into a Priue at Maidenburi, one thousand two hundred and seventie on his Sabbath, and another at Tewskburie, one thousand two hundred and twentie (and were, the one by the Bishop of the Place, the other by the Earle of Gloucester constrained to abide the Christian Sabbath, whence on their owne they would not be freed) testified to the world by a stinking penance, and the later leauing also his stinking superstitious soule behinde to scale his deuotion. They added of their owne, fasting that day till noone, their Sabbath dayes dayes journey, which was (saith S. Ierome)<sup>1</sup> by the institution of Barachibaz, Simeon and Hellus, (Rabbines) not above 2000 paces* or two miles. Thus did this holy ordinance which God had instituted for the refreshing of their bodies, the instruction of their soules, and as a type of eternal happines, vanish into a smoky superstition amongst them. The sacrifices and accustomed rites of the Sabbath are mentioned, Numb. 28. & Lev. 23. & 24. Where we may reade, that the daily burnt-offering, and meat-offering, and drinke-offering, were doubled on the Sabbath, and the shew-bread renewed, &c.

The sanctification of dayes and times being a token of that thankfulness, and a part of that publique honour which we owe vnto God, he did not onely enioyne, by way of perpetuall homage, the sanctification of one day in seuen; which Gods immutable Lawe doth exact for euer, but did require also some other part of time with as strict exaction, but for lesse continuance; besides, accepting that which being left arbitrarie to the Church, was by it consecrated voluntarily vnto like religious vses. Of the first of these (the Sabbath wee haue spoken: of the Mosaicall feastes the New-moones are next to be considered. The institution hereof we reade, Numb. 28. and the solemne sacrifice therein appointed; so to glorifie God, the author of time and light, which the darkened conceits of the Heathens ascribed to the Planets and bodies celestiall; calling the moneths by their names. Besides their sacrifices, they banqueted on this day, as appeareth by David and Saul; Where the day after was festiuall also, eyther so to spend the surplusage of the former dayes sumptuous sacrifice, or for a farther pretext of religion and zeale, as Martyr* hath noted. Sigonius* maketh these New-moone daies to be professus, that is, such wherein they might labour, the sacrificing times excepted: but those couetous penny-fathers seeme of another minde. When (say they) will the New-moone be gone that we may sell corne, and the Sabbath that we may sell wheate? and Es. 1. the Sabbaths and New-moones are reckoned together.

Their Passecouer, called of them Pasach; so called of the Angels passing ouer the Israelites in the common destruction of the Egyptian first-borne For Pasach, the Grecians (as some note) vse Pascha, of πασχα to suffer, sitly in regard of the body of that shadow Christ himselfe who was our Paschall Lamb, in his suffering sacrifice for vs.

The institution of this feast is set downe, Exo. 12. 25 Hospinian hath noted in the yeare after the creation of the world 2447.<sup>b</sup> after the flood 791. after the promise made to Abram 430. it was celebrated from the fifteenth to the one and twentie day of the moneth Abib or Nison, those two dayes being more speciallly sanctified with a holy Conuocation and abstinence from worke, except the dressing of their meate: the other being obserued with vnleauened bread: and the fourteenth day being the Parasceue, or preparation: in the euening of which fourteenth day, as some men hold opinion, after Sun-set in the twi-light; others in the fourth houre, or fourth part of the day, as conuainyng three houres space, before the going down of the Sun, the Paschal Lamb was slaine: about which time (the ninth houre) Christ the true Pascha yeelded vp the ghost, hauing eaten the Passecouer on the night before, which was the true time, and was then first altered by the Iewes: which corruption continued to the destruction of their Temple. Christ suffered (saith Scaliger) on the third of April, the fourth yeare complete after his Baptisme. From which ninth houre the Iewes began their Vespera or Euening: and therefore it was inioyned them inter duas Vesperas*, to kill the Passecouer. In these Vespers, as also on the Euen of euery Feast and Sabbath, after the euening sacrifice, they which doe any wotke, saith the Iewish Canon, shall neuer see good signe of a blessing: which was the cause that they hastened so much the death of the Theeues which were crucified with Christ.

This Lambe or Kidde was chosen a male of a yeare olde, the tenth day of the Moone, which they kept till the fourteenth day tyed (after their traditions) to the foot of some bench or fourme, so to minister occasion to their children, of questioning about it, to themselves of Preparation and Meditation, and to espie in this meane while, if any default were in the Lambe. It was first a priuate Sacrifice, to be performed in euery house, after in that place onely where the Tabernacle or Temple was: they there dispersed by companies, according to Iosephus, not fewer then ten, sometime twenty in a company; with Christ there were thirteen, and of these sacrifices and companies panies in time of Cestius, were numbred 256500. so that reckoning the least number there were tentimes so many, besides those that by diseases or other manifold lets were not partakers thereof: and in regard of this Feast being assembled thither through Gods iust iudgement, their whole huge multitudes were coup'd or caged together in the walls of this Citie to destruction, vnder Titus.

The blood of the Lambe they were to receiue in a vessell, and to sprinkle the same with a bunch of Hysope on the doore postes, and to eate it in the night, which was the beginning of the fifteenth day, roast with fire, with sowre hearbes and vneleuened bread, both the head, seete, and putrenance; girded, shod, with stau'es in their hands, in hast, standing, burning whatsoever was left of the same. After the eating the Sacramentall Lambe, standing, they had other prouision which they eate sitting, or after their manner of lying at Table, in remembrance of their libertie, as appeareth by Iohns leaning on his brest, and Iudas his soppe at Christs supper. In the Lawe it was commanded that they should eate the Pascheouer standing; which they onely practised in the first celebration in Egypt. For so the Iewes set forth the difference of the Paschall night from other nights, in their twice washing, which on other nights they doe but once: in their vneleuened: in their Endiue or sowre hearbes: and whereas on other nights they sit or lie, now they lie onely in token of their securitie. The washing was therefore necessarie lest they should defile the beddes whereon they lay with their dustie seete. In which respect the Gentiles also vsed to wash their seete: the Iewes their whole bodie. And the Pharisee marvelled at Christ, ἵτις ἑαυτὸν ἁλοῖται, that he was thus baptised or washed before he fate downe. Some contented themselues only with washing the seete; the want of which office Christ objected to another of his Pharisaicall hostes. But in the Paschall rite a double washing was requisite, because of their double supper; which in the flourishing state of the Iewes was also vsed in other their chiefe solemnities of the Pentecost and Tabernacles. In the former they eate their sacrifices, in the later certaine Prayes were sung, and it was called the supper dimissorie. But this second Paschall Supper differed from that in other solemnities, wherein they vsed iunkets, which in this were forbidden; and in stead thereof they had Endiue and wilde Lettice, mingled with Vinegar, and other things, which now they make as thicke as Mustard. The Housholder first dipped his vneleuened soppe therein and eate it, and then tooke from vnder the Carpet or cloth another, which hee brake into as many pieces as he had Communicants in his companie, euery piece being as bigge as an Oliue, which was giuen to each of them in order. When he eate that soppe, first he said, Blessed be thou Lord our God King of the world, which hast sanctified vs with thy Commandements, and hast giuen vs the precept of vneleuened bread.

And when he had eaten, he said (as he distributed to the rest) This is the bread of affliction, which our forefathers ate in the land of Egypt. Euery one which is hungry, come and eate: euery one which hath neede, come and obserue the Pascheouer. After the destruction of Ierusalem, they added these wordes; Now wee are heere seruants, but hereafter we shall be in the land of Israel: now we are here seruants, hereafter in the land of Israel, free. After this, he tasted of the Cuppe and deliuered to the next, and he to the third, and so on through the companie. This was called the Cup of Thanksgiuing, or of singing the hymme, which he deliuered with these wordes, Blessed art thou O LORD our GOD, King of the world, creator of the fruite of the Vine. Then did they sing a hymme and depart; for the Canon forbad them to eate or drinke any thing after the hymme. These were the Paschall rites in the time of CHRIST, who also vsed that reiterated both washing (saith Scaliger) and supper, and also the hymme. They were in the Euen of the fourteenth day to purge their houses of leauen, and that throughout the lande, where the Lambe might not be eaten. All the Israelites were inioyned this dutie: and they which by occasion of iourning or vncleanesse could not now celebrate the Pascheouer, were to obserue it the next moneth, Numb. 9.

The day after, or second day of this Paschall Feast, they were to bring to the Priest a Gomer of the first-fruits of their Corne, and a Lambe, with other duties for a burnt burnt offering to the Lord: before which time they might not care of the new yeares fruits, which at that time in those Countries beganne to ripen, and so to acknowledge Gods the giver thereof. Phil. faith, That each private man, which otherwise brought in his sacrifice to the Priest, sacrificed or slew this sacrifice with his owne hands: and elsewhere it hee affirmeth the same. Elexarum, or as other say the Synedrion, ordained three hundred and fiftie yeares before the birth of Christ, that the Passover should not be solemnized on the second, fourth, or sixth day of the weeke: and therefore when it fell on the sixth day, which we call Friday, it was deferred to the seventh, at the time of Christs Passion, and he with his Disciples ate it the night before, according to the Law of God.

This Elexarum ordained, that the Feast of Lots should not be celebrated on the second, fourth, or seventh: Or Pentecost on the third, fifth, or seventh: Or that of the Tabernacles on the first, fourth, and sixe: Or the Fast of Expiation, on the first, third, or five: Or their New-yeares day, on the first, fourth, and sixt, which decree is extant in the booke of Gambiel, Panties Master, which they did superstitiously, to avoide two Sabbaths, (in so strict a rest) together, and carrying boughes on the Sabbath, if that feast fell thereon, and on other such reasonlesse reasons.

After this sixteenth day of the moneth, or second day of the unleavened bread, in which first of all, sickle was thrust into the Haruest, to offer the first fruits thereof unto God, were numbered seven intire weekes, and the next day, which was the fiftieth, (accounting inclusively) was celebrated the Feast of Pentecost, receiving his name of that reckoning of fiftie: and Sabesnach, that is, of weekes, because of this reckoning of seven weekes, it is called also the Feast of the Haruest of the first fruits: the rites thereof are prescribed, Leuit. 23. The institution was in respect of the Law then given on Mount Sinai, and a type of that Evangelicall Law, which CHRIST, having ascended vp on high, did write not in Tables of stone, but in fleshe Tables of the heart, when (at the same time) hee gaue the holy Ghost to his Disciples, as a remembrance also of the Author of their Haruest-fruits, and every good gift.

As the seventh day in the weeke, so the seventh moneth in the yeare, was in a great part festiual: fittest for that purpose, as the fruits of the Earth being now winned.

The first day of this moneth was, besides the ordinat Kalends or Festiual New-Moone, the Feast of Trumpets, in respect of that rite then observed of sounding Trumpets, being their New-yeares day, after the civill account: the institution is read Leuit. 23. and Num. 29. Whether, as some of the Rabbines will have it, for Isaaks deliverance, that in remembrance of that Ramme, these Rams-horne Trumpets should be sounded, or in regard of their warres, or in respect of that spirituall warfare which continueth our whole life, or that this was so festiual a moneth, or the beginning of their yeare for civill accounts, and for the Sabbaticall and Iubilee-yeares, or for some other cause, let the wiser Reader iudge.

On the tenth day of this moneth was the Feast or Fast of Reconciliation or Expiation, a day of publike penance, fasting and afflicting themselves, described in Leuit. 16. throughout the Chapter, and chap. 22 wherein is lively in that type shewed the office of Iesus Christ, the eternall high Priest, who hath alone wrought our atonement, entered into the Holy place of heaven, and laid our sinnes on the scape-Goate, bearing them, and satisfying for them in his owne person on the Crosse, and by the sprinkling of his blood sanctified vs for ever to God his Father. Paul, Heb. 9. doth unfold the mysterie of this dayes rites, wherein only, the high Priest alone might enter into the holy place, and himselfe alone performe the other offices of Expiation. The Jewes thought, that this fasting and afflicting themselves was in respect of their Idolatrie with the golden Calse, and therefore it seemed, that in Theodores time they did not afflict themselves, but sported rather in obscure and profane manner. The sacrifices are set downe. Num. 29. 8. 9. 10. 11.

The next Feast was that of Tabernacles; in remembrance that howsoever they now dwell in strong Cities, goodly houses, &c. yet their fathers lived in Tents in the wilderness, where God by a cloud in the day time, and fire in the night protected that people. It is expressed Leu. 23. Num. 29. Dent. 16. It was observed from the fifteenth to the one and twentieth, the first and last of them being (as at the Passé-over) more solemnely feastuall, with abstinence from labour, and a generall Conuocation. They were the first day to take boughes & branches of trees, and to make therewith booths, and to dwell in-boothes seven dayes. This was neglected from the time of Iosuah, till the dayes of Nehemiah,<sup>1</sup> when hee and Ezra solemnized this feast seven dayes with booths on their house-tops, and in their Courts and streets, with Lectures every day out of the Law, and solemne assembly on the eight day. The Hebrewes report that they made them bundles of that matter, which they carryed, every day of the seven, up and downe in the morning before they might eate, wherupon it was called the Feast of Palmes or Willowes. The seventh day, saith Paulus Fagius,<sup>2</sup> they compassed the Altar with these boughes seven times, in remembrance of the fall of Iericho, Andreas Osiander,<sup>3</sup> affirmeth that they vsed this carrying about boughes every day, especially the seventh, in which they observed a kinde of Procession or Litanie singing, Ann Iebona Hosanna ana Iebona batz elicha-na: first reckoning vp a great number of the names of God, then of his attributes: thirdly, of the things which they wish to bee bestowed, then of themselves and other things, interlacing every particular of these with singing Hosanna, like their Ora pro nobis in the Popish Letanie. Then they alter it in another forme, Pray redeeme the Vine of thy planting, Hosanna, &c. then in another, As thou savedst the strong in Egypt, when thou went'st out for their deliuerance, so Hosanna, &c. Then in a longer forme of prayers, with this foot of the song Hosanna: and lastly all rings Hosanna, Hosanna: and hereupon the later Iewes called this feast Hosanna, as also those bundles of boughes: and although that the later Iewes haue now added much, the Iewes of Italie differing from them of Germanie, yet in Christis time the acclamations of Hosanna, when he came riding on an Asse into Ierusalem, testifie some such obseruation then amongst them.

The sacrifices of euery day are designed Num. 29. The first day, thirteene bullocks, the second, twelue, and euery day one lesse to the seventh: in all 70. (as the Rabbins interpret it) according to the number of the 70. languages of the Nations, which shall be subdued to the Messias; and 98. Lambs, in respect of so many curses in the Law, against the transgressing Israelites.

The eight day was the Feast which they called Hauizib, and Azeretb, that is Collection, called also the great day of the Feast, in the two and twentieth day of this moneth Tisri. In this they were to contribute to the continuall Sacrifices, and publike thanksgiuing was made for the fruits of the Earth, and the first fruits of the later fruits were offered. Ieroboam in an irreligious policie remoued the Feast of Tabernacles from the seventh moneth to the eight, from Tisri to Marchesuan.

After seven times seven yeares which make fortie nine, they were to reckon Iobell or yeare of Iubilee, Leu. 25. beginning on the day of Reconciliation: Wherein seruants were freed, debts remitted, possessions that had bene alienated, returned, the law allowing no further sales, proclaymed with sound of a Trumpet of a Rammes-horne, and therefore called Iobel, which signifieth a Ramme, or Rammes-horne.

Touching this yeare of Iubilee is much controuersie. The ancient Authors account it the fiftieth yeare. Scaliger refuseth their authoritie herein. Many moderne writers hold the same opinion, as Hosinian,<sup>1</sup> Melancthon, Fabritius, Paduanns, &c.<sup>2</sup> Caluif hath at large disputed this question against Crentzheimius and Bucholarius, by diuers arguments prouing that the Iubilee was but fortie nine yeares complete, and that the fiftieth yeare was the first onwards of another Iubilee or Sabbath of yeares: Yet is this space reckoned by fiftie, as Onid calls the Olympiad, quinquennis Olympias: Aristophanes,<sup>3</sup> and Aufonius<sup>4</sup> affirming the like: and yet the Olympiad is but foure yeares complete, and reckoned from the fifth to the fift exclusively. Otherwise they should haue

haue had two Sabbaticall yeares together, namely the fortie ninth being the seventh yeare, and the next which was the fiftieth yeare. As for the later Writers, they might be deceived by following the streame, and beguiled by the Papists Iubilee, which Boniface the eight, before called Benedictus, (and yet neither was good saye nor doer) instituted, Anno 1300. to bee obserued euery hundreth yeare: and Clement the sixt abridged to the fiftieth: as Auentinus, Trithemius, Crantzius, and other haue written. Whether they were Heathenish in imitating the Ludi seculares, or Iewish, in following the legall Iubilee: Certaine it is, Rome thereby becomes a rich Mart, where the Marchants of the Earth resort from all places of the Earth to buy heauen: and Babylon the great Citie is clothed in fine linnen and purple and scarles, and gilded with gold and precious stones and pearles, with the gaires of her Warres, giuing in exchange the soules of men, washed from their sinnes; A thing more precious to Christ then his most precious blood. But his pretended Vicars haue learned to effect it (the filling of their purse) with greater ease: deuout Pilgrims from all parts, visiting Saint Peters staires, whence they goe truly Saint Peters heires, Siluer and gold haue I none, and yet finde their Pardons too cheape to be good. But to returne to our Pilgrimage, and to obserue the obseruation of the Iewish Iubilee; This feast was partly ciuill in regard of the poore, of the inheritances, of the Israelitish Families, specially that of the Messias, and of the computation of times, as amongst the Greekes by Olympiads, and amongst the Romans by Lustra and Indictiones: partly also it was mysticall in regard of the Gospell of Christ, preaching libertie and peace to the Conscience, the acceptable yeare of the Lord.

And thus much of those feasts which God himselfe instituted to this Nation; which how the Iewes of later times haue corrupted, and doe now superstitiously obserue, instituting others also of their owne deuifings, shall bee handled in due place. Wee are next to speake of those feasts, which vpon occasions they imposed vpon themselves before the coming of Christ: to which we will adde a brieue Kalendar of all their Fasts and Feasts.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Feasts and Fasts, which the Iewes instituted to themselves: with a Kalendar of their feasts and fasts through the yeare as they are now obserued.

He Prophet Zacharie, in his seventh and eight Chapters mentioneth certaine fasting dayes which the Iewes by Ecclesiasticall Iniunction obserued. One in the tenth day of the tenth moneth, because that on that day Ierusalem began to bee besieged. 2. Reg. 24. A second fast was obserued on the ninth day of the fourth moneth, in remembrance that then the Chaldeans entred the Citie.

A third fast they held on the ninth day of the fift moneth in respect of the Citie and Temple burned on that day. First, by Nabuchodonosor; Secondly, by Titus, on the same day: which the Iewes doe yet obserue with strict penance, going bare-foot and sitting on the ground, reading some sad Historie of the Bible, and the Lamentations of Jeremie, three times ouer.

Their fourth fast they celebrated on the third day of the seventh moneth, in remembrance of Godoliah slaine by Ismael; Ieru. 41. 42. 2. Reg. vii. To these are reckoned the fast of Ester, in the thirteenth day of Adar, their twelfth moneth; and on the seauenteenth day of the fourth moneth, in the remembrance of the Tables of the Law broken by Moses: the institution whereof seemeth to bee late; seeing the Scripture doth not mention it. In this moneth the Egyptians kept the Feast or Fast of their Osiris, lamenting for him, which seemeth to bee the same that is mentioned, Ezech. 8. Where women are sayd to mourne for Tammuz, whom Plutarch calleth Amuz, and from

Caluif. 3477.

On the <sup>a</sup>fourteenth and fifteenth dayes of Adar, they kept the feast of Phurim, or lots instituted in remembrance of that deliuerance from Haman; by the authoritie of Ioachim the high Priest, as Functius relateth out of Phil. Anno M. 3463. Antonini Margarita a christned Iew, reporteth that on these dayes the Iewes reade the historie of Ester, and so often as Haman is mentioned, they smite on their seares with their fists, and hammers, otherwise spending the time of this feast in Bacchanall riots and excessse.

b Ioseph. de bello Iud. l. 1. c. 17.

They had the feast also of wood-carrying called Zeusapoch, mentioned by <sup>b</sup>Iosephus, in which the custome was for euery one to carrie wood to the Temple to maintaine the fire of the Altar.

c Ios. Ant. 13. v. 2.

The Feast of Dedication, otherwise called the Feast of Lights, and the institution thereof is largely described, Maccab. 4. in remembrance of the institution of diuine worship and sacrifice in the Temple, which had bene by Antiochus polluted, and sacred to Iupiter Olympus, all the seruices appointed by the Law being abolished. By Iudas Maccabeus, the Temple and Altar, and other holy instruments, were dedicated the same day three yeares after their first pollution, called therefore the feast of Lights, as I thinke, saith Iosephus, because so vnexpected a light shone forth vnto them. But Franciscus Iunius, in his Annotations vpon the Syrian translation of the tenth of Iohn, where this Feast is mentioned, allegeth out of the Talmud, another cause as followeth. When on the five and twentieth day of Cisleu they entred into the Temple, they found not pure oyle, except in one little Vessel, which contained sufficient for the lamps but one day, of which oyle they lighted the lamps in order, which lasted eight dayes, till they pressed out of the Oliues cleane Oyle. And therefore the Wise-men of that time decreed, that yearly those eight dayes beginning at the five and twentieth of Cisleu should be dayes of ioy, and that euery one in the doores of their houses euery evening, during those eight dayes, should light lamps, for declaration of that miracle, wherein they must not fast nor lament.

Likewise 1. Mac. 13. is ordayned festiuall the three and twentieth day of Iar, for the expiation of the Tower of Ierusalem by Simon Mac.

Sigonius reckoneth also the feast of Iephia, in the end of the yeare, which yet is not like to haue continued in succeeding ages: and of the fire that wee haue mentioned in 2. Mac. 1. and the feast of Iudith, for killing Holofernes: and on the fourteenth day of Adar, for the victorie against Nicanor, Ios. l. 12. Their later feasts I shall mention and declare their seuerall ceremonies, when we come to speake of their later times, and of the present Iewish superstition. In the meane time I thinke it not amisse to set downe here out of Scaliger, a view or Kalendar of their moneths, with the feasts and fasts, as they are obserued therein at this day.

CHAP. VII.

*Of the ancient Oblations. Gifts, and Sacrifices of the Jewes: of their
and Religious.*

Although Moses doth handle this matter of their Rites and Sacrifices, and is herein seconded and interpreted by the succeeding Prophets, so fully, that it may seeme a pouring of water into the Sea, to speake needlessly, or by our Discourse, to obscure, rather than illustrate, that which is so largely and plainly there expressed; yet because of that subiect which we haue in hand, I cannot altogether be silent (at least of the Kindes and heads) referring the desirous Reader, for his more perfect satisfaction in particulars, to those clearer propheti-<sup>all</sup> fountaines. Their Rites for time and place we haue already described: The next intended part of this Iewish relation shall be of their Oblations, which were either Gifts or Sacrifices. Their Sacrifices were such oblations, wherein the thing offered was in whole or part consumed in diuine worship, for the most part by fire or shedding of blood. These were of eight sorts. Burnt-offerings; Meat-offerings; Peace-offerings; Sinne-offerings; Trespasse-offerings; the offerings of the Consecration; Cleansing and Expiation. <sup>a</sup> Philo reduceth them to three: Burnt, Peace, and Sinne-offerings, according to the three causes of sacrificing; The worship of God, the obtaining of good things, and freedome from euill. <sup>b</sup>

The Burnt-offerings were by fire consumed, the Rites and manners hereof is expressed, Leuiticus 1, the fire was to be perpetuall on the Altar, being that which God miraculously sent from heauen to consume Aarons sacrifice; for neglecting which, and vsing other, his two sonn<sup>s</sup> Nadab and Abihu were stricken by a reuenging fire from God. The Mente-offring was made of fine flower, without hony or leuen, and

and with oyle and incense on the alter, or frying-pan, or oven, or caldron, according to the rites prescribed, Leuit. 2: partly sacred to the Lord by fire, the rest to bee the Priests. The Peace-offerings are with their proper ceremonies enjoined, Leuit. 3. and 7: the fat and kidneyes were to be burned on the Altar (the fat and bloud being universally forbidden them for food) the breast and right shoulder was the Priests: the rest to the Sacrificer, to be eaten the first, or at furthest on the second day: or else on the third to bee burned with fire. The offering for sinners of ignorance, for the Priest, Prince, People, or priuate man, is set downe, Leuit. 4. and 6. The Sinne-offering, in case of contempt, where the sinne is committed against God and man willingly, with the due manner thereof is expressed, Leuit. 6. To these were adioyned Prayers and praises, with musicall voyces, and instruments, Cymbals, Violes, Harpes, and Trumpets resounding, For he is good, for his mercie endureth for ever. The first kinde of Sacrifices was proper to the Priests at their consecration, recorded Leuit. 6. 20. The seventh mentioned sacrifice is of purification or cleansing, as of a woman after child-birth, Lev. 12. or of a Leper, 13. 14. or for vncleane issues of men and women, chap. 15. The eighth is the sacrifice of Expiation or Reconciliation, on that festiual or fasting-day before spoken of, Leuit. 16. Hereunto may we adde the lights and the daily offerings of incense, morning and euening, Exod. 30. on a golden Altar, whereunto the Priests onely had access, with such perfume onely as is there prescribed.

The Gifts, which we haue reckoned a second sort of Oblations, that were not as the former in whole, or in part consumed in their offering, but preserved whole and sound, were giuen, either according to the Law, or by Vow, or of free will. The Law prescribed First fruits and Tithes, and the personall halfe-shekel. The first fruits of Man, of beasts, and of the fruits of the earth, the Law exacteth, Exod. 22, 23. and are assigned to the Priests, Num. 5. and 18. which, of men and vncleane beasts, were to be redeemed, of others to be sacrificed. Of Tithes, when we consider the assignement of them to the Tribe of Leui, we must so farre acknowledge them Leuiticall and Ceremoniall. But some, considering the paying of them to a Priest, so soone as we read of a Priest, in Scripture, and that by the father of the faithfull (which the Apostle vrgeth against Leuiticall Ceremonies, in that Leui himselfe in Abraham payed them) and his nephew Iacob vowed the payment thereof, so soone as God should giue him whereof to pay Tithes; and that (the first times of the Christian Church excepted, wherein there was no such settled order for things of this and like nature) Tithes were payed to the Church, vntill the Arch-enemie of God and his Church, in his Antichristian supremacie robbed the Ministers of that due, which in Gods right they before held, appropriating the living of the Altar to them that liued not at the Altar, but yet ordinarily leauing them to the Church (as they then accounted the Church) cannot so easily subscribe to that opinion, perhappes more common then true, which disannull diuine right of the non-paying Tithes, as being then a Iewish and Leuiticall ceremonie. But I leaue the Reader to discusse this matter further, with Master Carleton * in his Treatise of that argument (not to mention the Canonists) whose reasons, if they want weight in any mans iudgement, yet let the same consider another supplie, not at all fauouring of Iudaisme: namely, that <sup>b</sup> Tithes are due to Christian Ministers by Vow: Christian Common-weales, and Counsells hauing consecrated them to God and his Church: neither is it now time after the Vowes to enquire, and <sup>c</sup> without Diuine dispensation to alter it, without satisfaction sufficient. But leauing this sore too tender to be touched, and yet little touching and mouing some consciences pretended tender; let vs view the Tithes, as they then were, Iewish. In Leuit. 27. 30. is a declaration of the Lords right, All Tithes are the Lords; and an assignation of the same, Numb. 18. 21. Behold, I haue giuen the children of LEVI all the tenth, &c. Saint <sup>d</sup> Hierome reckons foure sorts of Tithes: first, that which the people paid to the Leuites: secondly, that which the Leuites hence paid to the Priests <sup>e</sup>: thirdly, that which they referred for expence in their solemne feasts when they went to the Tabernacle or Temple <sup>f</sup>. The fourth was a third yeares Tenth, which was then laid vp for the Leuite, and the poore amongst them <sup>g</sup>. The practise hereof Nehemiah restored in the reformation of Religion, Nehem. 10. when the First-fruits and Tenths were brought to the treasure or chambers of the house of God, <sup>a</sup> Ioseph Scaliger hath written a Treatise of Tithes, the summe whereof is this. Euery thing which was food for man, and was laid vp for preservation, if it receiued increase from the Earth, was subiect to offerings, and consequently to first fruits and Tithes. Garden-herbes were not exempted: they tithed Mints and Annise. (But <sup>b</sup> Drusius saith this was of tradition, and not of the Law: for the Law required onely the tenths, proventus tui, of the increase, vnder which name (saith he) those came not.) Out of these they first paid the first fruites: secondly, <sup>c</sup> Theruma: thirdly, a two-fold tith, and these all in their due order. The husbandman might not touch any of his increase before these deductions. First fruits of corne, grapes and oliues were offered in the basket: but the Theruma and Tith onely of the kindes already dressed and prepared, as wheate fanned, oyle and wine. Corne in the eare, and so the rest was called Tahal: after they were made readie, the Theruma was taken <sup>d</sup> from the heape and given to the Priests: this was called the great Theruma, and was not defined by Moses, but the ancient Lawyers determined that it might not be lesse then the fourth or fifth, or at least the sixth part: the first they called the Theruma of a good eye, the second indifferent, the last of an euill eye, and niggardly. When this was taken away for the Priests, the rest of the heape was tithed for the Leuite: this was called the first tith, and the tenth part thereof the Leuites gaue to the Priests, which was called the tith of the tith, or the Theruma of the tith. For the former Theruma they named the great Theruma, because it was more then this. After this deducted, the Leuites might freely vse the other nine parts of the tith (which before they might not) whether in, or out of Ierusalem. The Husband-man or Lay-man, was yet to pay another called the second tith, namely, the tenth part of that which remained to him after the first tith: and this also was holy, nor might be spent, but before God in the Court of the Temple. And therefore it was to be carried to Ierusalem or if the way were long or tedious, they might be sold, and a fifth <sup>e</sup> part was then to bee added: with this money they were to buy wine, oyle, sacrifices and other necessities at Ierusalem where with the Husbandman & the Leuite were to feast in the Temple. After this second tith paid, they might (and not before) vse the rest as lay chattels (to borrow the word of my learned friend Mr. Selden of the Inner Temple, whose bookes and notes haue furnished this booke with no few notes in this and other arguments) Scaliger giues them a Latine name, Pollutilla, that is, exposed, viz. to common or profane vse. For better view hereof: if the husbandman had six thousand measures of wheate, wine or oyle, he must pay a fourth or fifth, or at least a sixth part, that is, an hundred in the name of his <sup>f</sup> Theruma. Of the five thousand and nine hundred remaining, the first tith will diduct fise hundred foure score and ten, of which the Leuites must pay to the Priests fiftie nine: as tith of the tith. Now out of the five thousand three hundred and ten yet remaining, the husbandman is to pay the second tith, which come to five hundred thirtie and one, and then there remaine to his owne vse, exposed or lay chattels foure thousand seuen hundred seuentie & nine. So that the first and second tith were in proportion as nineteene of the hundred, besides the greater Theruma; all these out of the corne readie fanned: before which also they paid the first fruits in the eare. Further, <sup>g</sup> the husbandman was bound to carrie them to Ierusalem, and there to deliuer them to the Treasurers, which were Leuites <sup>h</sup> depured in diuers offices, to the custodie of these things as fully appeareth, <sup>i</sup> 2. Chron. 31. And if he did not carry them himselfe, he must send them by his Delegates: touching whom, the Law exacted that they should not bee of the Gentiles. As for the second tith, they might redeeme it, with adding a fifth part ouer and aboue the price. Tobit is a perfect patterne of this: <sup>m</sup> The first tith of all increase (they are his owne words) I gaue to the sonnes of Aaron, who ministred at Ierusalem: the second tith I sold, and went and spent it euery yeare at Ierusalem: And the third I gaue vnto them to whom it was meet. The vulgar Latine reads this last, so that he ministred euery third yeare all his tithing to the Proselytes and strangers. And it ought, saith Scaliger, rather to be called the tith of the third yeare, then the <sup>n</sup> third tith: for this was no other but the first tith, so that what was paid in the first and second yeare, and in the fourth and fifth of that weeke, of yeares or seuen yeares space, (the seuenth whereof was alway Sabbaticall, and freed from tillage, first fruits, Theruma and tithing in the name

name of the first tithes; the same in third and sixth yeares were not carried to Ierusalem, but laid vp in the barnes and store-houses of the husband-man, who to vse the words of Moses, It was to lay them vp within his gates: And the Leuite, because he had no part nor inheritance with thee, and the stranger, and the fatherlesse, and the widow, which are within thy gates shall come, and shall eat and be satisfied. The Iewes still in all places of their habitations obserue the seventh yeare Sabbaticall; and therefore pay not then any first fruits or Theruma; as for Tithes, they were not to be paid but at the Temple, which is now destroyed: neither haue they any certaine stocke of Priests or Leuites (howsoever many are so named) and therefore being asked of vs, saith Sealiger, if they might repaire the Sanctuarie in Mount Moriah, whether they would offer any sacrifices; they answered, no, because there is now no Priest-hood in Israel. So desperate is their desolation. Now lest any deceit might be vsed in tithing, there were officers appointed, which were called b Faithfull: these searched the houses suspected of non-payment: that encrease whereof the tithing was vncertaine, was called Eamai. From the Dedication of Maccabees, to the time of Iohn Hyrcanus, all payed their first fruits and Theruma, but few their Tithes, because those Faithfull were vnfaithfull, and corrupted with gifts: but then the great Countell decreed that none should be chosen of that office, but such as were, as they were called. From thence to the destruction of the Temple they were truly payed. The First-fruits, Therumoth and Tithes were not payed all at one time, but each kinde at their owne time, as wheat in Siran after Pentecost, wine in Tisri, oyle in Tebeth: and so of the rest.

Besides First-fruits and Tithes, they payed to the Treasure personall offerings, in Exod. 30. 12. euery man payed halfe a shekel, which the Hebrewes interpreted to be perpetuall for the maintenance of the Sacrifices; others temporarie, then onely put in practise. As for that collection, 2. King. 12. made by Ihuas for the repairing of the Temple, and that after by Nebemish, Chap. 10. the circumstances shew much difference. This Treasure, in regard of this Poll-money, grew very rich; as appeared in c Crassus robbing the same of ten thousand talents at one time. Besides a great beame of gold, which Eseazarus the Treasurer, vpon Crassus his oath, (afterwards violated neuertheless) to redeeme the rest deliuered to him, weighing three hundred Mina, euery Mina being two pounds two ounces, and a quarter Troy. Tully and other Authors mention these Oblations of the Iewes to their Treasure yearely.

These Gifts and Offerings the Law exacted: they performed many other also, either of their Free-will or of Vow, otherwise little differing from the former; Leuiticus ultimo. Many other Ceremonies of their meates, garments, fastings, trumpets, and in other cases, I hope I shall haue leaue to omitte in this place, and remitte him that would further know of them to the Scripture it selfe, hauing pointed out the principall.

But by this is apparant, which Doctor Downam hath obserued, that all these being deliuered them in the Lords Treasure; without their labour or cost, together with their eight and forrie Cities assigned them, amounting to a farre greater proportion for the maintenance of that small Tribe: then all the Bishopricks, Benefices, Colledge-lands, or whatsoever other Ecclesiasticall endowments and profits in this Land, although the prophane Ammonites or hypocriticall Cloysterers had neuer conspired to shauie off our h beards, and our garments by the buttocks, not leaving to couer our nakednes, or their shame: And yet how sick is Ahab for Naboths vineyard? And would God we had no Lezabels to play the (too cunning) Physitians in this disease. Let me haue a little leaue to say no more then others (for the substance) in Bookes and Sermons haue said alreadie: although those Bellies to whom we speake, haue no eares. The first stroke that wounded vs, and causeth vs still to halt, was from Rome, the mother of abominations and whoredomes. Heere, as in the suburbs of Hell, were founded the Churches ruines: our Bulles of Basbar, (Abbey-lubbers, and Cloysterers) with the leaden hornes of those Roman Bulles haue pushed downe our Churches, (our Chauncells at least) and made them to fall into those k Cages of vncleane Birds, the Popish Monasteries. Of nine thousand two hundred eightie and foure Parishes in England, after <sup>a</sup> M<sup>r</sup>. Camdens account, three thousand eight hundred fortie five were (it is properly termed) impropriated. And who knoweth whether those Appropriations did not supplant these Supplanters, and disappropriate them of that which in a iuster proprietic was giuen them in their first foundations, for that three-folde maintenance of themselves, of learning, and of the poore: yea, happily yet (if we obserue the course of Diuine Iustice) we may see many, whose former inheritances haue by the additions of these, as of a contagious garment, bene infected, and haue eyther died, or bene sicke at the least, of this plague. The Arke when it was in Dagons Temple (because imprisoned in an Idoll Temple) brake Dagons necke; and when it was thence translated to their Cities, they also were filled with diseases. Our Arke hath thus dealt with the Temples, and cannot well brooke the Cities and lay-hands which imprison, or (if they will) appropriate it. O that they would once send it home where it should be! How fitly and fully doe those words of Habacuk <sup>b</sup> agree to the houses founded for Religion, by this and like irreligion peruerred, and at last subuerted? They coueted an euill conuersione to their houses; they consulted shame to their owne houses, by destroying many people, and sinned against their owne soules. The stone hath cryed out of the wall, and the beam out of the ymber hath answered it, Woe vnto him that buildeth a Towne with blood, and erecteth a Cittie by iniquitie. Thus we see, the stones haue cryed out of their walls indeed, and by their demolished heapes may receiue Labans name, Jegar sehadubai, the heape of wittnesse, their ruines remayning testimonies of Gods iudgements. A violent streame (saith M<sup>r</sup>. <sup>c</sup> Camden) breaking through all obstacles, hath rushed out vpon the Ecclesiastick state of this Land, and ouerwhelmed, to the Worlds wonder, and Englands griefe, the greatest part of the English Clergie, with their most beautifull buildings; and those riches which the Christian pietie of the English had from the time of their first Christianitie consecrated to God, were (as it were) in a moment disperfed, and (if I may so say) profaned.

Let none traduce me as a troubler of Israel, and a traducer of our Law and State, which haue thus both changed and setled these things, I enueigh against Abisols conspiracy, and Achitophels deuises, which were the troublers of Israell, and so disturbed the iust heart of righteous Dauid, that on the sudden he a little forgate the exact rule: and commanded, Thou e and Ziba diuide the Lands. So (if loosers may haue leaue to speake) our Parliament (perhaps with some extasie of ioy, for remouing the links and linkes of superstition) had in those busie times but negligent consideration of Mephiboseths right; and our Vicar Mephiboseths, the Clergie then, did not much vrge in, yea we would still say of these our halting Zibaes, Let them take all, rather then we should want our Lord and his Gospel, to come home to us in peace. And in peace, let them rest which were Authors of this peace to vs; and let vs pray that a worse generation of Vipers doe not arise, and that the Canker-worms eat not what the Grasshopper hath left, and the Gutterpillar the residue of the Canker-worms. I meane those Latron-patrons, and Patron-latrons, whereof these extend to the vermost whatsoeuer might, and whatsoeuer colour of right, in Exemptions, Customes, <sup>b</sup> Priuiledges and prauiledges, where by euery John a Stile shall intercept the Churches due, or by a weightier fee, force a composition, or wrangle out some broken Title, or breake the necke of the Cause with a Prohibition: the other hauing a trust committed, maketh himselfe a Bawde, and selleth his Church (which cost no meaner price then the blood of Christ) for money. Oh Christ, ouerthrowe the Tables of these Money-changers, and with some whip drive them, scourge them out of thy Temple, which supplant thy plantations, and hinder the gayning of Soules for gain. Withstand these Balaams, which for Balaacks blessing, care not what curse they bring vpon Israell, which present for presents, and scape to maintaine their carnall liuing, out of our spirituall Liuing; to bestow on their Hawks, their Hounds, their! But whether hath this passion or zeale (Truth I am sure) transported me? Truly, the fixed starres in our Westminster firmament (and may not I so call it, where is such a Starre-Chamber, shining with the bright beames of Iustice?) I admire, and almost adore in silence; only those wandering planets which selfe-guile in selfe accuseth, doe I here accuse.

<sup>f</sup> And all they challenge as theirs, driving the poore Vicar to shew composition or prescription: They know who cast at all, Luk. 4. 7. and said, Mibi tradita sunt, (ye may English it here) they are betrayed to me.

And for these, and all the Churches enemies, Let God arise, and his enemies (or their enmitie) be scattered, that there be no more such <sup>h</sup> Ababs, as I mentioned, which hauing more then enough, seeme to haue nothing; as long as Naboth hath something which they can long for: and that there be no <sup>i</sup> Elisabets, which shall promise Tobias the Ammonite a Chamber in the house of the Lord: that neyther any abuse the profession of Law, directly; nor the possession of Patronage, indirectly; (for abuses onely I taxe) so to discouer our Churches nakednesse, that euery Cham (the prophane Atheist, and superstitious Papist) may espie and deride the same, wherein themselves are the most guiltie amongst vs; although none are more ready to <sup>k</sup> tell in Gath, or publish it in the streets of Askelon, that the daughters of Babylon may triumph.

After that we haue spoken of the Times, Places and Rites sacred to God, order requireth next to speake of those persons, whose office and function it was to procure and manage those Diuine and Religious affaires. And first, amongst the first Hebrewes, we finde no Priest named before Abrahams time, in which Melchizedech was interpreted by the most, to be Schem the sonne of Noah, Father both of this and other Nations; and Master Broughton hath written a whole booke in confirmation hereof. The heads of Families then exercised the Priestly office of teaching, praying, and sacrificing in their owne households, as we reade of <sup>l</sup> Abraham, <sup>m</sup> Isaac; and <sup>n</sup> Isaac. After that, the first borne of all the Tribes of Israel were consecrated to this business, when as God had destroyed the first-borne of Egypt, and these offered sacrifices, <sup>o</sup> vntill that the Leuites were chosen in their roome; <sup>p</sup> God turning the Propheticall curse of Isaac, of scattering them in Israel, into a blessing, for the instructing of the Israelites. The cause of this their consecration was, because they, <sup>q</sup> in a zeale of Gods glorie had sanctified their handes to this ministerie in the blood of the nearest of their idolatrous kindred, that had sinned in adoring the golden Calse.

Now in the third of Numbers, where the first-borne of the Israelites, and the Leuites are numbred, appeareth a difficultie, which most of the Interpreters which I haue read of that place, haue neglected: namely, that of the Israelitish first-borne there were found, from a moneth-olde vpward, two and twentie thousand; two hundred, seuentie and three, and of the Leuites, but two and twentie thousand; so that therefore there must bee fise sheekles a peece payed for the redemption of euery of those two hundred seuentie and three in surplusage more then the Leuites; whereas yet in the parcells of the Leuiticall account, are found more of the Leuites then of the Israelites, as appeareth; the family of the Gershonite, contayning seuen thousand and five hundred, the Kohathites, eight thousand sixe hundred, and the family of Morari, six thousand and two hundred, which beeing added together, amount to two and twentie thousand and three hundred; and therefore are seuen and twentie more then the Israelites. To this <sup>r</sup> Lyra, <sup>s</sup> Dionysius, <sup>t</sup> Caribianus, and <sup>u</sup> Iunius (for the most are wholly silent) answer, that those three hundred ouer and aboue the two and twentie thousand were first borne themselves, and therefore in right of the former challenge of the first-borne, were the Lords already. And if it seeme as much wonder, (which Author obserue not) that of two and twentie thousand were but three hundred first-borne; <sup>v</sup> That their exploit of executing their kindred for Idolatrie (before mentioned) in which sinne, the first-borne, as Priests, were likeliest to haue followed Aaron, a chiefe man of their Tribe, might answer for me. And that cruell Edict <sup>w</sup> of Pharao, and their miraculous fruitfulness, may make it lesse strange, that both in these Leuites there were so few first-borne, and in the other Israelites also, with whom amongst 603550 men from twenty yeares olde vpwards, there were (though reckoning but from a moneth olde, as is said) but two and twentie thousand two hundred seuentie three, which is little more then one of seuen and twenty, besides that inequality of the persons numbred. Likewise as <sup>x</sup> Phil. Ferdinand hath obserued out of Abraham ben Daud, if a woman first brought forth a female, neyther that nor the sonne, if she had any after, were of these sanctified first-borne. This excursion vpon this occasion, wherein I haue found diuers Interpreters mute, will (I hope) find pardon with the Reader, who happily himselfe may finde some better resolution.

To returne to our Historie; God had before appointed Aaron to bee high Priest, and his Sonnes to bee Priests, to whom the Leuites were assigned after (as wee haue said) as assistants in inferiour offices of the Tabernacle. Aaron, from whom is reckoned the succession of the high Priests, in the same office, had appointed to him eight holy garments, a Breast-plate, an Ephod, a Robe, a broidered coate, a Miter, a Girdle, a plate of golde, and linnen breeches. Also his sonnes had appointed to them coates, and Boners and Girdles, and Breeches: which their attire is described at large, Exod. 28. Iosephus writeth of the stones there mentioned, That that on the Priests right shoulder shined forth very bright; when God was pleased with their Sacrifices, as did also those twelue in the breast-plate, when in the time of warre God would assist them, which ceased miraculously to shine two hundred yeares before his time; or as the Talmudists say, from the building of the second Temple.

The consecration of the Priests, and rites thereof are mentioned, Exod. 29. The conditions required in the high Priest, as that he should not haue the bodily defects of blindnesse, lameness, maymednesse, &c. nor should vncouer his head, and many other such like; are expressed, Leuit. 21. His office was daily to light the Lights at the evening, and to burne incense at morning and evening, and once euery Sabbath to set the Shew-bread before the Lord to sacrifice, and once a yeare to make reconciliation in the holy place, &c. This office they executed till the captiuitie, after which they ruled also in the Common-wealth; and the familie of the Maccabees obtaigned temporall and spirituall iurisdiction; being both Priests and Kings. But the state being vsurped by others, they also appointed high Priests at their pleasures: and thus were Annas and Caiphas high Priests, although Caiphas alone administered the office, which was abrogated to Annas, the name only remayning; and thus Iosephus saith, that Anna was most happy, who had himselfe bene high Priest; and seene all his sonnes in that office, whereas in the institution, and before the Captiuitie, this office continued ordinarily with their liues: which after they enioyed longer or shorter, at pleasure of the Conquerour.

Next vnto the high Priest, were the Priests lineally descended from Eleazar and Ithamar the sonnes of Aaron, as in number many, so in their Priestly rayments, consecration, condition, and office, much differing from the former, as appeareth; for their garments, Leuit. 28. their consecration 29. their conditions required in them, Leuit. 10. and 21. and their office in some things, as preaching, praying, sacrificing, not much vnlike to the former, but in degree, sometime assisting him in these things, sometime alone, and in some things, nothing participating, as in Moses plainly may be seene. These priestly families, being of the house of Eleazar sixteene, and of Ithamar eight, which Dauid by lot distributed into foure and twentie orders, according to the number of the heads of families, those foure and twentie men, chiefe of those orders, being to the high Priest, as Aarons sonnes were vnto him in their ministerie, 1. Chron. 24. and tooke turnes by course<sup>b</sup>, in performing of the same as Luke sheweth<sup>i</sup> in the example of Zacharias. Iosephus<sup>k</sup> testifieth the same, and affirmeth, That in each of these ranks were more then fife thousand men in his time: and in the historie of his life, saith, that himselfe was of the first of these orders, betwixt which was no small difference, and the heads of these were called also Chiefe Priests<sup>l</sup> in the old and new Testament. * It was by their law forbidden on paine of death to any Priest or Leuite, to intermeddle in anothers function. But at the three solemne feasts any of the Priests which would were permitted to minister, and to participate with those whose course it then was: only they might not offer the vowes, or free-will, or ordinarie offerings.

The Leuites had the next place in the Legall ministerie: all that descended of Leui, except the familie of Aaron, being thus called: and Num. 3. according to the descent of the three sonnes of Leui had their offices assigned them, which so continued till the dayes of Dauid. Hee distributed them according to their families vnto their seuerall functions, twentie foure thousand to the seruice of the Temple: fixe thousand to bee Iudges and Rulers, foure thousand Porters, and foure thousand which praised the Lord vpon instruments. These were diuided vnder their Heads or Principalls according to their <sup>a</sup> families. The Leuiticall Musicians, with their Offices and Orders are reckoned 1. Chron. 25. and 2. Chron. 7. These instead of the silken stole, which they wanted, obtained in the daies of Agrippa, to weare a linnen one, like the Priests. The Porters are in the 26. of 1. Chron. described according to their families, orders and offices. They kept, in their courtes, the doores and treasures of the Temple: to keepe the same cleane, and to keepe that which was vnclane, out of the same: and these all are mustred in their offices 2. Chron. 35.

The Gibeonites, called after Nethanims, were at hand vnto the Leuites in the meane offices about the Tabernacle and Temple, Ios. 9. 21. and 1. Chro. 9. assigned here vnto first by Ioshua, after by Danid and the Princes, for the seruice of the Leuites to cut wood, and drawe water, for the house of God, Ezra 8. Besides these Ecclesiasticall persons in the ordinary ministerie of the temple were other, which may no lesse be counted holie: either in regard of Vow, as the <sup>b</sup> Nazarites for a time: Sampson is an especiall example hereof, and Iames the Iust, brother of our Lord: or else they were Prophets by extraordinarie calling, as Samuel, Esay, Jeremie, and others: to whom God manifested his will by dreames, visions, and reuelations: whose ordinarie habite seemes to be a rugged hairie garment, by the example of <sup>c</sup> Elijah, and the false <sup>d</sup> Prophets, and of <sup>e</sup> Iohn Baptist afterward. And thus much of those persons, which according to the Law were sacred to God: it followeth that we should obserue their superstitions deuoting of themselves, according to their own deuises and traditions, vnto a supposed seruice of God. In a more strict manner then ordinary, or some-what in opinion and practise differing both from the law, and the rest of the Iewish people. Of this kind were many Sects, whereof we are next to speake.

IN this matter of Alterations, and altercations amongst them about Questions and practise of Religion, wee are in the first place to observe their often Apostacies <sup>a</sup> from the truth of the Lawe to the idolatrous superstitions of the neighbouring Nations: as the Reliques of the Egyptian idolatry in the golden Calf, Exod. 32. their often murmurings in the desert, the presumption of Nadab and Abihu, and after of Aaron and Miriam, the conspiracie of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, Balaams stumbling-blocke, to couple them in idolatrous seruice to Baal-Peor, the idoll of the Moabites: And after their possession of the Land, when Ioshua and the Elders were dead, they serued <sup>b</sup> the Gods of the people that were round about them, as Baal and Astartoth: of the idols and their rites is before spoken. And although Gideon cut downe the groue, and destroyed the altar of Baal, <sup>c</sup> yet he made an Ephod of the earrings of the prey, & put it in Ophrah his Citie, and all Israel went awhoring there after it: and after his death, made Baal-berith their God. They serued also the Gods of Aram, Zidon, Moab, Ammon, <sup>e</sup> and the Philistims: Micah <sup>f</sup> an Ephramite made an house of gods, an Ephod, and Teraphim, and consecrated one of his sonnes to be his Priest, and after set a Leuite, Jonathan, in his roome, the occasion of apostacie to a great part of the Tribe of Dan, all the while the house of God was in Shiloh: besides the corruption of state and religion by the <sup>g</sup> Beniamites and by <sup>h</sup> Hophni and Phinehas the sonnes of Eli.

<sup>i</sup> Elias Lenita describeth the forme of sacrificing or hallowing their Teraphim in this sort. They killed a man which was a first-borne, wreathing his head from his body

bodie, and embalming the same with saff and spices: & then wroote vpon a plate of gold the name of an vncleane spirit; and putting the same vnder the head, set it vpon a wall, & burned Candles before it, and worshipped the same. B. Abraham saith, they were Ima- ges of Idols made to receive powder from above, as the idolaters conceived of the gods.

But after the reformation of Religion by Samsel, Diod, and Salomon, (who yet be- came after an idolatry) beset their greatest Apostasie, to wit, of the ten Tribes; from God, their King, and Religion, by the ouer-rulic pollicie of Ieroboam, which corrupted and subverted both it and himselfe. Hee (toe chooe reuolued Israelites should, by fre- quenting Gods appointed worship in Ierusalem, re-acknowledge their former, and truer Lord) consecrated two Aegyptian Calues at Bethel and Dan, and made an House of High Places, and Priests of the lowest of the people.

Ieroboam also made them, in the same times, High Places, Images, and Groves, on e- uery high Hill, and vnder euery greene Tree. Yet had the Kingdome of Iudah their eate courses of corruption and reformation, according as they had good or bad kings; but in Israel, the Common-wealth and Church received, by that sinne of Ieroboam, an irreuerable wound and irrecoverable losse, vntill that, in Gods iust punishment, they were carried away by the Assyrian Kings into Assyria, and into Hala, Habor, and the Cities of the Medes, as 2. Km. 17. appeareth, where is recorded a summarie collecti- on of these and other their idolatries. Of these exiled Iudites (if wee beleeue the re- ports and coine Claires of diuers Authors) are descended those Tartarians, which since ouer-ran, with their Conquests, a greater part of Asia and Europe, then euer any other Nation, before or since: of which, their Originall and Exploits, we shall in futes place further discourse. The other Kingdome of Iudah, although it receaued sometime some breathing and refreshing vnder her more vertuous and religious kings, yet for the most part, groaning vnder Tyranny and idolatry, was at last a prey to the Babylonians: from which seruitude being freed by the Persian Monarches, vnder varieties of aduerse and prosperous fortunes, it was afterwards rent and torne by the Macedonians, being made a common Stage for the Armes and Armies of the successors of Ptolemy in Egypt, and Selucus in Asia, remaining in neede vnto the Conquerour, and receiuing no small impressions and wounds in Soule as well as Bodie, in Religion as in pollicie. But being after deliuered from Macedonian thraldome by the Familie of the Machabees, the Government, Ecclesiastical and Temporall, became theirs, but the minds of this Jew- ish people was in those times diuided in diuersitie of Sects and Opinions, of which the Evangelicall and other Histories make mention.

One diuision was of the whole nation not so much for opinion as for the differing habitation which brought also some circumstances of other differences. The Jewes therefore were generally thus distinguished, the Hebreues which dwelt in Palestina, and the scattered Strangers; as Peter calls them; to wit, the Græcians, (these two sorts are mentioned by Luke. Acts 6. 1.) and the Ἰουδαῖοι Βαβυλωνῶν, or the remain- ders of the depottation on Babylon, the metropolis whereof was Babylon while it re- mained, and after Bagded. The metropolis or head of the Ἰουδαῖοι Ἑσθῆρ or Ἑσθῆρ was Alexandria, where also in Beniamin Tudelensis his time there was a syna- gogue of the Babylonian dispersion. The Asian Jewes were most of this Babylonian sort; to these Saint Peter wrote from Babylon, which therefore he nameth not in the inscription. The Hellenists were so called of hellenizing or vsing the Greeke tongue in their Synagogues (in which they had the scriptures translated) in Egypt, Greece, and Iudie, By reason of this translation the Hebreues and Hellenists often disagreed (for the Hebreues called it a backward reading, because it is read from the left hand to the right) which sometime brake forth into open violence. R. Elazar assaulted the sy- nagogue of the Alexandrians at Ierusalem, and committed therein much outrage: and Christian charitie could scarce combine them, as Luke mentioneth, Acts 6. 1. This Greeke translation was vsed by them throughout Europe; they had it in Hebreu let- ters, as Terrullian testifieth in the Serapion at Alexandria. Thus Philo and other of these learned Hellenists, were ignorant of the Hebreu. Likewise of those Hebreues, there was small reckoning had of the Galilzans by their supercilious and superstitious brethren of Iudza, as the Gospell hath taught vs.

The opinions of the Ierues may bee reduced into these two generall Heads: the one were such as contented themselves with the Law of God, and were called Koraim; or Koraim, of which sort there are divers at this day in Constantinople, and other where. The other Rabbinists, Supererogatorie (as Master Hall calls them) and Popish Iewes, called Hāsīdai, professing a more strict Holinesse then the Law required. Yet at first these both pleased themselves, and did not, by opposition of Sciences, displease each other, and disagreeing in opinion, they yet in affection agreed. But when these voluptuaries beganne to bee drawn in Canons, and of arbitrarie became necessaries, they were rent into sundry Sects. Of these and their originall let vs heare Scaliger speake.

There were <sup>b</sup> (saith hee) before the times of Hasmonea, two kinds of Dogmatists, men holding differing opinions, among the Iewes: the one onely accepting the written Law; the other Tradition, or the addition to the Law. Of the former kind arose the Koraim, of whom came the Sadducees; of the latter, the Pharisees. These Pharisees were the issue of the Hāsīdai.

The Hāsīdai were a Corporation, Guild, or Fraternitie, which voluntarily added themselves to the Offices of the Law, 1. Adacchabres, Wap. 2. verse 23. Their originall was from the times of Ezra, or Esdra, Haggai and Zacharie, the Prophets, being authors of this Order. These, in regard of their institution, were called Holy, Hāsīdai; and in regard of their Combination, Hāsīdai. And besides that which the Law enjoyned (which is iust debt) they supererogated, and of their owne free accord disbursed vpon the Temple and Sacrifices. They professed not onely to liue according to the Prescript of the Law, but if any thing could by interpretations and consequences bee drawne thence, they held themselves bound to satisfie it, and when they had done all, to seeme to haue done nothing, but accounted themselves unprofitable seruants notwithstanding.

Euery one paid a tribute to the reparations of the Temple, from the times of Esdra and Nebemias. The Hāsīdai added further (of their owne free will) to the Sanctuary, Walles, and Porches, neuer (almost) going from the Temple, which they seemed to hold peculiar to themselves, and by which they vsed to sweare, By this Habitation, By this House: Which the Pharisees, their posterity, also did; as likewise they learned of them to build the Sepulchres of the Prophets. They were therefore called Hāsīdai, either because their Colledge was instituted of the Prophets; or of their holie and religious workes, and the sacred buildings by them either repaired or reared from the foundations. And therefore, when wicked Alcimus had killed threescore men of this Corporation or Guild, the people thought their death was prophesied in the Psalm, such reputation was there of their holinesse.

These Hāsīdai were not in proper sense a Sect, but a Fraternitie, which euery day assembled in the Temple, and offered in daily Sacrifice a Lambe, which was called the Sinne-offering of the Hāsīdai. One day was excepted, the eleuenth of Tisri, in which that Sacrifice was omitted. They offered not themselves (for they were not Priests) but the Priests in their name. Abraham Zacuth saith, That Baba, the sonne of Baba, daily of his owne accord offered a Ramme for a Sinne-offering, except one day, which was the day after the Expiation: And this was called the Sacrifice of the Saints for Sinne: And he sware, By this Habitation, that is, the Temple. Of this kind, or much like thereto, Scaliger thinketh the Rechabites were, which Ieremia mentioneth, whose immediate father he accounteth Ionadab, (not him which liued in the dayes of Iohn, but another of that name) and that their austere order began but a little before it ended (namely, in the same Prophets time) quickly ending, because of the Captiuitie. After the Captiuitie, these sonnes of Ionadab, renewing their former observations, were called Hāsīdai, which went not from the Temple, and obserued the orders aboue-mentioned: so Scaliger interpreted Ieremia's Prophecie, that Ionadab should not want one to stand before the Lord, that is, to minister and attend holy duties in the Temple, like to Anna the Prophetesse. This (saith he) is the true beginning of the Hāsīdai, which abstained from wine, as did also the Priests, as long as they ministered in the Temple. Thus much Scaliger.

Drusim : proueth, That diuers of the Pharisees and Essenes also were of these Hafsidim, whereby it appeareth, that it was rather a Brotherhood, as Scaliger calleth it, then a Sect. Hee sheweth their Rites and Discipline, out of Ioshafin. They spend nine houres of the day in prayer. They belieued that a man might sinne in thought, and therefore they had care thereof; their will was not without the will of Heaven, that is, of God. Ten things were peculiar to them: Not to lift vp their eyes aboue, tenne cubits; secondly, Not to goe bareheaded; thirdly, To stablish three reflections fourthly, To dispose their hearts to prayer; fifthly, Not to looke on either side; sixthly, To goe about, that they might not be troublesome to any companie; seuenthly, Not to eat at the Tables of great men; eighthly, If they had angered any man, quickly to appease him; ninthly, To haue a pleasant voice, and so descend to the interpretation of the Law; tenthly, To accustome themselues to their Threads and Phylacteries.

Rab (one of this Fraternitie) did not lift vp his eyes aboue foure cubits. Tenne or twentie daies before their death they were diseased with the Collicke, and so all cleane and cleane they departed into the other life.

To returne vnto Scaliger touching the originall of Sects, and to leaue those Hafsidim obseruants. As long (saith hee) as Supererogation onely was vsed, there was no Sect in the people of God; but when the Precepts thereof were brought into Canons, and committed to writing, then arose many doubts, disputations, altercations; growing and succeeding daily, from whence sprang two Sects, differing in opinion; the one admitting only the Law, the other embracing the Interpretations and expositions of their Rabbines. The former, in processe of time, was diuided into two. For at first the Karaim were only such as obserued the Law and the Prophets, till the times of Sadek and Baithi or Baithi, who first doubted of the punishment of sinnes, and rewards of good workes, from whom sprang the heresie of the Sadducees. The Karaim were not, before this, diuided in Sect from the Hafsidim, but only in those voluntarie Functions and Supererogations, wherein the Law, by Iniunction, ruled the former, and these, as is said, supererogated. But when Canons and Iniunctions began to bee written, then of these Hafsidim arose Dogmatists, which called themselues Perushim, Holy, and separated both from the other Hafsidim, and from the Vulgar; making a necessitie of that obseruation, which before was voluntarie. This sort was againe diuided into those which retayned the name Perushim, or Pharisees; and the Essens; both receiuing from their Authors the Rules and Precepts of their Sect. After this, the Pharisees were diuided into many kindes: The Iewes reckon seuen. The Essens also were diuided first into Cloysterers, or Collegians, which liued in a common Societie; and Eremites, or Solitarie persons; and those former into such as married; and others which remayned continent.

OF THE PHARISEES.

NOW let vs consider of these more particularly, and first of the Pharisees. Drusim deriueth the name from the Syrian, as most of the names of the New Testament are, and not from the Hebrew; for then it should not be Pharisees, but Pharusees: as after the Hebrew, it should rather be Masias, then Masias. The Etymologie some fetch from Phares, which signifieth Diuision as Ephiphanus, and Origen, with others: against which Drusim excepteth, because in Phares the last letter is Tsaddi, here it is Schin. Others deriue it from Parash, signifying to explaine, because they did all thinges openly, to bee seene of men: it is not likelie: for Hypocrisie loues her workes should bee seene, but not her humour (then should it not bee hypocrisie;) she would not bee seene in her affection to be seene: and this name, in this sense, would haue beene to their infamie, and not to their reputation, which they most aymed at. A third deriuation of this name is from another signification of the same Verbe, to expound. But expound the Law, was more proper to the Scribes; and soine of the Pharisees were not Expositors. Howbeit, the most probable opinion is, that they were so called of Separation; because they were, or would seeme to bee, separated from others: first, in cleanness of life; secondly, in dignitie; thirdly, in regard regard of the excommunication of those Observations, wherof they were separated, fourthly, in their habice, wherein they were (as our Monkes) distinguished from the people; yea, they did abhorre the garments of the people.

Their opinions are gathered by Josephus, and others, but of whom Drusius. They ascribed (saith Josephus) all things to Fate. Abraham Zacch interpreteth their opinion thus, They beleeue that God knoweth and disposeth all things, and the 'Scartes helps yet so, as free will is left in the hand of man. And if a man by his free will chuseth the good, God will helpe him in his good way. They say, That there is no Heav'n in Earth which hath not his proper Planet in Heaven.

They ascribed immortalitye to the Soule, holding, that judgement passed on it under the Earth; and that if it had done euill, it was adjudged to perpetual prisons: if well, it had easie returne vnto life by a transmigration, or going into another body. So Zacch saith. The good Soules take delight of their good workes; the bad descend, and ascend not. They beleeued that there were both Devils and good Angels. They conceived, that he which kept the most of the Commandements, although hee transgressed in some, is iust before God: against which opinion Burgensis thinketh, that James acknowledged that saying in his Epistle, He that faith he is free, is guilty of all. He citeth Rab Moses for this Pharisaical opinion, That God lodgeth according to the pluralitie or paucitie (to vse his owne words) of merits or demerits. Like stuffe haue I read in S. Francis Legend, of the ballance wherein mens deedes are weighed, and the Deuill lost his prey by the weight of a Chalice, which one had giuen to the Saint; which heauiemettall caused the Scale wherein his good deedes were put (before too light) to weigh heauiest. They (the ancienter Pharisees) confesse the Resurrection of the flesh. Herof are three opinions: one, That all, good and bad, shall rise againe; another, That the iust only shall rise; a third, That the iust, and part of the wicked, shall rise.

They call their Traditions the Law giuen by Word, and the vwritten Law, which they equall to the written, deriuing both from Moses, as more fully elsewhere shall be said. These Traditions they called Traditions, as both Epiphanius & Hieronymus witness: the Teachers thereof Zopai, or Wise-men; and when they Lectured, they were wont to say, O's Zopai Διδασκαλοι, i. The Wise-men teach Traditions. Of these Traditions were, concerning the Sabbath, That they might iourney from their place two thousand cubites; (Hierome accounteth feet; Origen & Elmes) That none might carrie any burthen that day; but they interpreted, if one carried on one shoulder, it was a burthen; if on both, it was none; if his shooes had naile, they were a burthen, otherwise not. Concerning Fasting, the Pharisee boasteth, Luke 18. 12. I fast twice in the weeke: which they obserued (saith Theophilus) on the second and fifth day, Mundaies and Thursdaies. Happily our Wednesdaies and Fridaies succeeded in this Penance, that wee might not seeme to be behind them in dutie, howsoeuer we disagree with them in their time. And yet Mercerus saith, The Iewes fasted the fourth day, Wednesday, because they held that vnluckie, in which children are taken with the Squinancie. Further, the Pharisees eat not vnwashed, Lucy αγνισμὸν Mark 7. 3. Except they wash with the fist, as Beza translates it. Sealiger expoundeth it, not by washing one fist in the other, but composing the fingers into such a frame, that all their ends meet on the top of the thumbe, which for want of another name is called αγνισμὸν, a Fist, although it bee not properly so. In this forme they hold vp their handes in washing, that the water may slide downe to the elbow, and thence fall to the ground, as the Iewes vse to this day. They washed when they came from Mark, because sinners and vncleane persons were there, whose touch might pollute them. They washed also Cups, and Brasen Vessels and Beds, not chamber-beds to lye on (Drusius expoundeth) but dining-beds, which they vsed in stead of Tables.

They would not eate with Publicans or Sinners, yea they accounted themselves polluted with their touch.

Their Hypocrisie in prayer Christ mentioneth, that it was low, and open in the streets, &c. It was thrice in the day, at the third, sixth, and ninth houre: Their words submisse and softly, as of Hannah, 1. Sam. 1. and toward the Temple.

Aquila) are the Hedge of thy Riches. And another Proverbe (learne it) Ty the, that thou mayest be rich. Epiphanius m addeth, they payed first fruits, thirtieths, and fiftieths, Sacrifices, and Vowes.

Their Phylacteries or Servatories, Defensives (so the word signifieth) in Hebrew * Tetaphoth, they vsed as Preseruatines, or Remembrancers of the Law, and ware them them larger then other men. Hierome calls them Pittaciola, resembling to them herein some simple superstitious women, wearing little Gospels, and the wood of the Croffe, and such like, of zeale not according to knowledge, straying a Gnar, and swallowing a Cammell. This superstition, then complained of by Hierome, yet remayneth (saith Scaliger) among Christians and Mahumetans, which ware about them the Gospel of S. Iohn. Christ condemneth not the Rite but their ambition, for dilating, not for wearing them, to which all the Iewes were bound, and all the Iewes and Samaritans obserued. They vsed the like ambition in their Fringes or twisted Tassels, which the Iewes call Zizit, and vse them still, as after shall appeare. Their oathes were, By Ierusalem, the Temple, the Heauen, Earth, their Head, by the Law. q Fagius obserueth, That the Iews in swearing lay their hand on the booke of the Law, at this day. Other oathes are little esteemed. Hence it seemeth came our corporall Oathes on a Booke. The Iewes (saith Capito) think it no oath, if one forswear by Heauen, or Earth, vnlesse he say by him which dwelleth there, &c. And none is subiect to that Curse, in which the Name of God is not added.

That of Corban pertayneth to this place, mentioned Matth. 15. 5. & Mark. 7. 11. which some Interpret, as if a Iew should say to his Parents, That he had alreadie dedicated all that to God (to whom vowes are to be performed) wherewith hee might haue helped them. Doctor Rainolds saith, That the Iewes, as they were prone to vngodly vowes, so this was an vsuall vow amongst them, and they would binde it with an oath, That such or such a man should haue no profite by them. The oath which they herein vsed as most solemne, was By the Gift: for so they were instructed, That if any sware by the Altar, it was nothing, but if By the Gift, he was a debtor. The Pharisees therefore taught, if any had said to his father, By the Gift thou shalt haue no profite by mee, then he might in no case doe them any good, against the Commandement, Honour thy Father, &c. The Iewes vsed to binde their vowes with a curse, as they which vowed Pauls death, vsing yet to suppress the curse it selfe, as, if they shall enter into my rest. So these, By the gift, if they haue any profite by me, meane they should haue none. Thus the Talmud (saith he) the Booke of their Canon Law, and Schoole-Diuintie, saith, That a man is bound to honour his Father, vnlesse he vow the contrarie. Masius 2 explaineth it thus, That they did consecrate (by saying Corban) all, where-with they should haue benefited their Parents: as if they had said, Let it be Anathema, or devoted, whatsoeuer it bee, with which I may profit thee. And therefore those Rabbines, vnder pretext of Religion, allowed not to spend on his parents that which he had thus vowed to God. Scaliger * thus interpreteth the place, as if a sonne being by his parents admonished of his dutie, should put them off with this exception, vnlesse that which I haue offered for thee, free me of this burthen. But let the more curious reade it in himselfe.

The Pharisees were esteemed pittifull; the Sadducees more * cruell. * They were much addicted to Astrologie, and the Mathematikes: whose names of the Planets Epiphanius b rehearseth, as also of the twelue Signes.

There were c seuen sorts of the Pharisees, which the Talmud reckoneth: first, Sicemita, which measure pietie by honour and profit, as the Sichemites, which for the marriage of Dina endured circumcision: secondly, Nacphi, which lifted not his feet from the ground: the third Kisus, Draw-bloud, which smiteth his head to the wall, to cause the bloud to come; and also shutteth his eies, that he behold not a woman: the fourth, that standeth on his perfection, called Mahcobaathi: What is my sinne? as if there wanted nothing to his righteousness: the fift, Meduchna, which goe lowly and stouping: the sixt, the Pharisee of Loue, which obeyeth the Law for loue of vertue or reward: the seuenth, the Pharisee of Feare, which is holden in obedience by feare of punishment. This they call Iobs Pharisee, the former Abrahams.

<sup>d</sup> Epiph. her. 16. Epiphanius describeth their strict obseruations. Some (saith he) prescribed to themselves ten yeares, or eight or foure yeares continence. Some lay on planks, which were only nine inches broad, that when they slept, they might fall to the pavement, so to be awakened againe to prayer, and keepe themselves waking. Others put stones vnder them for the same end, by pricking to awake them: others lay on thornes for that purpose. Scaliger reprooueth Epiphanius for affirming, that the Pharisees were womans attyre, as not agreeing to their austeritie, which despised all beds, beat themselves against walls, and put thornes in the fringes of their garments, to prick them: he thinketh him deceiued by some Iewes report; and addeth, that the moderne Iewes haue little or no knowledge of those ancient Pharisees, but as they learne it of the Christians, or of Pseudo-Gorionides (so hee calleth the Hebrew Booke, ascribed to Ioseph Ben Gorion, whom Drusus esteemeth, and Scaliger proueth to bee a counterfeite.)

<sup>e</sup> Scal. Elench. Wee may here also insert the <sup>f</sup> manner of the Iewish Schoole or Academie, with their promotion therein to the degree of a Doctor: which, whosoeuer affected, was first a Disciple, and being prostrate at the feet of the Doctor, heard him teaching: for the Disciple did reade, being laid on the Floore or Pavement, and the Doctor interpreted what he read. All the time which hee learned on this manner, was called his Minoritie, and the Scholer was called Katan, a Minor. Thus Paul, saith hee was brought up at the feet of GAMAELIEL. All this while he was called by the name of his Father, his owne name not added; which, after laying on of hands, was annexed to his title: as Ben Bethira before laying on of hands; after, Rabbi Iosua Ben Bethira, &c. For by laying on of hands he was promoted to his Mastership; which was done with a set forme of words, whereof R. Iuda, the sonne of Baba, was Author.

<sup>g</sup> Alf. 22. 3. But although he had now received the Degree, hee was not presently intituled Master, but Chaber, a γρηγορ with the Greekes, Spensipus γρηγορ Platonis, that is, such a Scholer as is able to teach. This word Chaber therefore is not put alone, but hath alway his Relatiue adioyned, as R. Ismael Chaber of R. Eleazar. And whiles he was so called, hee neuer sate whiles his Master sate, but prostrate on the pavement: And when they were both Masters, the younger stood, while the elder sate and taught: as in the Primitiue Church the younger Bishop called the elder Papa. Such was the reuerence to their Rabbines, <sup>h</sup> Aben is sometimes added to their names, as R. Abraham Aben Ezra: thus (saith Eliu Thebi, rad. Aben) the wisemen of Spaine did entitle themselves not to their father (for R. Abr. his father was named Meir) but of the familie; for Ezra was name of that familie; so was Thaben, Gabriel, &c. which they borrowed from the Arabians. Some of the Rab. called themselves also Gann as R. Seadiab Gann: which doctorell title was giuen them, for their perfection in the Talmud in which are threecore Tractates; for Gann in Geometrie signifieth sixtie. Idem rad. Gann, in rad. Samech, hee makes Samech to be the same with Chaber, saying, they were so called of the imposition of hands, which was vsed in conferring the degree.

Christ at twelue yeares was otherwise honoured amongst them: but this was extraordinary. And as Paul and Aquila sometimes, so also many of these Iewish Masters exercised some handie craft, to sustayne themselves without trouble of other: this R. Iose was a dresser of leather, Nabum a Scriuener, and likewise Meir, Iochanan a Shoe-maker; R. Iuda a Baker.

The Pharisees in a selfe-conceit and singularitie, called, all but themselves, in a disgracefull scorne, <sup>i</sup> Other men: so said he, Luke 18. I am not as other men: whereas they accounted themselves Masters of others, on whom also they bound beaues burthens, in their Rules and Cases, the breach whereof they iudged Sinns in the people, but yet held not themselves bound thereto. For example, Every Israelite ought every day, by their Rule, to say ouer the ten Commandements, and that in the first Watch, which might not bee deferred, for danger of sinne; and yet amongst themselves they esteemed it lawfull at any houre of the night. But vpon the Profelytes they imposed more then on the other Israelites, all which they were bound to (in their censure) vnder paine of Hell-fire; and therefore Christ said, They made them two-fold more the children of Hell then themselves; for they freed themselves from many of those impositions they laid on the consciences of others, And these Profelytes they lesse trusted, and therefore burthened them with more obseruations,

OF THE SADDUCEES.

AFTER we haue spoken of the Pharisees, which loued the first roomes (which they haue heere obtained) it followeth to speake next of the Sadducees, <sup>a</sup> who in the New Testament are often mentioned. <sup>b</sup> Beda giueth an vniust interpretation of their name; saying the Sadducees are interpreted Iust. Epiphanius <sup>c</sup> also fetcheth their name from Sedec, which signifieth Iustice. Lyra <sup>d</sup> allegeth a reason, because they were seuer and rigorous in iudgement, they gaue this name of Iust (not iustly) to themselves. Burgensis <sup>e</sup> otherwise; as of Arrius were the Arrians, so of one Sadoc (saith he) are the Sadducees called, who was the first inuenter of their Heresie. The Pharisees were esteemed more iust then they, as appeareth, Luk. 18. 9. They counted themselves iust, and despised others; Summum ius, summa iniuria. Their rigorous iustice was vniust rigour. This <sup>f</sup> Sadoc, or rather Saduc, liued vnder Antigonus Sopheus, who succeeded to Simion the Iust: His fellow-scholler was Baithos, of whom came the Baithosians. So saith Abraham ben Dauid in his Historicall Cabball: Antigonus said, *Be ye not as seruants, which minister to their Prince on condition to receiue reward. Sadoc and Baithos asked him of this thing, and he answered that they should not put confidence in the reward of this life, but in the world to come. But they denied his words; and said, we neuer heard any thing of the world to come; for they had bene his disciples: and they dissented from him, and went to the Sanctuaries of Mount Garizin, where the Princes were. They vpbraid the Pharisees with their Traditions, saying; The Tradition is in the hand of the Pharisees, to vex themselves in this world, whereas in the world to come they haue no reward. Antigonus his words are in the Treatise Aboth, Be ye not seruants which minister to a Prince, to receiue of him reward: but be ye as seruants which minister to their Prince, with this condition, that they receiue no reward, and let the feare of God bee vpon you. <sup>g</sup> Elius Lania thus reporteth it: Antigonus Sopheus had two disciples, Zadok and Baithos, which leauing their Master to follow wicked men, first began to deny the Law which was giuen by word of mouth, and beleueed nothing but that which was written in the Law. Wherefore they were called Karaim, that is, Bible-men, or Textualls, and in the Roman tongue they call them Sadduces.*

Baithos had a certaine family fro Sadoc, otherwise held the same opinions, as Hellel and Sammai among the Pharisees: so these were two chiefe Masters of the Sadducean Schooles. The Baithosians ministered to Baithos in vessels of siluer and gold. These Sadducees were called Minim, or Mmei, that is, Heretikes. They are called Karraim, because they would seeme Textuall, and Scripture-men, disallowing Traditions, <sup>h</sup> of Kara, which signifieth the Scripture; which was called Kara or Cara, of Cara to reade, saith Drusius, <sup>i</sup> because of the diligence, which ought to be vsed in reading the Scriptures, wherunto men should designe (after the Iewish precepts) the third part of their life. Abraham Zachub calles them Epicures. The Scriptures they interpreted after their owne sense, nor regarded they the words of the Wise-men; that is, the Pharisees. They were of the ancient Caraans, or Karraim, but not of those which now are so termed; which as Zachub confesseth, confesse the Resurrection, and Reward. Scaliger <sup>k</sup> affirmeth, by the testimonie of Philip Frederike a Christian Jew, who had great familiarity with these Karraim at Constantinople, and had bin often present at their Synagogue, that they differ nothing from the other Iewes, but in reiecting Traditions, and are far more honest and faithfull then the Rabbanim, of whom they are no lesse hated for their integritie, then for reiecting Tradition. But in comparison of the <sup>l</sup> Rabbanim, there are but few of the Karraim; and these are of the reliques of the old Sadducees. These two Sects haue nothing common betweene them, but the Text of Scripture: they haue a differing account of their New-moones: the other Iewes reckoning from the Coniunction, these Karraim from the time of apparition, as doe the Arabians, Concerning the Karraim now remaining, it is reported that the other Iewes, and they will not speake one to another: so inextinguishable hatred doe the other Iewes conceiue against them. And Postellus saith, <sup>m</sup> There are three principall Sects of the Iewes

in the Easterne parts; Thalmudists; Caraim, which reiect those Glosses. They are rich, but so hated of the rest, that a great part of their Virgins remaine unmarried: And if (saith the common law) it should so happen that a Caraim and a Christian should fall together into the water, with like possibilitie of sauing either, he would make a bridge of the Caraim to saue the Christian. The third sort is the Samaritan, of which afterward. Buxdorf,<sup>1</sup> saith, that the re are of these Caraim also in Poland; and Leo<sup>2</sup> mentioneth some places in Barbarie, where this sort of Iewes doth inhabite; as you may hereafter reade in our sixth Booke, and the eleuenth Chapter. Some also are in Palestina.

First, their difference from the Pharisees was about the future reward, which being denied, they by consequence of that error fell into the rest, to deny the Resurrection; the subsistence spirituall, &c. They cooped vp God in Heauen, without all beholding of euill. They denied Fate, which the Pharisees held. They denied Spirits altogether, saith Lina,<sup>3</sup> for they held God to be corporall: the soule to die with the bodie: Angels and Diuels they denied: Good and Euill they ascribed to a mans free-will.<sup>4</sup> They were inhospitall and cruell; and as cruelly hated of the people. They are charged (the Diuell may be slandered) to deny all Scripture but Moses:<sup>5</sup> But first in Scripture, this opinion of theirs is not mentioned: and Iosephus affirmeth, that they receiued the Scriptures, and reiected Tradition. Neither would the zealous people of the Iewes, haue endured them in the Temple, if they had denied their Prophets, for feare of whom they durst not professe otherwise of Iohn Baptist, although he had left no monument of miracle, or Scripture. Drusus<sup>6</sup> would reconcile this opinion of the Fathers, which say they denied all but Moses; and the other, saying, that some of the Sadduces liued in Iudza, others in Samaria. These later happily, with the Samaritans, denied all saue Moses. Amongst these were the Apostata's, which liued in Sichem, mentioned by Iosephus Antiq. lib. 11. cap. 8. and Eccles. 50. 27. Iunius thinketh that they fell from the Iewish Religion with Manasses, in the time of Nebuchad.

The Sect of the Sadduces was diminished, if not worne out, after the destruction of the Temple, till in the yeare 4523. or after Scaliger, 4515, and Anno Dom. 755. one Anan and Sau his sonne renewed that Doctrin, because he had not receiued his expected promotion to the degree of Gaon.<sup>7</sup> He wrote bookes against the other Iewes. The like did one Carcasus. But of these Sadduces too much.

OF THE HESSEES.

OF the <sup>b</sup> Esses or Hessees, followeth in the next place. Their name Scaliger<sup>c</sup> denieth of a <sup>d</sup> word which signifieth Rest, or quietnesse and silence: both which well agreed to their institution. He disproueth that opinion of Ensebins, and others, that therein followed him, which thought these Iewish Heretikes were Christian Monkes and Catholikes. Such Catholikes, let Baronius<sup>e</sup> and Bellarmino<sup>f</sup> boast of, as the authors of their Monkes, for so they would haue them; which you may beleue as well as before the Flood, Enosh; and after, Elias, Iohn Baptist, the Nazarites and Rechabites, were Monkish Votaries, as the Cardinall would haue you. As for these Esses, he makes no small adoe against the Centuries,<sup>g</sup> for vnderstanding Philo of Iewish, and not of Christian Monkes. But the loue to Monkerie hath dazeled the eyes of men too much: and euen their Historie (which followeth) will conuince that opinion of falsehood. Besides, Christianitie should haue small credit of such associates. Indeed the latter Monkes are much like them in superstition and Idolatrie, though farre behind in other things. But hee that will see this Argument disputed, let him reade Scaliger his Confutation of Serarius the Iesuite. He sheweth also that the Offens, Sampfians, Mesfalians, and diuers heresies amongst the Christians, sprang from these Esses: that the Egyptian Esses, of which Philo speaketh, out of whom Ensebins first collected that conceit, and that Philo himselfe had no skill in the Hebrew, but knew only the Greeke tongue: that Paulus the Eremit in Thebais, was the first Author of Monasticall liuing. But now to come to our Historie of these men.

These Esses, Hessees, or Essens, are placed by Plinie on the West of the Dead-sea<sup>h</sup>, a people people solitary, and in the whole world most admirable, without women, without money, and nation eternall in which none is borne, the wearinesse of others fortunes being the cause of their fruitfull multiplyings. Philo in that Booke which he intituled, that all good men are free, saith that there were of them about foure thousand, called Essai, quasidisti, that is, Holy, not sacrificing other creatures, but their mindes vnto God. Some of them are Husband-men, some Artificers, for necessitie, not for abundance: They make no weapons of warre, nor meddle with Merchandize. They haue no seruants, but are all both free, and mutually seruants to each other. They liue perpetually chaste, sweare not at all, nor lie: esteeming God the Giuer of all good, and Author of no euill: Their societie is such, that one garment, one house, one food, one treasure, one getting, one spending, one life, is in common to them all; carefully prouiding for their sicke, and holding the elder men in place of parents.

Iosephus, who himselfe liued among them, doth more largely describe them. He reporteth that they were by Nation Iewes, auoiding pleasures and riches as Sinnes; accounting continence and contentednes great vertues. They marrie not, but instruct the children of others, respecting them as their kindred, in their manners: not denying the lawfulness of marriage, but the honestie of women. Hee which becommeth one of their fraternity, must make his goods common. Oyle and neartiesse they shunne, yet weare alwayes a white garment. They haue Officers for their common prouision. They haue no one certaine Citie, but in each, many of them haue their houses: to strangers of their owne Sect, they communicate their goods, and acquaintance; and therefore carrie nothing with them in their iorneyes, but weapons for feare of the eues: and in every Citie haue of the same Colledge an especiall Officer which prouideth for strangers. The children vnder tuition of Masters are alike prouided for; nor do they change their rayment till the old be worne: They neither buy nor sell, but mutually communicate. Deuout they are in the service of God. For before the Sunne riseth, they speake of no prophane or worldly matter, but celebrate certaine Prayers, as praying him to rise. Then by their Officers are each appointed to their workes, till the fifth houre, at which time they assemble together, and, being girded with linnen garments, wash themselues with cold water. Then do they go into their dining-rooms as into a Temple, where no man of another Sect may be admitted; and there staying with silence, the Pantler sets them bread in order, and the Cooke one vessell of broth. The Priest giueth thanks, as after dinner also. Then laying aside those their holy garments, they ply their worke till the euening; and then suppe in like manner. There is neuer crying, or tumult, they speake in order, and obserue euen without the house a venerable silence. In other things they are subiect to their Ouerseer, but at their owne choice may helpe and shew mercie to others. To their kindred they cannot giue without licence. What they say, is certaine; but an oath they hate no lesse then perjury. They studie the writings of the Ancient, thence collecting such things as may benefit the manners of the minde, or health of the bodie. They which are studious of their Sect, must a years space endure triall, & then after that probation of their conticencie, must be probationers yet two yeares longer, and then vpon allowance of their manners are assumed into their fellowship; making first deepe protestation of Religion towards God, and iustice towards men; to keep faith to all, but especially to Princes, and if they shall come to rule over others, not to abuse their power, not to exced others in habit, not to steale; not to keep any thing secret from them of their owne Sect, or communicate it to another, although vpon perill of life: not to deuise new doctrines: to keepe the booke of their owne opinions, and the names of the Angels. Offenders they put from their fellowship: and he which is thus excommunicate, may not receiue food of food of any other, but, eating grasse and herbes, is consumed with famine, except they in compassion receiue him againe, in extremitie. They giue no sentence of iudgement; being fewer then an hundred. If ten sit together, one speakes not without consent of the rest. They may not spit in the midst, or on the right-hand. They will not so much as purge Nature on the Sabbath, and on other daies do it very closely, for offending the Diuine light, and couer it with an instrument in the earth, and that in the most secret places; and are washed after.

b The Esses were worshippers of the Sunne, hence came the ἡλιονισται, and Sampsai.

c They go not to stoole on the Sabbath, because of that instrument which they could not vse to digge and couer their excrement, without Sabbath breaking. Scaliger.

They

They are of foure ranks, according to the time of their profession, & the younger sort of these are so far inferiour to the rest, that if one of these do touch the, he washeth himselfe, as if he had touched a stranger. They liue long: feare not death: nor by any tortures of the Romans, could be compelled to transgresse their laws; but derided their tormentors rather: beleeuing to receiue their soules againe presently, holding the bodies to be corruptible, & the prisons of the immortall soules: which if they haue bin good, haue a pleasant place assigned them beyond the Ocean, but the euill to be in tempestuous stormie places of punishments. Some of these Essenes also foretell things to come. And another sort is of them which allow of marriage, but make a three-yeares triall first of the woman, & if by a constant purgation they appeare fit for child-bearing, they wed the, not for pleasure but procreation: and therefore after conception do not accompany with them. These women when they wash, haue their sacred linnen garmets also, as the men. Thus far Iosephus: who in his <sup>a</sup> Antiq. addeth to these, their opinions of Gods providence ruling all things: and that they thinke their Ceremonies more holy then those of the Temple, and therefore send thither their gifts, but doe not there sacrifice, but by themselves following the same course of life, which the Phisii do amongst the Dacians.

Some of these Essenes liued so solitarie, like to Hermites, as is said before. Happily that Bannu was of this sort, to whom Iosephus <sup>c</sup> resorted for imitation. Hee liued in the wilderness, cloathing and feeding himselfe with such things as the trees and plants of their owne accord yielded him, and with often cold washings in the night and day, cooling the heat of lust, with him Iosephus abode three yeares.

OF THEIR OTHER SECTS.

THE Ganlonites or Galileans, <sup>d</sup> had their <sup>e</sup> beginning of Indus (elsewhere he calleth him Simon) a Galilean, whose doctrine was, That, Only God was to bee accounted their Lord and Prince: in other things they agreed with the Pharisees: but for their libertie they would rather endure any the most exquisite tortures, together with their kindred and friends, then call any mortal man their Lord. Thendus happily mentioned, Ab. 5. and that Egyptian, Ab. 21. were of this rebellious and trayterous Sect, and those Sicarii which wore short weapons vnder their garments, therewith murdering men in assemblies. That Egyptian <sup>f</sup> Iosephus calls a false Prophet, who vnder pretence of Religion, and name of a Prophet, assembled almost thirtie thousand men to Mount Oliuet: he was defeated by Felix the Governour. Such were their Zelota in the siege of Ierusalem, vnder the mantle of Religion, all of the harbouring & cloaking Treason & villany.

The Scribes <sup>g</sup> are not a Sect, but a function: of which were two sorts, γραμματεῖς, γρᾶμμαι, and, γραμματεῖς τῶ νόμου, the one expounders of the Law, the other publike Notaries or Actuaries, Recorders, Secretaries. Epphaninus maketh difference betwixt the Scribes that were γραμματεῖς τῶ νόμου, Teachers of the Law, and the ῥήτορες, or Lawyers, which prescribed formes of Law, Law-cases, and taught Ciuill actions. But these are often taken one for the other. Exra is called a Scribe, whose Pulpit is mentioned, Nabern. 8. and <sup>h</sup> Moses Chaire was the seat of the Scribes; that is, they taught the Law of Moses, which they vsed to do sitting: as Christ also did, Matth. 5. 2. Their expositions, Epphaninus <sup>i</sup> saith were of foure sorts, one in the name of Moses; the second in the name of their Rabbine Akiba (hee is said to haue liued an hundred and twentie yeares, and to be Standard bearer to Barchozba) the third in Andan or Annan; the fourth after the Assamonei. But little is to be said of these Scribes, more then what is before said of the Pharisees, this being not a differing Sect, but an Office or Ministrie, whereof the Pharisees also were capable, and are for false teaching blamed by our Saviour, together with the Scribes.

The Scribes are said in their expositions <sup>k</sup> to haue beene more textuall, the Pharisees more in their Glosses and Traditions: the Scribes had chiefe reputation for learning, the Pharisees for holines, taking more paines (saith our English Iosephus) to go to hell. The Scribes professed both disputation and obseruation of many things, saith Arius Montanus, <sup>l</sup> but not so exact as the Pharisees. For the Pharisees, though not so learned as the other, thought themselves more holy then them, because they obserued not only those things, which in the common opinion were thought meet, but those things which

which were least, which the people obserued not, which others had added. This they were ambitious of, as of some great perfection; for there was a threefold state of men. The Dollors, Pharisees, and People of the Land. The prouerb was, The people of the Land are the foot-stool of the Pharisees. Of them they had a prouerb, The people of the Land is not holy: and they discern not the Law nor wisdom: yea, saith the booke Musar, he shall not take the daughter of the people of the Land, because they are abomination, and their wiues are abomination; and of their daughters it is said, Cursed be he that lieth with a beast. Thus did these proud Doctors and Pharisees tread the way to the Popish Clergie, in contemning the Laytie as vnworthy of the Law and Scripture, which in an vnknowne tongue was sealed from them, and feasted them at high Feasts with an halfe Sacrament, and in their ordinarie priuate Masse with none at all. Were not these faire reasons. e The Laytie might (if they had a whole Communion) touch the Cup, and some of them haue beards, and some haue the palfie, and their dignitie is inferior to the Priestly. &c. The booke Aboth sheweth how the people of the Land requited this supercilious generation, talking of them, and scoffing at them for their obseruations. When I was of the people of the Land, R. Aquiba there saith, I said, who will giue me a disciple of the wise? I would bite him as an Asse; for that insolence, and because they would not suffer themselves to be touched of them. The people were tied to obserue the precepts mentioned, or by necessitie of consequence drawne out of the Bible. The Pharisees (as is said) added their Traditions. The Scribes manner d of teaching was cold and weak, consisting in certaine arguments, which rather afflicted then affected the mindes of the hearers; in certaine niceties, and scrupulous questions, sometimes inextricable. And therefore the people heard Christ, as speaking with authoritie and not as the Scribes. But to let passe, these Schoole-men, and those Canonists, let vs come to their other Sects and sorts of professions.

The Hemerobaptists e are numbred by Epiphanius f among the Iewish heresies, which, saith he, in other things differ not from the Scribes and Pharisees; but in their doctrine of the resurrection and in infidelitie, are like to the Sadducees: And euery day in all times of the year they are baptised or washed, whence they haue their name. But this custome of daily washing, saith Scaliger, g was common to all the ancient Iewes, which would seeme better then their fellowes, and not onely obserued of the Pharisees, Esses, and Hemerobaptists (if su. ha sect may be added). At this time in Palestina many do it, not once, but often in the day. The Mahumetans obserue it. The Iewes (as a h Iew hath written) were so zealous herein, that they would not eat with him that did eat with vn-washed hands: and one of their holy men being inuited by such an host, rose vp and went his way, alleaging to him, when he would haue recalled him, that he must not eat the bread of him which had an euill eye: and besides, his meat was vnclane. The Priests when they kept their courses in the Temple, abstained from wine, and ate not of the Tithes before they had washed their whole bodie. The Pharisees and Esses composed themselves to this sanctitie: the greater part of the Pharisees, and all the Esses abstained from wine, and both vsed daily washings, especially before they ate. And as many Heretikes professing themselves Christians, retained many things of Iudaisme; so these Hemerobaptists learned therein this daily washing. It seemeth by him that these were Christian rather then Iewish Heretikes.

And so were the Nazarzans i also, which some reckon among the Iewish sects, who embraced the Gospell of Christ, but would not relinquish their Iudaisme; vnlesse we say with Hieronymus, that whiles they would be both Iewes and Christians, they were neither Iewes nor Christians. These Nazarzans, or Nazorzans, Scaliger affirmeth, were meere Karrains, Scripture-Iewes, but because of their obstinacie in the Law, the first Councell of the Apostles determined against them. As for the Nazarites of the old Testament, Moses describeth them and their obseruations: not to cut their haire, not to drinke wine and strong drinke, &c. Such was Sampson. But these could be no Sect, holding in euery thing the same doctrine with the Iewes, and only, for a time, were bound by vow to these rites. But for those Nazarzans, Epiphanius k maketh them a Iewish Sect, not without cause, if such were their opinions as he describeth them. Their dwelling was beyond Jordan in Gilead and Bashan, as the same goeth (saith he) by Nation

Jewes: and by obseruing many things like to the Iewes. Herein they differed: They did not eate any thing which had life they offered not sacrifice: for they counted it unlawfull to sacrifice, or to eate flesh. They disallowed the five booke of Moses: they indeed confessed Moses, and the Fathers by him mentioned, and that he had received the Law, not this yet, which is written, but another. <sup>a</sup> Philastrius saith they accepted the Law and Prophets, but placed all righteousnesse in carnall obseruation: and nourishing the haire of their heads, placed therein all their vertue, professing to imitate Sampson, who was called a Nazarite: from whom the Pagans afterwards named their valiant men Hercules.

Next to these doth <sup>b</sup> Epiphanius place the Offens <sup>c</sup>, dwelling in Ituræa, Moab, and beyond the Salt or Dead sea: to these one Elxai in the time of Traian ioyned himselfe: he had a brother named Iexai, Scaliger (here and euery where acute) saith, <sup>d</sup> that the Essens and Offens are the same name, as being written with the selfe-same Hebrew letters, differing only in pronounciation, as the Abyssines pronounce Osræel, Crossus, for Israel Christus. And the Arabian Elxai, and his brother Iexai, were not proper names, but the appellation of the Sect it selfe; as he proueth. But they agreed not so well in profession, as in name, with the Essens, for they were but an issue of those ancient Essens, holding some things of theirs, others of their owne: as concerning the worship of Angels, reproved by the Apostles, Coloss. 2. 2. 1. in which the Essens and Offens agreed, and other things there mentioned, Touch not, taste not, handle not: and in worshipping of the Sunne, whereof they were called Sampsæans, or Sunner, Samen, as Epiphanius interpreteth that name. Those things wherein they differed, were brought in by that Innouator, who (of this his Sect) was called Elxai.

He was, saith Epiphanius, a Jew, he ordained Salt, and Water, and Earth, and Bread, and Heauen, and the Skie, and the Winde, to bee sworne by in Diuine worship. And sometimes he prescribed other seuen witnesses; Heauen, and Water, and Spirits, and the holy Angels of prayer, and Oile, and Salt, and Earth. Hee hated continencie, and enioyned marriage of necessitie. Many imaginations he hath, as received by reuelation. He teacheth hypocrisie, as in time of persecution to worship Idols; so as they keepe their conscience free: and if they confesse any thing with their mouth, but not in their heart. Thus ancient is that Changeling, Equinocation. He bringeth his author, one Phineas of the stocke of the ancienter Phineas, the sonne of Elaazar, who had worshipped Diana in Babylon, to saue his life. His followers esteeme him a secret various power. Vntill the time of Constantine, Marthus and Marthana (two women of his stocke) remained in succession of his honor, and were worshipped in that countrey for gods, because they were of his seed. Marthus died a while since, but Marthana still liueth: Their spittle, and other excrements of their body, those Heretikes esteemed, and reserued for reliques, to the cure of diseases, which yet preuailed nothing. He mentioneth Christ, but it is vncertaine whether hee meaneth the Lord Iesus. Hee forbids praying to the East-ward, and bids turne towards Ierusalem from all parts. He detesteth sacrifices, as neuer offered by the Fathers: hee denieth the eating of flesh among the Iewes, and the Altar, and Fire, as contrary to God, but water is fitting. Hee detesteth Christ after his measure, foure and twentie Schazni in length, that is, fourescore and sixteene miles; and the fourth part thereof in breadth, to wit, six Schazni, or foure and twentie miles; besides the thicknes, and other fables. He acknowledged a holy Ghost, but of the female sexe, like to Christ, standing like a statue aboue the clouds, and in the midst of two mountaines. He bids none should seeke the interpretation, but only say these things in prayer: (words which he had taken out of the Hebrew tongue, as in part we haue found). His prayer is this, <sup>e</sup> Abar anid moib nochiel daasim ani daasim nochiel moib anid abar selam. Thus Epiphanius relateth it, and thus constructh, I cannot say expoundeth (although they, like our deuout Catholikes, needed no exposition) Let the humilitie passe from my fathers, of their condemnation, and conculcation, and labour; the conculcation in condemnation by my fathers, from the humilitie passed in the Apostleship of perfection. Thus was Elxai with his followers opinionate: otherwise Iewish, Epiphanius speaketh of his Sect else where often, as when he mentioneth the Ebionites <sup>f</sup>, and the Sampsæans: This booke both the Offens and Nazoræans, and Ebionites vsed,

f Epiph. her. 53.

The Sampfians* had another booke (they said) of his brothers. They acknowledge one God, and worship him, vsing certaine washings. Some of them abstaine from liuing creatures, and they will die for Elxai his posterity; which they had in such honor, that if they went abroad, the people would gather vp the dust of their feete for cures, and their spittle, and vsed them for amulets and preseruatues. They admit neyther the Apostles nor Prophets: they worship water, esteeming it as a god, beleeuing that life is from thence.

* Sampfians.

Scaliger also affirmeth, that the* Massilians (which word Epiphanus interpreteth in greek, Such as pray, according to the opinion and practise of those Heretikes) were first a Iewish sect, and a slip of the Esses; and after by marriage with some false Christians, made such a galli-maufrey, as after when we come to speake of the Pseudochristian sects shall (God willing) be related; for of Iewish they became Christian Heretickes.

The<sup>b</sup> Herodians: otherwise agreeing with the rest, thought Herod to be the Messias, moued by Iacobus propheticie falsely interpreted, That the Scepter should not depart from Iuda till Shilo came. When as therefore they saw Herod a stranger to possesse the Kingdome, they interpreted as aforesaid. Some make question whether this was the name of a sect, or of Herods souldiers. Drausius<sup>d</sup> obserueth out of a Commenter vppon Perfius, Sat. 5. Herodis uenera dies, &c. these words; Herod reigned among the Iewes in the parts of Syria in the dayes of Augustus. The Herodians therefore obserue the birthday of Herod, as also the Sabbath: in the which day they set Lamps burning, and crowned with Violets in the windowes. Elsewhere he citeth out of a Lexicon of the Hebrew law, that they were called Herodians of Herods name, and Dorsians of the place whence they were brought; for by Nation they were Greekes: so saith the Author of Baal A- nach, Herod the King brought Greekes out of the desert, and brought them vp in the habitable land. Scaliger saith that they were a corporation or guild, instar eorum soci- etatum, qua vulgo confratria vocantur, and besides their hereticall opinion that he was the Messias, entred into society for costs and charges in common, to be bestowed on sacrifices and other solemnities, wherewith they honored Herod aliue and dead. Arius
Montanus<sup>e</sup> thinketh that the Herodians were politicians, that little respected religion.
 They thought the Common-wealth should be established, and that could not stand without Princes, nor could Princes nourish themselves or theirs without money, and therefore propounded that question to our Sauour touching Casars tribute. Others think they made hotchpotch of Iudaisme and Gentilisme, as Herod had done: in which it is like his successors succeeded him. This coniecture is mentioned by Beza, who yet rather thinketh that the Herodians were Herods courtiers, moued thereto by the Syrian translation, which hath debeis Hirandis, Herods domesticals. Thus thinketh Iunius of them also, who saith that when the Pharisees could not intrap him in the Law, they sent their disciples to question him of Tribute, having before agreed (which vually they did not) with the Herodians to stand by (vnknowne) as witnesses, if he had answered any thing, whereat Cesar might haue bene offended. And this seemeth most likely: for after Herods death, how could they hold him for Messias?

Another sect amongst these of the Circumcision, Eusebius out of Hegesippus nameth because in the Babylonish captivity or after, they married not strange wiues, and therefore boast themselves of the puritie of Abrahams seed. The m Merissians or Merists, which were (as the name importeth) sprinklers of their holy-water. Breidenbach saith, they made a division of the Scriptures, and receiued onely some part of them: the Mon- bonei (he addeth) sabbatise in every thing. The n Hellenians, of Hellenism: the o Cleoare said to be a Colledge or fellowship: and lesse of r Ganai, and such like, if there be any other names that remaine as the rotten bones of the consumed carcases of heresies and heretickes; and eyther are vnknowne, or degenerated into some or other sect of Pseudo-christians, which require another taske.

The s Calicole were Iewes, but corruptly embracing Christianity, for they were Massilians, which had their houses or places of praier abroad in the open ayre, of whom Iuuenal is vnderstood, Nil prater nubes & celi lumen adorant. So Scaliger readeth, not numen: and Petronius, Iudans licet & porcinum nomen adores, & celi summas aduocet mirriculas. These also were an off-spring of the Esses: and from these proceeded the Massilians; they being baptised, reuoluted to their former Iudaisme; and bearing the name of Christians, retained the rites of those Calicole or Heauen-worshippers.

The u Cannai were a deuout society and order, giuen to holinesse of life, and obseruation of the Lawe; of whom was Simon Kannans, Mat. 10. called Zelotes, the interpretation of the former, as Beza and Scaliger shew. Suidas calleth them obseruants of the Lawe, whom Ananus shut in the Temple. Their deplaudes, or mourners were such as lamented with continuall fasting, praying, and weeping, the destruction of their Cittie, Temple and Nation; as elsewhere is said. I might adde out of that ancient father Philastrius (whom S. Augustine saith he had scene at Millan with S. Ambrose) di-uers other heresies amongst the people of the Iewes before the incarnation of Christ, no fewer then eight and twenty; of which we haue already mentioned the most and principall. He addeth the Ophitea or Serpentines, which worship a Serpent, saying, that he first procured vs the knowledge of good and euill; for which God enuied him, and cast him from the first heauen into the second, whence they expect his comming, esteeming him some vertue of God, and to be worshipped. Another sort are the Caini, which commend Cain for fraticide, saying, that Cain was made of the power of the Diuell, Abel of another power, but the greatest power preuailed in Cain to slay Abel. A third sort reckoned by Philastrius are the Sethiani, worshippers of Seth the sonne of Adam, who affirme, that two men being created in the beginning, and the Angels dissenting, the feminine power preuailed in heauen (for with them are males and females gods and goddesses) Eua perceiuing that, brought forth Seth, and placed in him a spirit of great power, that the aduersarie powers might be destroyed. Of Seth they say that Christ should come of his stocke, yea, some of them conceiue him to be the very Christ.
The Heliognosti, called also Deuistaci, worshipped the Sunne, which (said they) know all the things of God, and yeelded all necessities to men. Others there were which worshipped Frogges, therby thinking to appease Diuine wrath, which in Pharaos time brought Frogges vpon the land of Egypt. He reckoneth the Accaronites which worshipped a Flie; of which elsewhere is spoken: as also of Thamuz, which he reckoneth another sect. Which Thamuz he saith was the sonne of a Heathen King, whose image the Iewish women worshipped with teares and continuall sacrifices; and that Pharaos which ruled Egypt in Moses time was of that name. Astar also and Astakor, he saith, were Kings of Syria and Egypt, worshipped after their deaths. But (perhaps more truely) we haue exprest these things in our former Booke. Beniamin Tudelensis speaketh of a sect in his time, which he calleth Cyprians and Epicures, who profaned the euening before the Sabbath, and obserued the euening of the first day. I might adde to their Sects the diuers Christs or Messiaes, which in diuers ages they had; but that I haue referred to the tenth Chapter.

CHAP. IX.

Of the Samaritans.

It remaineth to speake of the Samaritan Sects.

In Samaria was the Citie royal of the ten Tribes, after that Omri (who, as other his predecessors, had reigned before at Tirzah) had bought the mountain Shomron of one Shemer, for two talents of silver, and built thereon this Citie, which he called after the name of Shemer, Lord of the Mountaine. In vaine therefore is it to seeke the name of the Samaritans from the signification of the word (which is keeping) seeing they are so called of the place, and the place of this their ancient Lord. It remaineth the chiefe seat of the Kingdome as long as the same indured, and namely, till the dayes of Hoshea their last King, in whose time Salmanasar the Assyrian carried the Israelites thence. Esharhaddon the sonne of Senacherib, otherwise called Osnappar (thus saith Hezra: and therefore Epiphanius was deceived in ascribing this act to Nabuchodonosor in the time of the captiuitie fortie yeares before the returne) sent to inhabite that Region, Colonies from Babel, and from Cutha, and from Aua, and from Hannah, and from Sepharuaim. Babel is knowne: Cutha and Aua are esteemed parts of the desert of Arabia, the other of Syria and Mesopotamia. It seemeth that most of them were of Cutha, because all of them after passed into that name, and were of the Iewes called Cuthzi, as witnesseth Iosephus. Eliu Leuita giueth the same reason; and addeth, that a Iew might not say Amen to a Samaritans or Cuthans blessing. The Cuthi, saith he, were the surest beggars of all men in the world, and from them, as he thinketh, came those censuring roguing Gypsies or Egyptians, which so many ages haue troubled so many countries of Europe.

These Heathens serued not the Lord, and therefore the Lord sent Lyons among them, which slew them; wherefore they sent to the King of Assyria, who sent thither one of the captiued Priests of Israel to teach them how to worship God (Epiphanius calleth his name Esdraus.) He dwelt at Bethel; and as some conceiue, taught rather that idolatrous worship, whereof Bethel had bin before the Beth-aen, where Ieroboam had placed his golden Calfe, then the true worship of the True Iehouah. Howsoeuer, every Nation (saith the Text) made them Gods, and put them in the houses of the high places, which the Samaritans had made. The men of Babel made Succoth Benoth; and the men of Cutha made Nergal, and the men of Hamath, Asbima; and the Anims, Nibbaz, and Tartak; and the Sepharuaims burnt their children in the fire to Adrammelech, and Adrammelech their gods. Thus they feared the Lord, and serued their gods after the manner of the Nations, and so continued: a mungrell Religion, begotten of a bastard or hereticall Iudaisme, and wilde Paganisme. What those gods were it is vncertaine, and interpreters agree not. Of Succoth Benoth is already spoken. Wolphins interpreteth Nergal a wilde Hen, Asbima a Goate, Nibbaz a Dogge, Tartak an Asse, Adramelech a Mule, Anamelech a Horse: thus (saith he) the Hebrewes expound them; and he supposeth these creatures were among them canonized and sacred: as the Persians are said to worship a Cocke, the Proembari of Africa a Dogge; other people other creatures. Thus their Religion continued till after the returne of the Iewes from captiuitie, to whom they would haue bin officious helpers in building of the Temple: which being refused they became their enemies, and hindred the building a long time. But the Temple being built, and Religiou established among the Iewes, and their state flourishing, Samballus gaue his daughter Nicaso to Manasses, the brother of Iaddus the high Priest, in the time of Darius the last Persian Monarch. This Nebemia mentioneth, but deigneth not to name him, affirming that he chased him from him, of which some defendant whether it by exile or excommunication, or some other punishment, R. Salomon interpreteth it of exile, Pelican of excommunication.

Drusius hath a discourse out of a Iewish Author, which relateth the forme of that first Anathema and iudiciall curse (not vnmeeet heere to be mentioned) denounced against the Samaritans for hindering the worke of the Temple. Zorobabel and Iosias (saith hee) gathered all the Congregation into the Temple of the Lord, and brought three three hundred Priests, and three hundred Trumpets, and three hundred Bookes of the Lawe, and as many children, and founded. And the Leuites singing and playing on Instruments, cursed with all kinds of Anathema's the Chutheans, in the secret of the name Tetragrammaton, and in writing written vpon Tables; and with the Anathema of the house of the higher iudgement, and the Anathema of the house of the lower iudgement, that none of Israel should eate the bread of the Chuthean (whereupon it is said, He which eateth a Samaritans bread, he is he that eateth Swines flesh) and that a Chuthean should not be a Profelyte in Israel, nor should haue part in the Resurrection of the dead. Thus they writ, and sealed, and sent vnto all Israel which were in Babylon, which heaped vpon them Anathema vpon Anathema. That, concerning their becoming profelytes, Drusus doubteth whether it may not be translated, that a stranger Chuthean should not abide in Israel: which is more likely. The other had beene more impious: their zeale to make profelytes of all Nations is knowne.

To returne to Manasses, Iosephus saith that the high Priests and the Elders put him from the Altar, who therefore went to Sanballat his father in law, and tolde him that he loued his daughter well, but would not for her loose his Priest-hood. Sanballat replied, that if he would retaine his daughter, he would not onely maintaine him in his Priest-hood, but procure him a high Priests place, and make him Prince of all his Province; and would build a Temple like to that of Ierusalem in mount Garizin, which looketh ouer Samaria, higher then the other hills, and that with the consent of K. Darius. Hereupon Manasses abode with him, and many Priests and Israelites being intangled with like mariages reuolted to him, and were maintained by Sanballat. But now Alexander preuailling against Darius, Sanballat (whose Religion was Policie) rebelled, and tooke part with Alexander, and in reward thereof obtained leaue to build his Temple, whereof Manasses enioyed to him and his successors the pontificall dignity. Then was the Circumcision diuided; some (as said the Samaritan woman) worshipping in this mountaine, others at Ierusalem. The zeale which the Samaritans had to their Temple, appeared in the time of Ptolomeus Philometor; when at Alexandria Sabbaus and Theodosius, with their Samaritans, contended with Andronicus and the Iewes, these challenging to Ierusalem, those to Garizin, the lawfull honour of a Temple, both parties swearing by God and the King, to bring prooffe of their assertion out of the lawe; and beseeching the King to doe him to death that should not make his part good; and thereupon the Samaritans failing in prooffe, were adiudged to punishment.

The Samaritans in the prosperitie of the Iewes professed themselues their kinsmen and allies: in aduersitie disclaimed them, and their God also, as appeareth in their Epistle to Antiochus that figure of Antichrist, and persecuter of the Iewish Religion, in which they call themselves Sidonians dwelling in Sichem, and say, that moued by ancient superstition they had embraced the Feast of the Sabbath, and building a Temple of a namelesse Deity had offered therein solemne sacrifices: whereas therefore their originall was Sidonian and not Iewish; pleased him to enact that their Temple might beare name of Iupiter Graecicus, and they might liue after the Greekish Rites. These things Antiochus easily granted. This Sichem is called Sichar, Jo. 4. 5. It was after that called Neapolis, and lastly (of the Colonie which Vespasian or Domitian plac'd there) Plania Caesarea. Of that Colonie was (it is Scaligers testimonie, Animad. Euseb. p. 201.) Iustin Martyr, omnium Scriptorum Ecclesiasticorum qui hodie extant, vetustissimus; which occasioned Epiphanius his errour, that of a Samaritane he became a Christian; whereas he was neuer a Samaritan in Religion, but onely of this Samaritan Colonie. In this were in the age of Beniamin one hundred Samaritans: the wordes of Beniamin are worthy the inserting. I came, saith he, to Samaria, in which the Pallace of Ahab is yet to be knowne, a place very delectable, with Springs, Riuers, Gardens, &c., and hath not one Iew inhabiting. Two leagues from hence is Nabes, sometime called Sichem, in mount Ephraim, where are no Iewes. The Citie is situate betweene the hills Garizin and Heball; there are about a hundred Cuthans, which obserue onely the Lawe of Moses. They are called Samaritans: they haue Priests of the posteritie of Aaron which resteth in peace, who marrie not with any other but the men or women of their owne stocke, and are there commonly called Aaronites; they sacrifice and burne their offerings offerings in a Synagogue which they haue on Mount Garizim, citing out of the Law, Thou shalt giue a blessing vpon the Mount Garizim & this (say they) is the house of the Sanctuarie, and on the Paschall and other solemnities they sacrifice on an Altar in Mount Garizim, made of stones, taken by the Israelites out of Iordan. They boast themselves to be of the Tribe of Ephraim. With them is the Sepulchre of Ioseph. Hee addeth (which Scaliger saith, is a slander) that they want three letters, He, Cheth, Ain; whereas they reade the Pentateuch in so many and the same letters, in which Moses wrote them, as Posse and Scaliger affirms, whereas the Iewes vse later counterfeits; the example whereof Scaliger hath giuen vs in their Computation, in the last Edition of his Emendation: yea they are now also further from Idolatrie then the Iewes themselves, howsoeuer in their Talmud and elsewhere, they brand them with false and odious imputations. Beniamin also testifieth, that they abstaine from pollution by the dead, or bones, the flaine and the Sepulchres. And euery day when they goe into the Synagogue, they put off their vsuall clothes, and hauing washed their bodies with water, put on other clothes, sacred only to this purpose. Beniamin found of these Cuthians two hundred in Casarea: at Benibera or new Afcalon three hundred, and at Damascus foure hundred.

Hircanus by force tooke both Sichem and Garizim. Two hundred yeares after the foundation of this Temple, as testifieth Iosephus,<sup>a</sup> hapned this desolation thereof. The zeale yet continued as appeareth by many testimonies of Scripture. The Iewes meddled not with the Samaritanes, which made<sup>b</sup> the woman wonder that Christ asked drinke of a Samaritane. Another time the Samaritans would not receiue him because his behaviour was as though he would goe to Ierusalem, for which fact of theirs the sons of thunder would haue brought lightning from heauen vpon them. And the Iewish despite could not obiect worle in their most venomous slander, then, Thou art a Samaritane. This Ierusalem-iourney through the Samaritanes countrey caused bloudie warres and slaughter betwixt the Galileans<sup>c</sup> and them, in the time of Cumanus, to the destruction of many. And before that in the daies of Pilate, a coufning Prophet abused their zeale, bidding them to assemble in mount Garizim<sup>d</sup> with promise there to shew them the sacred vessels, which, said he, Moses had there hidden. Whereupon they seditiously assembling, and besieging Tirabatha, Pilate came vpon them with his forces, and cut them in peeces.

Their opinions (besides those aforesaid) were, & that onely the fise bookes of Moses were Canonically Scripture, the rest they receiued not. They acknowledge not the Resurrection, nor the Trinitie: and in zeale of one God, abandon all idolatries, which it seemeth was receiued of them after the building of the Temple, and mixture with the Apostata Iewes; the Scripture testifying otherwise of their former deuotions. They wash themselves with Vrine, when they come from any straunger, being (forthsooth) polluted. And if they haue touched one of another Nation, they diue themselves, garments and all, in water. Such a profanation is the touch of one of another faith. They haue a dead corps in abomination presently.

The Samaritan<sup>e</sup> if he meeteth a Jew, Christian, or Mahumetan, he saith vnto them, Touch me not. Scaliger out of the Arabian Geographer, telleth of an Iland still inhabited with these Samaritans, in the red Sea, which appeareth by their custome, when any comes on shore, forbidding to touch them. This arrogant superstition remaineth with them.

The Samaritan Chronicle is cited by Eusebius Chron. grac. l. 1. 1. & Scaliger, saith hee, had a copie of their great Chronicle, translated out of Hebrew into Arabian, but in Samaritan letters: it differeth somewhat from the Hebrew account. The Iewes confound the Samaritans and Sadducees, as if they were but one Sect. The difference hath appeared, for the Sadducees accept all the Bible; the Samaritans, Moses only. The Sadducees denyed the soules immortalitie and reward. The Samaritans in their Chronicle acknowledge both a place of reward, and punishment after this life. But whether they beleue the Resurrection or no, he doubteth. The Sadducees denie Spirits, Angels, Diuels; the Samaritans confesse them. The Samaritans also vse still those ancient letters called Phoenician, which the Hebrewes vsed before the captiuitie, which who so listeth listeth to view, let him see their Characters, and Scaliger's large notes thereon in his Annotations vpon Eusebius Chronicle: and a brieft of their Chronicle and Kalendar therein written in his Emondation, as before is said: which they beginne very religiously after their manner. In the name of Iab the God of Israel. There is none like to Iab our God. One Iebona, God of Gods, Lord of Lords, a great God, strong and terrible. There is none like to the God Ieschurun, the God of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Ioseph, and our Lord Moses, Eloazar, and Phineas. Hee confirme vnto you the blessing of our Lord Moses. Iebona God of our Fathers adde vnto you, as many as yee are, a thousand times and blesse you. This inscription the great Synagogue of Garizim alwaies vse, when they write to other Samaritan-Synagogues, the Kalendar of the yeare following. They are very ignorant of antiquities, and know none other but that they came thither with Moses out of Egypt: neither can they tell any thing of the old Kings, or defection of the ten Tribes vnder Ieroboam. They lightly touch the names of Sampson, Samuel, Dauid, and others, in their Chronicle, which they call the booke of Iosue. Ptolemæus Lagi conueyed Colonies of them into the Cities of Egypt, the reliques whereof are those Samaritans which haue a Synagogue in the great Citie Cairo: and those also in the Iland before mentioned. In respect of the Mount Garizim the seat and Sanctuarie of their holies, the Samaritans call themselves men which belong to the blessed Hill: and still, euery yeare they in Egypt receiue from the great Synode of Garizim, the type of the yeare following; two of which Scaliger had seene, and hath expressed one of them.

The Samaritans were diuided also into diuers sects, as Epiphanius * rehearseth: one whereof were called * Dositheans: if it be lawfull to reckon them Samaritans, which acknowledged (as Epiphanius acknowledgeth of them) the Resurrection of the dead. They abstaine from such things as haue life: some of them from marriage after they haue bene before married, and some continue in Virginitie. They obserue circumcision and the Sabbath: and they touch no man; but hold euery man in abomination. Report goeth also of their fasting and exercises.

They had name of Dositheus: who being a Iew, and hauing well profited in their law, but not receiuing promotion futable to his ambition, reuolted to the Samaritans; and hatched this sect amongst them. And when afterwards in a singularity he had gone aside into a Caue, and there mewed vp himselfe, and persisted in hypocrisie and fasting, he there dyed (as the same goeth) through his wilfull want of bread and water. After a few dayes, some resorting to him found his dead body crawling with wormes, and compassed with flies. § Of this name Dositheus there were diuers. <sup>b</sup> Two of them liued after the coming of Christ. One a Iew, sonne of R. Iannai, the other a Samaritan which endeouored to perswade his Countrymen that he was the Christ which Moses had prophesied of, as <sup>c</sup> Origen reporteth, and saith: of him are the Dositheans named. Another is mentioned in <sup>d</sup> Iohannin, who liued in the time of Christ, the Disciple of Sammai. And before these was another Dosthai, the sonne also of Iannai, of whom it is said in <sup>e</sup> Ilmedenu, that Senacherib sent R. Dosthai, to Samaria, to teach the Samaritans the law. This seemeth to be he, whom before out of Epiphanius we haue called Esdras, the first founder of the Samaritan heresie. And to Tertullian <sup>f</sup> saith of him; Dositheus the Samaritan, was the first that reiected the Prophets, as not hauing spoken by the holy Ghost. The like testimonie Hierome giueth of him. His colleague and companion is said to be one Sebua, the supposed Author of the Sebueans. In Ilmedenu <sup>g</sup> he is called Sebuaia, or Sebuaia. <sup>h</sup> Dositheus also taught, that how and in what position of body hee was in the Sabbath morning, in the same hee ought to continue all that day, without change of gesture or place: that if he did sit, he should sit in the same place all day long, and so of lying or other habit of body. The Author of this Dosithean Sect, (properly so called) liued, as Scaliger <sup>i</sup> thinketh, about or at the destruction of the Temple, and could not be that first Dosthai or Dosthai. <sup>k</sup> The Sebueans <sup>k</sup> you haue heard, in Drusius opinion, haue their name of Sebuaia, the companion of Dosthai, sent by Senacherib, or rather by Esarhaddon; which if it be so, it seemeth this sect is ancient, haply nothing differing from the other Samaritans.

their helpe at Ierusalem, which was common to all the Samaritans. The difference he alleageth is the transposing of their solemnities (for that quarrell betwixt them and the Jewes) from the Jewish times, so that they kept their Passe-over in August (which they made the beginning of their yeare) Pentecost in Autumne, and that of Tabernacles, when the Jewes kept their Passe-over: neither might they sacrifice in Garizin, observing such differing solemnities. Scaliger * (whom I shame not thus often to name, in relation of these things too intricate for mine owne, or for common wits to finde) both in his Treatise against Serapion cap. 1. and 21. and in his Canons Isagog. l. 3. dissenteth from Epiphanius: saying, that they dissented not from the other Samaritans, but that the name was a common name, which the Jewes ascribed to the Samaritans: It signifieth Equal <sup>19</sup>, Weekers: which name they gaue them because that every weeke betwene the Passe-over and Pentecost, they observed that day of the weeke, in which the computation of the fiftie dayes beganne, with as great solemnitie as the feast of Pentecost it selfe. This day, from which the reckoning beganne, was called Suripa, the second, because it was the next day after the Azyma or Feast day. But the Samaritans reckoned the second after the Sabbath, and so in all that space of fiftie dayes, kept the first day of the weeke, that is, Sunday, holy. Thus they kept seven Pentecosts in a yeare. And perhaps (he but coniectureth) as they had these imaginarie Pentecosts, so they might at other times of the yeare haue such imaginarie solemnities of other Feasts. From that word Suripa, the second day, and next to the Feast of vnleauened bread, the Sabbaths, saith Scaliger in the same place, were called in order, the first Suripapuros <sup>20</sup> uictator, the second Sabbath after that day, Suripapuros <sup>21</sup>, and so therest: and thus he expoundeth those wordes of Luke c. 6. v. 1. secundo primum Sabbathum, that is, the first Sabbath after that Suripa, or first day of the fiftie, which beganne to bee reckoned the next day after Easter till Pentecost. A place hitherto very obscure. Epiphanius doth number for Samaritane sects; The Esseni, * of which is before shewed that they were Jewes, and otherwise hereticall and idolatrous in respect of their morning-deuotions to the Sunne, for which it seemeth they might not, (certaine they did not) communicate with other Jewes in the Temple and sacrifices. These pertaine not to this place; as not Samaritans. A fourth Samaritane sect he accounteth the Gortheni, <sup>b</sup> which differed from the rest, at least from the Schunians, in keeping their solemnities, Paschall, Pentecost, and of Tabernacles at the Jewish times, and observed but one day holy: as likewise the fasting day. The Jewes still obserue the Sabbaticall yeare, and so doe the Samaritans also, but not at the same time; for that which is the fourth of the seven with the Jewes, is the Sabbaticall of the Samaritans.

more then recompenced, when their Messiah, so long before prophesied and expected, came among his owne, but his owne receiued him not: yea, they crucified the Lord of glorie. But euen then also did not the long-suffering God reiect them, Christ praied for them, the Apostles preached to them remission of this and all their sinnes, till that (as Paul chargeth them) they putting these things from, and iudging themselves unworthie of eternall life, God remoued this golden candlestick from amongst them to the Gentiles, and let out his Vineyard to other husbandmen. Famine, sword, and pestilence at once assailed them. (And what shall not assaile, what will not preuaile against the enemies of God?) Ierusalem, sometimes the glorie of Earth, the type of Heauen, the Citie of the great King, and Mother-citie of the Iewish Kingdome, from this incomparable height, receiued as irrecoverable a fall, besieged and sacked by Titus, and yet more violently tortured with inward convulsions, and euill gripes, then by outward disease, or forraigne hostilitie. Iosephus and Iosephus<sup>f</sup> have handled the same at large, both which can acquaint the English Reader with the particulars. Besides many thousands by Vespasian and the Romans slaine in other places of Iudea, Ierusalem the holy Citie was made a prison, slaughter-house, and graue of her owne people. First had diuine mercie by Oracle remoued the Christians to Pella out of the danger, that without any impediment the flood-gates of vengeance might bee set wide open for Desolation; black-guard to enter. Here might you see the strong walls shaking and falling, with the pulues of the yron ramme; there the Romans bathing their swords in Iewish entrails; here the seditious Captaines disagreeing in mutuell quarrels, written in blood; there agreeing in robbing and burning the Citie, and in slaughter of the Citizens: here hunger painted with pale colours in the ghastly countenances of the starued inhabitants; there, dyed in red with the blood of their dearest children, which the tyrannie of famine forceth to re-enter into the tenderest-hearted mothers wombe, sometime the place of Conception, now of buriall: Euery where the eye is entertayned with differing spectacles of diuersified Deaths, the Eare with cries of the insulting Souldier, of the famished children, of men and women euen now feeling the tormenting or murthering hand of the seditious: the sent receiuech infectious plague and contagion from those humane bodies, with inhumanitie butchered, whom no humanitie buried: the taste is left a meere and idle facutie, saue that it alway tasteth the more distastefull poison of not-tasting and emptinesse: what then did they see, or what did they not see? where all senses seemed to be referued that they might haue sense of punishment? where all outward, inward, publike, priuate, bodily, ghostly plagues were so readie executioners of the Diuine sentence. The continuall sacrifice first ceased for want of Priests of the last course, to whom in order it had defended; after, for want of a Temple before polluted with Ethnick sacrifices, and murders of the Priests and Souldiers, and lastly ruined, the sacred Vessels thereof being carried to Rome for ornaments of the Temple of Peace, which Vespasian had there erected.

Eleuen hundred thousands are numbred of them which perished in this destruction: The remnant that escaped the Roman sword, for the most part, perished after in war, or killed themselves, or were referued either for solemnitie or triumph, or (if they were vnder seuentene years of age) sold vnto perpetuall slaueerie, 97000. of these Iewish slaues were numbred: Galatius<sup>k</sup> accounteth 200000. And that the bond of God might be the more manifest, they which at their Passe-over-seast had crucified the son of God, are at the same time gathered together in Ierusalem, as to a common prison-house of that whole Nation: and they, which had bought Christ of the Traitor Iudas for thirtie peeces of silver, were sold bittie of them for one peece. Galatius<sup>k</sup> telleth of two false Prophets, whom, comming in their owne name, they receiued for their Messias, hauing before refused Iesus that came in his Fathers name: both these were called Ben or Barchesba, that is, the sonne of lying. The one, not long after the Passion of Christ, (if the Iewes be not the sonnes of lying which write it) the other in the time of Adrian Rabbi Akiba, (famous for his wisdom, for his 24000. Disciples, and for his long life) receiued both in their succeeding ages: and interpreted to the first, that place of<sup>m</sup> Haggai, I will shake the beaues, &c. But afterward they flew him as the Talmud witnesseth, which also affirmeth<sup>n</sup> that Titus enioyned the Iewes, which he suffered suffered to remaine, that from thence they should no more observe Sabbaths, nor abstaine from unchaste women. Adrian in the eighth yeare after the destruction of Ierusalem the Jewes made the Citie bitter to be their chiefe Citie, and rebelled by the perswasion of Amorhab (so he called himselfe) that is, the sonne of the starre: Of him Hierome testifieth, that he had a juggling trick to kindle straw in his mouth and breathe it forth as if he had spittle. Of him did Alkila (which had beene Armour-bearer to the former) interpret the prophetie of Isaiah, Nimrod 23. Ther shall arise a signe of Iacob. Adrian then sent four hundred men in bitter (where if you beleene the Jewish fables) were 8000. which sounded Trumpets, every one of them Captaines of many Bands, which helped Barabaz, (so they called him after) that is, the sonne of lying, who had 20000 or 30000 soldiers, which to testifie their love and valour had cut off every mans finger from his hand. After three yeares and sixe monthes, the Citie was taken, and this their Masseine, together with such multitudes that the blood reached to the horses mouthes, and carried downe great streames with the streame thereof, running to the Sea four miles from bitter. And Adrian had a Vineyard eighteen miles square, which he hedged with those staine carkasses, as high as a man can reach (a reacher I thinke.) There were two Rivers in the Region of Jerico, and the third part of them by estimation of the Wise-men, was the blood of the slaine: and seven yeares together did the people of the Gentiles fasten and hearken their Vines, only with the blood of the Jewes. Adrian slue also at Alexandria in Egypt, seven hundred thousand Jewes.

Dion Nicai (a more credible Author) affirmeth that Adrian sent Seneca against the Jewes, who in regard of their multitudes would not trie it with their ioynt forces in set battell, but taking his occasions and best oportunities proceeded more slowly and more surely: tooke fiftie of their fortified Castles, rased nine hundred and four score of their best Townes, slue a sundrie times 580000. of their men, besides innumerable multitudes, which perished of famine, sicknesse, and fire, these gleannings being greater then the other harvest. Salomons Sepulchre by falling downe had fore-signified this their downe-fall: and Hyans and Wolves prodigiously entering their Cities, seemed to howle their Funerall obsequies. All Iudra was left almost desolate. Ensebius out of Ariston Pollus addeth, that Adrian prohibited the Jewes by an Edict to come near to Ierusalem, or once from any high place to looke towards the same, or the region adjoining. Neuer did Nabuchodonosor or Titus so afflict the Jewes as Adrian did. Salomonicus saith, there was a decree made at Rome that no Jew should ever enter Cyprus, where the rebellion began, and that Adrian destroyed twice as many Jewes, as had come out of Egypt with Moses. We have already shewed how he destroyed this Citie, and built a new (the present Ierusalem) called of his owne name Elia. Hee made Swine over the Gates of this new Citie, which Images were most faithfull Portents to prohibit the Jewes (faithfully superstitious in their faithlesse superstitions) to enter. And as he had erected a Temple to Iupiter, in, or neare the place where the Temple had stood, so (to afflict the Christians also) hee built another Temple of Iupiter in Golgotha, and of Venus at Bethleem, which continued till the time of Constantine. The Christian Jewes gained by this losse: for when as they might not come to Ierusalem, they afterwards relinquished their wonted Jewish ceremonies. This was the end of Barchozba. And such is the end of all which fight against God and their Soueraigne, their arrows which they shoote against the clouds fall downe upon themselves: he proues a falling starre, which being but a groser elementarie exhalation, is eleuated by his owne aspiring course (not to the firmament) but to some higher Region of the aire, where it shineth with the fire which burnes it, and moueth with some short glauce, till with selfe-ruine it returneth (whence it had beginning) to the Earth.

Thus haue wee scene the Jewes banished their Countrie (about the yeare 135.) agreeing to which their miserable estate was that order of Men, mentioned by Sealiger called Silvados, Mourners, Heracitus his Heires, which spent their time in weeping, and intended nothing but Lamentation for the Defoliation of their Sanctuary.

These have been among the Jewes (saith hee) ever since this destruction, and were once a yeare, on the ninth day of the moneth Ab, allowed entrance into Jerusalem by Adrian's Edict. But then also, saith S. Hieronim, they are forced to pay for it, that they which sometime bought the blood of Christ, now must buy their owne teares. Thus may you see (saith he) on that day whereon Jerusalem was taken by the Romans, decrepit women, and old ragged men (annus puerisq; iobis) and many wretched people (but pittied of none) with blubbered cheekes, black armes, dishevelled haire, howling, and lamenting; for the ruines of their Sanctuarie, in their bodies and habite bearing and wearing the marks of diuine vengeance: of whom the Souldier exacteth his fee also, for libertie of further weeping. It is written in an ancient Iournall of Budeanz, that not farre from the Images there is a stone boared through, to which the Jewes come yearly, and annoint it, lamenting grievously, and renting their garments, and then depart. Beniamin (an Hebrew Author) relateth that one and twentie dayes journey from Kupha through the wilderness; hee trauelled to the Region of Seth, where dwelled Jewes, called the children of Rechab or men of Thima, which gave riches to the Disciples of the wise, who continually apphed themselves to learning and to sermons, alway sitting in the Schoole, and to the humbled Israelites, and devout persons, which lament Sion, and bewaile Iersalem. These dwell in Caves, or in ruined houses, fasting all the dayes of their life, except on the Sabbaths and Festivals, beseeching mercie continually at the hands of God, touching the banishment and deportation of Israel: they neuer eat flesh nor drinke wine. (The same also doe all the Jewes of the Countrie Thima and of Talmass pray: all which goe with rent clothes, and fast fortie dayes for the Iewish captiuitie. And so let them mourne which refuse the glad tidings of great ioy to all people; that unto vs is borne Isa. 53. 1. A Saviour, which is Christ the Lord.

But yet what rockie heart can but mourne with them; and for them, thus made spectacles to the World of bodily and spirituall miserie; which both in these times mentioned, and (before) in the time of Traian, and in all ages since, hath pursued them in all places of their habitation, if that name may bee given to this World-wandering and Vagabond-people? In the time of Traian, Adrian's predecessor, the Jewes had rebelled in Egypt, and Cyrene, where they committed much outrage and mischief, vnder one Luke their Captaine, against whom the Emperour sent Martin Turbo, who destroyed many thousands of them; and fearing that the Jewes in Mesopotamia would doe the like, commanded Lucius Quietus to destroy them vntirely, in recompence of which service, executed to his minde, he made him President of Idaza. Dion. N. Tra. saith, That the Captaine of the Jewes was named Andrew, and that they slue many Greekes and Romans, did eat their flesh, girt themselves with their guts, were imbrewed with their blood, and clothed with their skinned; many they sawed asunder, from the crowne downwards, many they cast to the Beasts, and many were found to kill one another with mutuall combats, so that two hundred and twentie thousand persons perished by this vspeakable crueltie. In Egypt and Cyprus, vnder their Captaine Artemion they destroyed two hundred and fortie thousand. They were subdued by Traian's Captaynes, specially by Lucius: and it was made a capitall crime for a Jew (although forced by tempest) to set foote in Cyprus, Africa was reseeded (where they had destroyed) with new Colonies. No marvell if the Romans (thus prouoked) both in the time of Traian and Hadrian destroyed so many thousands of them. Julian afterwards gaue them leave to returne into their Countrie, and rebuild their Temple, more for hatred of the Christians, then for loue to their Nation: whose wickednesse and answerable successe herein is plainly detected and detested by Gregorius Nazanzens, and other Fathers, as we before have related.

To adde further of their bodily confusions, and the illusions of their bewitched mindes; Nicephorus mentioneth a Pseudo-Moses of the Jewes in the parts of Arabia destroyed by the forces of the Empire, together with his Complices in a like rebellion.

h Socr. 1. 7. 37 Socrates describeth a further madnesse of theirs (for true is that saying of Saint Paul,

That

That they which will not beleene the Truth, are giuen over to strong delusions to beleene lies.) In the Ile of Creete was * a false Prophet, that affirmed himselfe to bee Moses, which led the Israelites through the red Sea, and to be sent from heaven to those Iewes to conduct them through the Red Sea, into the continent of the Holy Land. This hee perswaded them for the space of a whole yeare, going from Citie to Citie: and at last induced them to leaue their riches to them that would take him, and to follow him: at a day appointed he went afore them vnto a Promontorie of the Sea, and there bids them leape in; which many obeying, perished in the waues, and many more had perished, had not some Christian Merchants and Fishers been at land, which saued some, and forbade the rest to follow. The Iewes seeking to bee reuenged of this counterfeite Moses, could no where finde him: and therefore thought him to be some Deuill in humane shape, which sought their destruction, and thereupon, many of them became Christians. Beniamin Tudelenis reporteth of one in Persia called Dauid Etroi, sometime the Disciple of Hafsdai, which was * Head of the captiuitie, one learned in the law and Talmud, in forraigne learning, the Ismaelites tongue and in Magike, who gathered together the Iewes in Hbaphison, and would needes warre on all Nations, and winne Ierusalem, affirming that God had sent him therefore, and to free them from the Gentiles. Many beleued him to be the Messias. The King of Persia sent for him, imprisoned him in the Citie Dabasthan, whence they are not freed during life. But he three dayes after when the King and his Councell sate to examine and take order for this businesse, came amongst them: and when the King asked who brought him thither; hee said his owne wisdom and industrie. The King bid lay hold on him, but his seruants answered, they could heare him, but not see him: and away he went, the King following him to a Riuer, ouer which Dauid stretching his hand-kerchiefe passed ouer, and was then scene of them all, who in vaine pursued him with their boats. This Dauid the same day went ten dayes journey from thence to Elghamaria, and declared to the Iewes there all which had passed. The Persian sent to the Calipha of Bagded, that hee should cause the head of the captiuitie, to perswade him to other courses, otherwise threatening destruction to all the Iewes in Persia; which Iewes likewise for feare thereof writ to the head of the captiuitie. He therefore writ to Dauid: Wee would haue thee to know that the time of our deliuerance is not yet come, nor haue we yet scene our signes: and therefore enioyne thee to desist from these attempts: otherwise, be thou cast out from all Israel. But he proceeded neuerthelesse, till Zinaldin, a Turkish King, subiect to the Persian, corrupted his Father in law with ten thousand peeces of gold, who accordingly with a sword slew him in his bed. And thus ended Dauid, but not his designs: for the Iewes in Persia were forced by many talents of gold to buy their peace with the King. About the same time Rambam tells of another, which tooke vpon him to bee the messenger of the Messias, which should direct his way before him, preaching that the Messias would appeare in the South. To him resorted many Iewes and Arabians, whom he led alongst the Mountaines, professing to goe meete the Messias, who had sent him. Our Brethren in the South Countrie wrote to me a long letter hereof, declaring the innouations hee made in their prayers, and his preachings amongst them, asking my aduite. And I writ a Booke, saith Rambam, for their sakes, touching the signes of the coming of the Messias. This Seduces was taken after a yeares space, and brought before one of the Kings of the Arabians, which examined him of his courses, who answered that he had so done at the commandement of God, in witnesse whereof he bad him cut off his head, and he would rise againe and reuiue: which the King caused to be done, without any such miraculous effect ensuing. The like telleth Isaac Leuita, of one Leimlen a Iew in the yeare 1500. as also of R. Dauid which about the same time was burned for like cause. The Iewes haue Legends (as that of Eldad, translated by Genebrard) of multitudes of Iewes in Ethiopia: whom when we come thither, we will visit. But alas it is small comfort, being burned in the fire, to make themselves merrie with smoke.

Of their miseries sustayned in all places of their abode, all histories make mention. And yet their superstition is more lamentable then their dispersion; as also their peruerse and stubbornnesse in their superstition. And certainly me thinks, that euen to him that will walke by sight, and not by faith, not obliging his credit to meete authoritie, as the case standeth betwixt vs and the Scriptures, but will bee drawne by the cords of Reason only and Sense, euen to such a one, me thinkes, this Historie of the Iewes may be a visible demonstration of the Truth of Christian Religion: not onely because the truth of the prophecies of <sup>a</sup> Iacob, of <sup>a</sup> Moses, of <sup>b</sup> Esey, and other the Prophets is fulfilled in them; and because Gods iustice still exacteth the punishment of the betraying and murdering that Iust one; but especially in this, that the bitterest Enemies, cruellest Persecutors, and wilfullest Haters that euer were of the Christian Truth, are dispersed into so many parts of the World, as witnesses of the same Truth; holding and maintayning to death the Scriptures of Moses, and the Prophets; then which, euen Reason being Iudge (as is said before) we will not desire sounder and fuller proofes of our Profession. Neither is our Gospell wherein wee differ from them, any other then the fulfilling of their Law: and Christ came not to destroy the Law, but to fulfill the same. In him the Promises, in him the Figures, in him the righteousness of the Law, righteousness in Doctrine, righteousness in Practice, righteousness of Doing, righteousness of Suffering, to satisfie the debt, to meritt the inheritance, are the witnesses, that in him they are all, yea, and Amen, haue received their perfect being and accomplishment. But <sup>c</sup> the veile is ouer their hearts; eyes they haue and see not, eares and heare not: They hold out to vs the light of Scripture, themselves walking in darkenesse, and reserued to darkenesse; like to a Lampe, Lanthorne, or Candlestick, communicating light to others, whereof themselves are not capable, nor can make any vse.

But to returne, to consider further of their dispersions. Wee haue shewed how they were vtterly cast out of their Countrey: and Italie, and the Empire was filled with Iewish slaues. Nor was this their first dispersion: but as the Assyrians had carried away the other ten Tribes, whose off-spring, as is thought, about the yeare of our Lord GOD, one thousand two hundred, founded that mightie Empire of Cathays; so the Babylonians carried away the two Tribes remayning, which might haue returned vnder the Persian Monarchie; but many remayned in those Countreies till the dissolution of that Iewish state, and after. They had a famous Vniuersitie, at Babylon, which indured till the yeare of CHRIST, one thousand three hundred (so writeth <sup>d</sup> Boterus.) At which time they fleeing the persecutions of the Arabians dispersed themselves into <sup>e</sup> India, where many are found at this day. These, through continuall conuersing with the Gentiles and Christians, haue small knowledge of the law, and lesse would haue but for other Iewes, that resort thither out of Egypt. Before that time also, if we beleue the Ethiopian Historie, twelue thousand Iewes (of each Tribe a thousand) went with the Queene of Saba's Sonne, which, they say, shee had by Salomon, into that Countrey, and there remayne their posteritie to this day.

Thus is ASIA and AFRIKE fraught with them, but EVROPE much more. Adrian banished five hundred thousand into Spaine, where they multiplied infinitely, and founded an Vniuersitie at Corduba, about the yeare of our Lord one thousand: and at Toledo was a Schoole of twelue thousand Iewes, about the yeare of our Lord, one thousand two hundred thirtie and sixe, as writeth <sup>h</sup> Rabbi Mosche Mikatz: from hence it seemeth they swarmed into England and France. Their miseries here in our Land indured, are by our Authors mentioned: in the dayes especially of King Richard the first, and King Iohn: and the whole Land gave a fif part of their goods to King Edward the first, to banish them, Anno one thousand two hundred ninetie and one, the number of which expelled out of England were 16511.

Out of France they were thrice banished by three Philips, although in Auinion there still remayne some of them. Being expelled France, they sought habitation in Germanie, where Conradus the Emperour admitted them into the Countie of Sueuia: and thence they flowed into other parts, into Bohemia (in the Citie of Prague, are about fiftene thousand of them) and in Austria, and into Hungaria, whence, for the crucifying of a childe, they were banished by King Matthias: as at Trent, for the like fact, and poysoning of Welles, they sustained much trouble in Germanie: and many passed to Venice; many also went from thence into Russia (vvhether the people cannot abide to heare them named) and Poland, vvhether Casimere the Great, for loue of an Hebrew Lasse, gaue them many priuiledges. They liue disperfed in the townes and Villages, occupied in handicrafts, and husbandrie. They haue great Synagogues in Cracouia, Leopoldis, and at Trochi, a Towne of Lituania: and Master Barkeley a Marchant of London, who hath spent many yeares in Liuania, Polonia and other of those cold Countries, told me, That the Iewves farme the Custome of the Kings; and at Samajden in Curland one of these Iewvish Customers beat out the braines of a Polonish Merchant; for deserring to open his packe: but in regard of the peoples hatred, prouision is made, vnder great penalties, for their security, and yet many Iewes were there executed by occasion of a murren, procured (as vvas suspected) by Iewvish exorcismes intending a plague to the men, and not a murren to the beasts if their vvorking had forted: but the Iewves said it vvas but a pretence to depriue them of their riches.

They were cast out of Spaine by Ferdinand and Isabella, in the yeare, 1492. It is thought, that there went out of Spaine an hundred and twentie thousand families of them (besides Moores) and out of their Kingdomes of Naples and Sicill. Hence they passed, Anno Domini 1539. into Tuscanie, and the Popes Dominions, vvhen they were banished by Paul the fourth, and Pius the fifth; and receiued againe by Pius the fourth, and Sixtus the fifth; Rome and Venice hauing great store of them. This is the Popes holinesse: he that vvould not vvillingly endure a Protestant in the vvorld; besides he steues vnder his Holinesse nose, can endure the Grecians: yea, and these Iewves, Rome it selfe hauing ten thousand, or, after others reckoning, twentie thousand of them priuiledged vvith their fine Synagogues, Liturgies and publike Sermons; and to straine vp their Visittie to eightheene in the hundred: hauing also in some places (it may be in all) a peculiar Magistrate to decide controuersies betwene Christian and them, vvith particular direction to fauour them in their trade. Dilectis odoriferis ex re qualiter, The beastly trade of Curtisians, and cruell trade of Iewes is suffered for gaine, these paying a yearly rent for the heads they wear, besides other meanes to racke and wracke them in their purses at pleasure, they being vsed as the sponge-like Friars, to sucke from the meaneest, to be squeezed of the greatest; in so much that the Pope, besides their certaine tribute, doth sometimes (as is said) impose on them a Subsidie for ten thousand crownes extraordinarie for some seruice of State. So vvell is the rule of Paul obserued by this Bishop, not to be a louer of filthy lucre.

Out of Spaine they vvent into Barbarie and diuers other Countries, and some into Portugal: vvhere Iohn the second made them pay eight crownes for a poll, and yet limited them short time of departure. Emanuel his successour did the like 1497. except they vvould become Christians, for vvhich hee assayed diuers meanes. But not preuailling he caused their children, vnder the age of foure and twentie yeares, to be baptised; some rather hurling their children into pits, some killing themselves: many for feare were baptised; some vvent into Italle and abode in Ferrara, Mantua, Venetia, in the name of Maronites, and haue a Synagogue at Pisa. But the greatest part of them went into the East to Constantinople and Salonichi, in vvhich two Cities there are about an hundred and fixtie thousand of them. There are of them in all the chiefe Cities of traffike in the Turkish Empire. Tyberias is vvholly inhabited with Iewes, vvhich Citie Zelim gaue to Gratiola a Iewvish matron. In Ierusalem there are about an hundred houses of them. There abide not many, because of a superstitious opinion, That before the Messias shall come, a great fire from heauen will consume that Citie and Countrey, to purge it of the abomination committed there, by prophane Nations. At Zante they are so hated, that from Maundie Thursday vntill Saturday noone, they dare not come abroad: for the people, in a foolish zeale, vvould stone them: and some refuse to eate of their meate or bread. The Turkes in their reproach vse such a kinde of imprecation, If this bee not true, would God I might die a Iew. The old Testament is read of them in these parts in the Hebrew, but their Cakimim and Cobens; that is, their Wife-men and Priests preach in Spanish

AN APPENDIX CONCERNING THE IEWISH Dispersions, out of BENIAMIN TVDELENSIS.

BENIAMIN TVDELENSIS, a Jew of Nauarre, hauing travelled Spaine, France, Italy, Greece, Natolia, Syria, and many other Countries of Asia, Africke, and Europe: worthily reckoned one of the greatest Trauellers that euer liued; at his returne into Spaine 40. yeares since, related what Iewish Synagogue he had seene in the world (one chiefe end, as it seemeth, of his trauels) because it appertaineth to this matter we haue in hand, and the book (translated out of Hebrew by Arias Montanus) is very rare, I thought meet to adde heere a briefe of those things which concerne the Jewes, out of the same. At Barchinon they found a populous Synagogue, another, but smaller, at Gerunda: Narbone was, as it were, Antient-bearer of the Law to all the Countries about, where was chiefe, Kalonymus of the seed of Danid; there were 300. Jewes. Foure leagues thence was the Citie Bidrasch, where was an Vniuersity stored with disciples of the wise: whereof also there were at Mompelier. Lunel was a famous Vniuersitie, where liued Asher the Pharisee, which studied night and day, fasting and perpetuall abstaining from flesh, with Messulam, Ioseph, Iacob, Aaron, which by the bountie of the Vniuersitie gaue food, rayment, and teaching to such as came from farre to studie there, as long as they stayed. Theremas a Synagogue of three hundred Jewes. At Pothiaquiers fortie, at Nogheres about an hundred, at Arles 200. at Massilia two Colledges, and 300. Jewes. At Rome 200. free from tribute, at Salerno 600. at Beneuent an Vniuersitie of 200. at Tarraam 200. at Tarentum 300. at Ornedo 500. at Thebes two thousand, at Corinth three hundred. There were people living in the Mountaines, which robbed and spoiled all, but dealt more fauourably with the Jewes (whose liues they spared) then with Christians, whom they not onely robbed but slew also. These, said they, were descended of the Jewes: they were called Balachi. At Arimbon were foure hundred, at Seleuca five hundred. Constantinople would not suffer a Jew to dwell in the Citie, nor to ride on horse-backe, except one Solaman the Kings Physician, yea, the people would beat them in the streets. At Pera liued two thousand Jewes, two dayes sailing from thence. At Dorostum was an Vniuersitie of foure hundred, at Rhodes were foure hundred, at Dophros were Jewes, and Cyprian Epicures before mentioned. At Behalgad, were a Sect of Ismaelites with a peculiar Prophet of their owne. At Tripoli many Jewes and Gentiles had a little before perished with an Earthquake, whereof died in all Israel twentie thousand. At Gebal was a place where the Ammonites had sometime a Temple, and in it was an Idol of stone couered with gold, sitting, with two Images of women sitting by, and an Altar before. There were an hundred and twenty Jewes: at Beeroth fifty, at Sidon twenty. Here-awaies liued a people called Dogazin, which others called Pagans, of no sect, nor subject to any Prince; they kept in the mountaines and rockes, three daies journey euen from Hermon. They liue incestuously, the fathers lying with the daughters. They haue an yearely festiual, on which they all meet, both men and women, and there change wiues one with another. They hold opinion, that a good mans soule at his death goeth into some infant then begotten, but the soule of a bad man into some dogge or other beasts bodie. They are exceeding swift, and cannot be overcome; living on the mountaines. It seemed the same with the Drusy mentioned in the former booke, and that they are deceived which make those Drusians some remainder of the Latine Christians, seeing they haue continued so long before that Kingdome ended; and perhaps before it began. At Cafarea were few Jewes, but two hundred Samaritans, at Sebasie an hundred. This is betwene Garizim, an hill fertile & well watered, and Gebal, an hill stonie & drie. In the place of the sometime Sanctuaries at Ierusalem, was a faire and large Temple, called the Temple of the Lord, built of Ghemar ben Alchabab: there the Christians had no Image, but resorted thither only for prayer. Over-against it is a wall, made of the walls of the Sanctuaries,

but borrowed
it of Master
Hakluit.

Quarie, this they call the Gate of Mercie: to this place the Jewes come to pray. The pillar of Lots wife was then continuing, which was said to grow to the former bignes, if at any time the flocks had diminished it with licking. At Hebron was a great Temple: and in a vault six Sepulchres of Abraham and Sara, Isaac and Rebecca, Jacob and Leah: a Lampe perpetually burning: and in the Caue it selfe were tubs full of bones of the ancient Israelites. At Benubera or new Ascalon in the border of Egypt were two hundred Jewes; fortie Carraim, and three hundred Samaritans. At Tiberias were fiftie Jewes, and the Synagogue of Caleb, sonne of Iephunneh: at Damascus were three thousand. There dwelt the Head of the land of Israel, called Esdra, and his brother Sarsalem, which was ouer the Judgment, and Ioseph the fift of the Synedrian, and Adasliab head of the order of Readers: there were two hundred Carraim, and four hundred Samaritans: amongst all which was peace, but no intercourse of marriages in differing Sects. In Thadmar were foure thousand Jewes: here and at Baghala were buildings of stone, so great, that it was said be the worke of Asmodeus (with as good reason as Diabols-Dike with vs.) At Hamath was at Earth-quake in those times, which destroyed fiftene thousand people in one day; and only an hundred and seuentie remained. Haleb in old times called Aram Tzaba, had fiftene hundred Israelites. At Petra in the Desert were two thousand. At Dakia (sometime Chalne) seven hundred. Here was a Synagogue built by Esdra in the returne from Babylon; and another also of his building at Charan, two daies journey thence, the place where Abraham had dwelt, had no building on it, but was frequented by the Israelites to pray there. At Alchabor were two thousand Jewes at Nisibis one thousand, at Gezir ben Ghamar a city on the banks of Tygris were foure thousand. It is foure miles from the place where Noahs Arke rested; which Arke Ghamar sonne of Alchetab brought from the top of the hill to the vfe of a Moschee: neere to which was the Synagogue of Esdra, whither the Jewes on festiuall daies sorted to prayer. Two daies Iorney thence was Al-Mut'al, sometime called Assor, the beginning of the Kingdome of Persia retaining her ancient greatnes, situate on Tygris, a bridge only being betwene that and Niniue (now wholly destroyed, onely castles and streets remained in the circuit thereof) at Al-Mut'al were seven thousand Jewes: and three Synagogues of the three Prophets, Abdias, Jonas and Nahum. In Rahaban anciently Rehoboth, were two thousand. At Karkesia (on the same bank of Euphrates with the former) five hundred at Aliobar, two thousand at Hbardan, fiftene thousand at Ghukpera, built by Iectronia, ten thousand. Two daies journey thence is Bagad, of the Kingdome of the Caliphs, named Amir Almupmanin Alghabassi, the chiefe of the Ismaelite Sect. Here were a thousand Jewes, and ten Synedria or Courts, the heads or chiefe whereof (he nameth them) are called Kacantes, because they attended no other function, but the administering of the society. They giue iudgement to all Jewes, which resort vnto them on any day of the weeke but the second, in which they all meet together before Samuel, the head of the Synedrium. But ouer all these was Daniel son of Hafsa, entituled the Head of the Captiuitie, descended from Dauid, whom the Jewes called Our Lord, the Ismaelites, Syana ben Dauid, Our L. son of Dauid. He had great authority ouer all Congregations of Israelites, warranted to him with the Amirs seale, who caused that all Israelites and Ismaelites should rise to him, vnder paine of an hundred stripes. When he goeth to see the King, it is with very great pompe. This dignity is bought with a great summe of money, giuen to the King and Princes at his Confirmation: and then is the second chariot of the King provided for him. He exerciseth imposition of hands on the men of the Synedrium. There were eight and twentie Synagogues in Bagdad and the Suburb on the other side Tygris. But that Synagogue which pertained to the Head of the Captiuitie, was of marble of diuers colours, adorned with gold and silver, spacious; and on the pillars were verses of the Psalmes written in gold. Before the Arke were ten rowes of seates, with marble steppes, in the highest whereof sat the Head of the Captiuitie, with the Jewes of the family of Dauid. In Gehiagan (sometime Rezen) two daies journey from thence were five thousand Israelites. One daies journey from hence was Babel, now wholly ruined, in which are yet scene the ruines of Nabuchodonosors Pallace; but inaccessible by reason of diuers kinds of Serpents. Twentie miles from these ruines dwell twentie thousand Israelites, lites, which there pray in the Synagogues, the chiefe whereof is that of Daniel, of squared stones. There were at Hhilah (fue miles thence) ten thousand Iewes in foure Synagogues. Foure miles thence it is to the Tower which the sonnes of Diuisions built with Bricks, which the Arabians call Lagzar: the length of the foundation is about two miles, the breadth of the walls two hundred and fortie cubits: where it is broadest it is an hundred reeds; and betweene euery ten reeds space, are wayes in manner of spires continued thorow the whole building, on the top of which one may see twentie miles about. Halfe a daies iourney from hence is Naphabb, where were two hundred Iewes. And three leagues thence the Synagogue of Ezechiel neere Euphrates, and in the same place fixtie Towers one against another, and a Synagogue betweene euery one. The monument of Ezechiel was built of Iechonias with fue and thirrie thousand Iewes. And this is a holy place, whither they resort from the beginning of the yeare to the day of Expiation, to pray and keepe festiuall. Thither commeth the Head of the Captiuitie, and other chiefe men from Bagdad, and two and twentie miles about they pitch their Tents heere and there: and the Arabians keepe then and there a great Faire. At this time they reade on the Expiation day out of a booke which Ezechiel writ: and there is a holy house full of bookes since the titie of the first and second Temple, the custome being, that they which die without children should bequeath their bookes hither. The Iewes in Persia and Media make Vowes to be performed in this place, to which also the Ismaelites resort to pray. The Sepulchre of the three Saints, companions of Daniel, is halfe a dayes iourney from hence, with faire and great arches. Three miles thence is Alkotsonath, and in it three hundred Iewes. At Kupha the Sepulchre of Iecoma, and seuen thousand Iewes. One and twentie daies iourney thorow the wilderness is the Region of Seba, now called the Land of Aliman, where dwell Iewes, the children of Rechab. This Region extendeth sixeene dayes along the mountaines, subiect to no forren Nation, hauing therein foure hundred strong Cities two hundred townes, an hundred Castles. The Metropolis is Themai. In all those Cities are about Three hundred thousand Iewes. In the Region of Tismaas an hundred thousand, Three dayes iourney hence is Chibar, in it fiftie thousand. These (they say) are of the depotation of Ruben, Gad, and Manasses. From hence fue and twentie dayes iourney is Vira, which is a Riuer running into Eliman, where were three thousand. And seuen iournyes from thence Neasat, and in it seuen thousand. Fieue iournyes from thence Boffa vpon Tygris, and in it one thousand. Two dayes iournyes from thence the Riuer Samura, beginning of Persia, with a Towne of the same name, wherein were fiftene hundred. The place is famous by the Sepulchre of Esdra, who in his returne to Babylon in Embassage, heere died. There was a Synagogue honored also by the Ismaelites. In Susan were seuen thousand Iewes in foureene Synagogues, before one of which was the Sepulchre of Daniel: about which rose a controuersie betweene the Inhabitants of the one and other side of the Riuer: they which dwelt on that side where the Sepulchre was, seeming to the other the more fortunate; this caused blowes; but was after agreed, that euery yeare it should be removed by course, which was done with solemne procession, till Senigark the Persian King thinking it a prophanation to the holy Coffin, caused it to be hanged in a chest of glasse for all men to see, and forbade to take fish within two miles of that place in the Riuer.

From hence was three dayes iourney to Robad-Bar, where were twentie thousand Iewes. Two iournyes from hence was the Riuer Vaanath, where were foure thousand Iewes. Foure iournyes further, Malhhaath: heere they were not Ismaelites, nor vnder the Persian: they had two Colledges of Israelites, which acknowledged neuertheless, the Head of the Captiuitie in Bagdad. At Ghaarian, fue iournyes beyond, were fiftie and twentie thousand. Here began the mountaines of Haphithon, wherein were an hundred Synagogues. This is the beginning of Media: they speake Chaldee: and there were amongst them the Disciples of the wise. Ghamaria is vnder the Persian, whither Dauid Elroi was. It was ten dayes iourney thence to Hhaïndan, chiefe Citie of Media, there were fiftie thousand Iewes in that Region, and the Sepulchre of Mordecai and Esther. Foure iournyes further was Debarzethaan, neere the Riuer Gozen, in it foure thousand Iewes. Beyond that, seuen iournyes, Asbahan the chiefe Citie, twelue miles in compasse, and therein 15000. Israelites, over whom, and all the Persian Jewes was Salom by authoritie from the Head of the captivity. Fourte journeyes hence was Sia-phaz, called of olde Persia, whence the whole Region was named Persia; therein 10000. Seuen journeyes thence Ginah vpon Gozen, a famous Mart, in which were 8000. Samarthenb was the furthest Citie of that Kingdome, fve journeyes from Ginah, where were 50000. Fourte journeyes thence Tubot: and 28. further I passed to the mountains Nisbon, which ouerlookes the River Gozen, where were many Israëlitès; and they say there dwell the foure Tribes of Dan, Zabulon, Affer, Naphthali. Their countrey extendeth 20 dayes journey, and hath many Cities, free from subiection to any Heathen: they are gouerned of Iosaph Armacala Lewita: they till the ground, and holde warres with the children of Chus, traouelling through the desert thither. They are in league with the Copher Althorech, a people that worship the windes, and living in the Wildernesse: they haue neyther bread nor wine, but eat raw flesh, cyther new or dried: they haue no nose but onely two holes. Fifteene yeares since, they tooke and sacked Rai a chiefe Citie in Persia; whereupon the King warred against them, and passing through the Wildernesse to them, was deceived by his guide, and his people almost starued, and after forced to flie; with whom passed into Persia Moser one of the Jewes in those parts, which tolde me (Beniamin our Author) all this. Hence I went to Che-uazthaan vpon the River Tygris, which runneth thence into Hoduër the Indian Sea, hauing in the mouth the Iland Nekrokim a famous Mart, where were 500. Jewes. I sailed ten daies thence to Kathiphan, where were 5000. Israelites. Thence to the Kingdome of Haulem, a people of Chus which worship the Sunne: Thence after 22. dayes sayling I came to the Ile Chenerag, where they worship the fire, where were 23000. Jewes. Forty daies sayling from thence was the Kingdome of Sin, from which to Gingalan was 15. daies; there were 10000. Israelites. Thence I went to Ethiopian India, which they call Baghdaan, in which were high mountains, and in them many Israelites, subiect to none, which warred on the Hamaghtani, that is, the Libyans. From thence to Azzan was 20. daies journey through the wildernesse Sebor, the King whereof was Sulian Alhabas an Ismaelite. Twelue daies thence is Hhalauan, where were 300. Jewes; from which they passe in troups through the desert al-Tahaca, into Zeuila in the tract of Geena or Ginza, where they encounter showers of sands. This Region is in the land of Chus, and is called Alhabas, towards the West. Thirteene daies journey from Hhaluan is Kits the beginning of Egypt. And fve from thence Pium, once Pithon, where were 20. Jewes, and many monuments of our fathers to be seene. Thence to Missaim is foure journeyes, where were 2000. Jewes in two Synagogues, which differed in their distribution of the Lectures of their Law: the Babylonians finishing it in a yeare, as in Spainè, the Israelites in three. But twice a yeare they assembled together in prayers, on the feast Latiria Legia, and on the feast Lata Legu. Nathaneel was chiefe over all the Vniuersities (or Synagogues) of Egypt, and appointed Masters, and Aditiu. He was familiar with the King Amir Alnumanin Eli sonne of Abitalib. At Alexandria were 3000. Israelites. But for his trauels in Egypt; and the Synagogues which there he found, as also backe againe into Sicilia, Germane, Boheme, Prussia &c. because there are yet knowne Synagogues of them I surrease relation. And much may I feare I haue too much wearied the Reader in so long a Jewish pilgrimage; but seeing Authours of best note, Scaliger, Drusius, Lipsius, &c. cite him, and Arias Mont. hath taken the paines to translate him, & his trauels are such ample testimonies of this our present subiect of Jewish dispersions. I haue bin bold to annex these things, som whereof might haue found some other place, if the booke had sooner come to my hands. If any list not to beleuee such multitudes of Jewes, I will not vrge him; howsoeuer that deluge of Tartars in all those Ascan Regions soone after Beniamins daies, brought a new face of all things in these Easterly parts: as a law, and relating these things to Jewes, and by Jewes passing to vs, it is like he reported, and we haue receiued, with the most. For his Geographic, some of his names are easily reconciled to the present, some hardly, which I leaue to the Readers indultrie.

CHAP. XI.

He Flood happened (as Moses reckoneth the parcells in the Ages of the Patriarchs) in the year of the world 1656. which are thus accounted; Adam at the hundred and thirtieth year begat Setb: Setb at a hundred and five begat Enos: Enos at ninety Kainan: he at seuentie Mabalaleel, who at sixtie five begat Iared: Iared being one hundred sixtie two yeares olde begat Henoch, who at sixtie five begat Methuselah, and he at a hundred eighty seven begat Lamech, who in his hundred eightie two yeares begat Noah; in the sixe hundredth year of whose life the Flood came: whereof euery Nation almost in the world hath some tradition; howsoever as Censorinus cyteth out of Varro, from the beginning of the world to that first deluge is called αἰών, or vnkowne; as from thence to the first Olympiade was μυθική or fabulous; onely that deserueth the title of ιστορικὴ from the Olympiads forwards, if we regard humane History. But the Diuine hath made the former more cleere then the later. Some difference is in what part of the yeare the world was created, which is supposed to be Autumne; because the trees were then in those parts of Eden laden with fruits; and the Jewes still obserue that time. Scaliger also sometime of a contrary opinion, hath now yeilded to this. And the Egyptians in the time of Firmicus held that the world was created in the thirtieth part of Libra. The Flood after Scaliger began in the year 1657. on Saturday the seuenteenth of Nouember.

The second age of the world is reckoned from the Flood to Abraham: whose birth was after the Flood two hundred ninetie two yeares: Sem two yeares after the Flood begat Arpachsed: he at thirtie five yeares Selah, who in his thirtieth yeare begat Heber: Heber at thirtie foure Pelag, who being thirtie yeares olde begat Regu, and he at thirtie two Serug, in whose thirtieth yeare Nabor was borne, who at nine and twentie begat Terah, who at seuentie yeares begat Abram. Thus Scaliger, Caluissus, Buntinus, Ariat Montanus, Genebrard, Pererius, Adrichomius, Opmeerus, &c. But Innius, Broughton, Lydyat, Codamannus, &c. adde sixtie yeares more. For Moses saith, Gen. 11. 32. That Terah died in Charan, aged two hundred and five yeares, and then Abram (as it is in the next chap.) was seuentie five yeares old; so that Terah when Abram was born, was a hundred and thirtie yeares olde. Whereas therefore he is said at seuentie yeares to beget Abram, Nabor, and Haran; it is to be vnderstood, that he then began to beget: Abram being named first for diuine priuiledge, not because he was eldest. The like phrase is vsed Gen. 5. 32. Noah being five hundred yeares olde begat Shem, Ham, and Japhet; and yet neyther were they all borne at once, nor was Shem the eldest: let the Reader chuse whether of these opinions he best liketh.

Abram borne.

In the seuentie five yeare Abram went out of Charan, hauing receiued the promise from whence to the departure of the Israelites out of Egypt are numbred foure hundred and thirtie yeares. Rather herein we are to follow Pauls interpretation of Moses, then Genebrards, who Gal. 3. 17. accounts those one hundred and thirtie yeares mentioned by Moses, Exod. 12. 40. from the promise made to Abraham, and not from the time that Iacob went downe with his family into Egypt. So that the departure out of Egypt, after Scaligers computation, and some others, Perkins, Adrichomius, &c. happened in the yeare of the world 2453. whereto if we adde those sixtie yeares of Terahs life before mentioned, it amounteth to two thousand five hundred and thirteene. And so Broughton reckoneth, Innius and Lydyat account two thousand five hundred and nine. The difference seemes to arise from hence, that one accounteth from Abrams departing out of Vr of the Chaldees; the other from his departure from Haran after his fathers death about five yeares after. But it were an endlesse worke to reconcile Chronologers in their different computations. Some reckon five and twenty, <sup>b</sup> Scaliger the fifteenth of Aprill, the day of their departure. And then the Hebrewes beganne their year

b Iof. Scaliger

year at the Spring-Equinoctiall, which before they began in Autumne.

From this departure, to the building of Salomons Temple Scaliger reckoneth four hundred and eighty years, whose first foundations (he saith) were laid the nine and twentieth of May being Wednesday, Anno Mundi 2933; and of the great Julian Period (which differeth seven hundred fiftie four years from the year of the world) 3697. In this computation of four hundred and eighty years, betwixt the departure and foundation of the Temple, many Chronologers agree. Arius Montanus, Adrichomius, Brughiae, Perkins, Lydiat, &c. although some dissent much. The sum arithmetick of these passeth. Adas died forty years after their deliverance, Ishu reigned seven and thirtie; Othniel forty; Ehud four score; Gideon forty; Abimelech three; Thohi twenty three; Iaer twenty two; Iephth six; Ibsan seven; Elam ten; Abdon eight; Sampson twenty; Heli forty; Samuel and Saul forty; David forty; Salomon in the fourth year and second month began to build his Temple, after which he reigned thirtie seven years.

From thence to the destruction of the Temple vnder Zedekias are accounted four hundred twenty and seven. This agrees with Ezekiels account, reckoning a day for a year; three hundred and ninety dayes or years after the apostacie of Israel from God, the rebellion against the house of David in the beginning of Reboam his raigne, by the means of Terabani; to which if we adde seven and thirtie years which Salomon reigned, after the foundation of the Temple, the summe is four hundred twenty seven. The same appeareth thus; Roboam reigned seventeen years; Abiam three; Asa forty one; Iehoshaphat twenty five; Iehoram eight; Ahaziah one; Ahaziah six; Ioshabab for tie; Azariah twenty nine; Azaria or Uzziah fiftie two. Betwixt Amon and Ahas the Kingdom was ruled eleven years by the States, as some gather out of 1. Reg. 22. 10. (others reckon it not.) Iotham sixteen; Ahas sixteen; Ezechias twenty nine; Manasses fiftie five; Amon two; Iosias thirtie one; Iehoaiah three moneths; Eliakim or Iehoiakim eleven years; Iehoiachin three moneths; Zedekias or Mattaniah eleven years. The little difference from the former number may be ascribed to the current and unfinished years of some of their reignes.

From this time of Sedekias ruine, some begin the reckning of the sevenie years captivity; in which time others comprehend all Sedekias raigne, and account the return vnder Cyrus to be fiftie nine years after this desolation; and from thence a hundred and eight to the Edict of Darius Nothus, from which time are numbred two hundred fiftie nine to the Dedication of Iudas Maccabaeus; and from thence a hundred fiftie two years to the birth of Christ. So Scaliger.

It were a worke irksome to my selfe, and tedious to the Reader, to recite the variable opinions of Chronologers, or to traaverse their arguments about these points.

To recite here their high Priests and later Kings, with the time of their pontificallie and reigne, out of Arius Montanus, I hold not unfit. First, Iesus returned with Zorobabel, and built the Temple, whose time of Priest-hood, after Scaliger, Iunius, and those that reckon vpon the Edict of Darius Nothus, must needs be very long. To leaue that therefore, his sonne Iadon succeeded in the Priest-hood twenty eight years, besides twenty years with his father. Eliasib held the Priest-hood one and forty yeares; Joiada twenty five; Ionathas twenty four; Jeddo twenty seven, till the time of Alexander; Onias twenty seven, after Philo: but Eusebius saith twenty three; Simon Iushu thirteene; Eleazar twenty; Manasses twenty seuen; Onias thirty nine.

Afterwards the Syrian Kings appointed high Priests: of whom Iasan was Priest three yeares; Meneleus twelue yeares, in whose seventh yeare Iudas Maccabaeus began to administer the Common-wealth. Ionathas brother of Iudas ruled eighteen yeares; Simon his brother was both Priest and Captaine eight yeares; Iacimus Hircanus his sonne thirtie one. Whereas they had vsed to date their contracts according to the yeares from Alexander, as we read in the books of Maccabees: when Simon Hircanus was high Priest that order was abolished, & another taken, that every date should be expressed in such or such a yeare of N, high Priest of the great God. But least the Writing being cancelled, should be neglected, and perhaps the Name of God cast with it on the dung-hill, the wise-men abolished that order on the third of Tisri, which they inflinstituted a holy day. As for the name of Maccabees, Iunius saith it came from the inscription of those seven letters Maccabees. Scaliger saith, that Judas only and properly was so called, but by a abuse of speech was not only given to all of that kindred, but to all which suffered in those times persecution for Religion; as the seven brethren, and others. The name Hosmones began with that Hircanus, Scaliger thinketh, because in the sixty eight Psalm by the Jewes interpreted Princes.

Aristobulus sonne of Hircanus, first after the captivitie called himselfe King, and reigned one yeare: Jannus Alexander his brother twenty seven: after him his wife Alexandra nine: Hircanus her sonne three moneths: Aristobulus his brother three yeares. Jerusalem was taken of Pompey, and Hircanus recovered the Priesthood, which he held two and twenty yeares: Antigonus by ayde of the Parthians possessed Judza five yeares, and in his second yeare Herod was proclaimed King by the Romans, who tooke the Cittie the fift yeare of Antigonus, and reigned foure and thirty.

Scaliger ascribeth to Herod Kingdome the number after Eusebius account, reckoning from the birth of Abram 1977. he died 2016. Archelaus his sonne was made by Augustus Tetrach of Jerusalem 2016, and was banished 2025. Agrippa was made King by Caligula 2033. Agrippa his sonne by Claudius 2060. and died 2116. thirtie yeares after the destruction of the Temple. The Dynastie of the Herodians lasted 139. yeares. Thus Scaliger. He attributeth the nativity of Christ to the 3948. yeares of the world.

Here we must leave the Chronologers contending of the yeare of the world; in which this blessed Natiuitie happened; some adding many more yeares, some not allowing so many. It is certaine by the Scripture, that he was borne in the one and forty or two and fortie of Augustus, baptised in the fift of Tiberius, then beginning to be about thirtie yeares of age: in the thirtie three yeare he was crucified. In the seventh two as Baronius, and severie one yeare of Christ, as Boninus and Linsy account, Jerusalem was destroyed by Titus, in the second of Vespasian. Arias Montanus reckoneth this the yeare of the world 3989. and saith, that the Hebrewes reckon it the 3841. which must needs be false. The fault ariseth from the false computation of the Persian and Græcian Monarchies. Iosephus counteth from the time of Herod to the destruction of the Temple twenty eight high Priests, and a hundred and seven yeares. After Scaliger in his Can. Isag. l. 3. this yeare 1612. is the 1614. of Christ, of the world 5461. after the Jewish account of Hillel 5372. of the Armenians 1061. of the Julian Period 6325. of the Hegira 1021. Anno 4. Olymp. 597. The Dionysian account, which usually follow; was not generally received till after the time of Charles the great.

Abbi Mosche Mikkotzi, in a worke of his, set forth Anno 1236. in Buxdorsius citeth him, saith, That the Written Laws which God gave to Moses, and Moses to the Israelites, is obscure and hard, because it speaketh some things contradictory (which he speaketh to prove by some places mis-interpreted) and because it is imperfect, and containeth not all things meete to be knowne. For who shall teach vs (saith he) the notes of Birds and Beasts? (a Franciscan might answer him out of the Legend of S. Francis, the Patron of his Order) who shall teach them the propiety and nature of points, and accents of letters? Also, what fat might be eaten, what not? &c. Many joy of the heart (saith = Aben Bara) and refreshing of the bones; betwixt which and the written Law he can finde no difference, but being deliuered to them from their Elders. In one of their bookes, printed at Cremona 1556. is this sentence. Thinke not that the Lawe written is the foundation, but rather the Lawe Traditionall is the right foundation: and according to this Law did God make couenant with the Israe- lites; for God foresaw their captiuitie in time to come, and therefore left the people, among whom they should dwell, should write out and interpret the Law, as they did the other, God would not haue it written. And although in proesse of time this Law be now written, yet it is not explained by the Christians, because it is hard, and requi- reth a sharp wit. That which is spoken of the Law, is applied to commend their Tal- mud: If you can frustrate (saith the Lord) my Couenant with the day and the night, that is, according to their booke Tanchuma, when you will no longer learne and obseme the Talmud. And in the Talmud is thus recorded; To studie and read in the Bible is a vertue, and not a vertue, that is, a small vertue: but to learne their Misebna or Tal- mud-text is a vertue worthy reward; and to learne by heart Gemaram (the comple- ment of the Talmud) is a vertue so great that none can be greater. The Wise men (say they) are more excellent then the Prophets; and the wordes of the Scribes more loudly then those of the Prophets: and therefore the one forced to confirme them with miracles, the other simply to be beleueed, as is said Deut. 17. 10.

Hence it is that the Rabbins are more exercised in their Talmud, then in the Bible; as on which their faith is founded more then on the other: and according to this doe they expound the Scripture. And as their Talmud is most certaine, so also is that (what- soeuer) exposition of their Rabbins, according to the same. Thus saith Rabbi Isaac Abbubabb, whatsoeuer our Rabbins in their Sermons and mysticall explanations haue spoken, we are no lesse firmly to beleuee then the Law of Moses.

And if any thing therein seeme repugnant to our sense, we must impute it to the weaknesse of our conceit, and not to their wordes: as for example: it is written in the Talmud, that a Rabbins once preached, that the time would come, when a woman should every day be deliuered of her burthen; according to the saying, Ierem. 31. 7. Concepti statimque peperit. One not beleeuing this, a Rabbins answered, that he spake not of a common woman, but of a Henne, which should every day lay an egge.

Such are their expositions, I know not, whether fitter to be heard of Heraclitus, or Democritus, more lamentable or ridiculous; and yet is it there said, that their wordes are the wordes of the living God, whereof not one shall fall to the ground; and must not be derided eyther in word or thought, whether ye respect the persons, or works of their Rabbins. Therefore in a Dutch booke, printed in Hebrew characters at Cracow, 1597. it is written, that the Iewes are bound to say Amen, not only to their Prayers, but to all their Sermons and Expositions, according to the Prophet Esa. 1. Open the gates, the people cometh (schomer amunim) which keepeth righteousness, that is (say they) which saying Amen, beleueth all things which the wise Rabbins haue writien. And if any be so simple, that he cannot vnderstand, yet must he beleuee.

When two Rabbins (saith their Talmud) maintaine contrary opinions, yet must not men contradict them, because both of them hath his Kabala or Tradition for the same: and this is a rule in their Rabbins, Remember rather the word of the Scribes, than of the Law of Moses. R. Salomon Iarchi vpon Deuteronomie, chap. 17. verse 12. Thou shalt not decline from the words that they shall shew thee, to the right hand or the left, hath these wordes; And when he saith vnto thee, Of the right hand, that it is the left; and, Of the left hand, that it is the right, thou must beleuee it; how much more if he saith, The right hand is the right hand &c. They haue a storie in their Legend for the same, That there came a Goi, a Gentile to Sammai, and asked how manie Lawes they had, who answered two, a Written and a Verball. He replied, The written Law I acknowledge no lesse then thou; make me therefore a Iew, and teach me the other. Sammai refused; and he went to Hillel (these both liued a little before the time of Christ) who admitted and instructed him; after he bade him pronounce the letters in order, Aleph, Beth, Gimel, &c. which he did. The next day he bade him say the

the same letters backward, Gimel, Beth, Aleph. The Gentile said, Rabbi, yesterday you taught mee otherwise: and yet, said Hillel you beleue mee, and so learne of me; which you must no lesse doe in the Traditionall Lawe, beleueing all that is therein.

I had almost thought in reading of this Hillel, I had beene reading the life and precepts of Ignatius Leiola the Iesuite-founder (so like is the storie, though the names differ) who practised himselfe, and trained vp others. Ad sapientem hanc sanctamque sultitiam caeca, ut ipse appellabat, obedientiam, saith Massianus in a large Discourse hereof: Paulus Omnia probate was in those dayes; but prudentialium non obedientis, sed imperantis esse respondit Ignatius: negabat obedientis nomine dignum haberi oportere, qui legitimis superiori non cum voluntate iudicium quoque submitteret: in superiorum iussu examinando esse arrogantiam. And thus writeth Ignatius himselfe: Perit celebris illa Obedientia caeca simplicitas, cum apud nos ipsos in questionem vocamus recte ne precipiatur an secus: perit humilitas, perit in rebus arduis fortitudo, &c. To obey in outward execution and effecting the command of a Superiour, may proue no vertue of patience, but a cloake of malice, a very imperfect perfection, not worthy the name of vertue, vntill the inward affect be ioyned to the outward effect: neyther is this a whole sacrifice, except hee not onely will the same, but iudge, and be of the same sentence with his superiour: he must in the person of his superiour beholde Christ, who can neyther deceiue nor be deceiued; ready alway to defend, neuer to mislike his command; yea, whatsoeuer his superiour enioyneth he must accept as the precept and will of God, and as he is ready to beleue the Catholique faith, so to be carried without farther search, with a blinde force of the will, desirous to obey. Thus did Abraham when hee was commanded to offer Isaac; and therefore thus must the Iesuite do when an Ignatian Superiour commands, or else he is no Holocaust for the Leiolan Altar. Euen as a Carkasse, saith the Iesuiticall Constitution; which will bee drawne any way, or a Staffe in an olde mans hand plyant as hee pleaseth: so, and so must our waken Iesuities be; Asses without vnderstanding; nay, carkasses without life, staues and slaues and blockes, guided by their guides, though it bee to cracke the Crownes of Kings.

What Diuell of Hell could euer haue taught murderers and treasons to be tolerable, nay commendable, nay meritorious, if his Scholer should not first passe this Iesuiticall Retrograde, from a Christian and a man, with the losse of Religion and Reason, to become (as these Rome-Rabbins terme it) a carkasse indeede, or a staffe in the hand of that olde one, which (like the Egyptian Inchanters) he might make a Serpent at his pleasure? But let the truth preuaile, and Moses rod eate vp these Serpent-rodde of the Egyptians. And what more could olde Hillel say to his Disciples? Or doth God himselfe exact? Bernard throughout his seventh Epistle; teacheth more soundly of the Pope and those religious Superiours; Nec dico praepositorum mandata esse a subditis indicanda, ubi nihil iubere deprehenduntur diuinis contrarium institutis. Sed necessariam esse dico & prudentiam qua aduertatur, si quid aduersetur, & libertatem qua ingenuè contemnatur. Hanc ego nunquam amulor obedientiam: talem mihi nunquam libeat modestiam, vel potius molestiam imitari. Talis siquidem obedientia omni est contemptu deterior: talis quoque modestia ultra omnem modum extenditur. --- O patientia, omni digna impatientia! But to leaue this question and our Iesuities till fitter time; the Iewish Rabbins auerre, that whosoever mocketh or contemneth their sayings, shall be punished in hote and boyling Zoah, or excrement in hell. And thus much of their Talmud, the originall and authoritie thereof. More modest yet were those Fathers of Trent, that would ascribe but equalitie of reuerence and respect to their Traditions with the Scripture. (With equall affection and esteeme (say they) we receiue and reuerence Traditions and the bookes of the olde and new Testament: which must needs acknowledge themselves beholding to them; lest if they complaine they follow not their Traditionary Masters in making them sit lower: and they haue their Anathema as ready as the Rabbins their Zoah; and their Traditions, Canons, and Constitutions must interpret as well as their Kabala.

But before we leaue their Talmud (thus highly esteemed amongst them) I thought

This Iannai was Hircanus sonne of Simon 110. years before our Sauour, and therefore was another: or else this is a malicious deuise of the Talmudist, which confuteth it selfe with the foolish computation of time.

meete also to speake more largely both of that and of their learned Rabbins, out of Pe- trus Galatinus, Sixtus Senensis, Paulus Ricus, Rambam, and others that write thereof,

The Traditionall Law they call Tora scebeal pe, that is, the Law which is in the mouth, or deliuered by word of mouth. Rabbi Moses Aegyptius telleth the passages thereof thus; Ioshua receiuing it of Moses, deliuered it to Phineas the sonne of Eleazar the Priest: Phineas to Heli the Priest: he to Samuel the Prophet: Samuel to Dauid: he to Achias the Prophet, who deliuered the same to Elias, the teacher of Elisba; Elisba or Elisba to Ioiada the Priest: this Ioiada to Zacharias: Zacharias to Hosea, and he to Amos: Amos to Esay, of whom Micheas receiued it, and of him Isai: Nabum from him, and from him againe Habacuck, who taught it Sephanie the Instructor of Jeremie, of whom Baruch the Scribe learned it: Baruch taught it Ezra. Vntill this time the Jewes had none other but the written Scripture.

Now for their Scriptures; they call the same Arbaa Veesrim (that is, the foure and twentie) of the number of the bookes after their computation, all which they reduce to foure partes; The first of which they call Tora, the Lawe, or Humas the Pentateuch or fise bookes: and they call every booke after the first wordes in the beginning thereof. The second part hath foure bookes; Ioshua, Iudges, Samuel and Kings. The third part comprehendeth foure other, which they call the last Prophets; Esay, Ieremie, Ezekiel, and the booke of the twelue smaller Prophets. The fourth part is called Chetynim, and hath eleuen bookes, Paralipomenon or Chronicles, the Psalmes, the Prouerbes, Iob, Ruth, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, Canticles, Ester, Daniel, Ezra, which they make one with Nehemia. Ecclesiasticus, Iudith and Tobias, and the first booke of Maccabees they haue, but reckon not among the foure and twentie. The third and fourth bookes of Ezra I haue not seene in Hebrew; but some of them say, that they are lately found at Constantinople: but the second of Maccabees, and the booke of Philo (called the Wisedome of Salomon) I neuer saw but in Greeke, nor those additions to Daniel. But after the Babylonian captiuitie, Ezra writing out the Law, which had bene burned in the destruction of the City, other wise-men writ out the Exposition of the Law, lest, if another destruction should happen, the same might per- ish. And from that time, all the Wise-men, which are called the men of the Great Synagogue, in their teaching the Law, deliuered the same both in word and writing, vntill the Talmud was written. It was then (saith Picus) in seuentie bookes, after the number of the seuentie Elders.

These mens authoritie hath the next place to the Prophets. And are in this order mentioned in their Talmud. Ezra deliuered the same to Simon the Priest, called Iudas, who was honoured of Alexander. This Simon deliuered this explanation to Antigonus: Antigonus to Iosephus the sonne of Iohn, and to Iosephus the sonne of Iehazer: They to Nitans Arbuleusis, and Ioshua the sonne of Peratris, whose Auditor the Jewes falsely affirme that Iesus* our blessed Sauour was, which liued an hundred and tenne yeares after. Those two deliuered the same to Iuda the sonne of Tibeus, and Simon the sonne of Sata. These to Samaia and Abatation: and they to Hillel and Samaus. Hillel flourished an hundred yeares before the destruction of the second Temple, and had eighthe schollers or disciples, all of excellent wit and learning: thirty of them for their excellence, had the Diuinitie descending vpon them as Moses; and other thirtie obtained that the Sunne should stand still for them, as Ioshua: the rest were accounted meane. Of these, the greatest was Jonathan sonne of Vziel, the least Iohn the sonne of Zachaus, which yet knew the Scripture and Talmud, and all things else to the examples of Foxes, and Narrations of Diuels.

The diuision into Chapters was first by St Langton Archb. of Cant. for olde books, are after the Canon of Euseb. C. R. * The Talmud blameth He' Jews for too much severity to Ghezi, and R. Iosben Prabeia, for the like toward Iesus of Nazareth who had followed this his Master to Alexandria, being persecuted by King Iannai, who returning to Ierusalem, and commending his Anne, that his Scholler thinking he had spoken of his Hostesse, said, She had round eyes: What Varlet (saith he R.) hast thou such a thought? and presently commanded him to be proclaymed Anathema, with the sound of 400. This Iannai was Hircanus sonne of Simon 110. years before our Sauour, and therefore was another: or else this is a malicious deuise of the Talmudist, which confuteth it selfe with the foolish computation of time.

Hillel and Samau deliuered this explanation to this John, and to Simion the Iust, sonne of the said Hillel, who after receiued Christ in his armes, and prophesied of him in the Temple. Rabbi Moses proceedeth, and saith, that Simion taught Gama-liel, Pauls Master; and Gama-liel instructed his sonne Rabban Simion, who was slaine of Hadrian the Emperour, after hee had taught his sonne Iudas, whom the Iewes for his Learning and Holinesse call Rabbenu Hatcadot, (that is, our holy Master) of which honourable name there had beene another in the time of the Roman Consuls. This Simion and his father Gama-liel were two of those seuen, to which the title of Rabban is by the Iewes ascribed, in the posteritie of Hillel: which is the highest name of honour amongst them, and giuen to none before them, but Simion the sonne of Hillel, and father of Gama-liel, which in likelihood was hee, whose name dimittis is neuer like to be dismissed out of the Christian holies. It is a more glorious title then Rab or Rabbi: and this later also more excellent then Rab the former. But all of them Ruxdorfius thinks, are not ancients then the times of Christ: nor were any of the elder Prophets so entituled; But Rabbi in Israel, and Rab and Mar in Babylon, began to be Doctoral titles about that time: of which creation by imposition of hands is spoken before. These for the most part, besides almost infinite others of their hearers, haue left many things written of the explanation of the Law; of which the Talmud was compacted. Of the vnreasonable absurdities and impious blasphemies of the Talmud, howsoever abhorrible in themselves; yet let it not bee irksome to the Reader to see some mentioned, therein to obserue the depth of diuine vengeance, which in this blinded Nation we may heare and feare. For who would thinke it possible that any could entertaine in his heart, that which there they haue written of God? as, that "before the creation of this world to keepe himselfe from idleness hee made and married many other worlds: that he spends three houres every day in reading the Iewish law; that Moses one day ascending to heauen found him writing accents therein: that God euery day maketh deuout prayers: that God hath a place a-part wherein he afflicteth himselfe with weeping, for bringing so much euill on the Iewes: that euery day he putteth on their Tephilin and Zizis, and so falleth downe and prayeth: that as oft as he remembereth their miseries, hee lets fall two teares into the Ocean, and knocks his breast with both his hands: that the last three houres of the day he recreated himselfe in playing with the Fish Leuiathan; which once in his anger he slew and poudred for the feast, whereof you shall after heare: that hee created the Element of fire on the Sabbath day: that the R.R. one day reasoning against R. Elizer, because God with a voice from heauen interposed his sentence for Elizer, the other R.R. anathematized God, who thereat smiling, said, My children haue ouer-estimated me: But I am wearie to adde the rest of their restless impieties against the Almighty. Neither haue the Creatures escaped them: Thus the Talmud telleth, That God once whipped Gabriel for a great fault with a whip of fire: that as Adam, before Eue was made, had carnally vsed both Males and Females of other Creatures; so the Rauen which Noe sent out of the Arke was iealous of Noah lest he should lie with his Mate: that Iobs storie was fained: that Dauid sinned not in his murther and adulterie, and they which thinke he did sinne, are Heretikes: that vnnatural copulation with a mans wife is lawfull; that hee is unworthy the name of a Rabbine which hateth not his enemy to death: that God commanded them by any manner of meane to spoile the Christians of their goods, and to vse them as beasts: yea, they may kill them, and burne their Gospels; which they entitle, Iniquitie reuealed. Iniquitie reuealed indeede is the declaration of these things: as of their opinion of the soule; if it sinne in one body it passeth into a second; if there also, into a third; if it continue sinning, it is cast into Hell: the soule of Abel passed into Seth, and the same after into Moses: the soules of the vnlearned shall neuer recouer their bodies. Two R.R. euery weeke on Friday created two Calues, and then ate them. Nothing ought to be eaten by euen numbers, but by vneuen, wherewith God is pleased. Perhaps they had read in Virgil, Numero Deus impare gaudet; but this is common to all Magicians. And what doe I wearie you and my selfe, anticipating the following discourse; wherein we shall haue further occasion to relate the like absurdities? which yet if any denie, they say he denyeth God.

OF THE ANCIENT JEWISH AVTHORS, AND THEIR KABALISTS.

OF the Authentike Authors of the Jewes before Christs time, Galatinus further addeth the threescore and twelue Interpreters, who are said by Ptolemies direction to be separated in threescore and twelue Cels, or seuerall Roomes; and each interpreting by himselfe, did all agree in wordes, order, and time of their translation, exactly. But howsoeuer Iosephus, writing in Greeke, boasteth of this translation, yet the Jewes (I know not whether of enuie at the effect thereof among the Christians) keepe the eight day of Tubeth fasting, for griefe of that Greeke translation. Iesus Sirach mentioneth his Grand-father and other writers. And an hundred and fixtie yeares before Christ flourished; Aristobolus, a Jew, and Peripatetike Philosopher: who by Ptolemies Philometers perswasion writ Commentaries on Moses, and spake many things of the Messias: as did also Rabbi Iodan, and R. Ibbas not long after: and after them, R. Simeon Ben Iohai. After these, Rabbinus Haccados writ a booke called Galaxias; that is, the revealer of secrets, very diuinely vttering many things of Christ. The like did Rabbi Nabumias sonne of Haccana, both expounding the Prophets, and affirming that the Messias was to come within fiftie yeares, and writ an Epistle thereof to his sonne, of whom he hoped that hee should liue to see him. About the same time (two and fortie yeares before Christ) Ionathas the sonne of Uziel, and Scholet (as I said) of Hillel, translated all the old Testament into Chaldee, and expounded the same so, that it might seeme rather a Glosse and exposition, then interpretation. This the Hebrewes call Targum, that is, the Translation, which hath with them no lesse credit then the Text it selfe, and hereby expound all hard places of the Text. They tell therefore, that at that time wherein he laboured this worke, if a flie or such creature did flie ouer him or his paper, presently, without any harme to the paper, it was consumed with fire from Heauen. And although his translation of the Pentateuch be most rare, yet I once saw it: for that which is most common was the worke of Ankelos a Profelyte, whom the Hebrewes affirme to be the sonne of Titus the Emperour, who also turned all the Bible into Chaldee, and is of no lesse reputation with the Jewes, then the former, and is also called Targum.

After the Times of Christ, Philo and Iosephus are famous: and after the Resurrection of Christ, the Jewes were of three sorts; some true beleeuers, others absolute deniers, the third would haue the Christian Religion and the Jewish Ceremonies to be conioyned in equall obseruation, against which third sort the first Councell, Act. 15. was summoned.

The moderne Jewes insist principally on the literall sense of Scripture; the Elder sought out a spirituall and mysticall sense, accounting this a great matter, the littell but small, like to a candle of small value<sup>a</sup>, with the light whereof, the other (as a pearle hidden in a darke roome) is found. The Talmudists followed the allegoricall sense; the Cabalists, the Anagogicall.

As concerning this Cabala, in old times<sup>b</sup> they communicated not that skill to any, but to such as were aged and learned; and therefore nothing thereof, or very little, is found written of the Ancient: except of Rabbi Simeon Ben Iohai. But the Doctores of the later Jewes, lest that learning should perish, haue left somewhat thereof in writing, but so obscurely, that few know it, and they which doe, account it a great secret, and hold it in great regard. So saith Elias: in the bookes of the Kabala are contayned the secrets of the Law and the Prophets, which man receiued from the mouth of man, vnto our Master Moses (on him be peace) and therefore it is so called, and is diuided into two parts, Speculative and Practike. But I am not worthie to explaine this businesse, and by reason of my sinnes haue not learned this wisdome nor knowne this knowledge of those Saints. The word Cabala signifieth a receiuing, and in that respect from whom it passed to Enoch, Noe, Sem, Heber, Abraham, &c. if you beleeueth the Cabalists, Leon. Heb. Dial. 3.

may be supplied to all their Traditionall receipts; but in vse (which is the Law of speech) it is appropriated to that facultie, which (as Ricinus describeth it) by the type of the Mosaicall law insinuateth the secrets of diuine and humane things: and because it is not grounded on reason, nor deliuered by writing, by the faith of the hearer received, it is called Cabala. Or (if you had rather haue it in Reuchlin's wordes) it is a Symbolicall receiuing of diuine Reuelation deliuered, to the holsoine contemplation of God; and of the separated formes; and they which receiue it are called Cabalici, their Disciples Cabalizi, and they which any way imitate them, Cabalists. The Talmudists therefore and the Cabalists are of two faculties, both agreeing in this, that they grow from Tradition whereunto they glue credit without rendering any reason: herein differing, that the Cabalist as a super subtile transcendent mounteth with all his industrie and intention from this sensible World vnto that other intellectuall: but the grosser Talmudist abideth in this, and if at any time hee considereth of God or the blessed Spirits, yet it is with relation to his workes and their functions, not in any abstract contemplation, bending his whole studie to the explanation of the Law according to the intent of the Law-giuer, considering what is to be done, what eschewed; whereas the Cabalists most indouoreth himselfe to contemplation, leauing the care of publike and private affaires to the Talmudists, and reseruing only to themselves those things which pertaine to the tranquillitie of the minde. As therefore the minde is more excellent then the body, so you must thinke the Cabalist superior to the Talmudist. For example, In the beginning God created Heauen and Earth, saith Moses: Heauen here after the Talmudist is all that part of the World which is about the Moone, and all beneath it, Earth: also by Heauen hee vnderstandeth forme; and by Earth matter; the composition whereof he effected not by labour of the hand, but by that ninefold Oracle of his word: for so often is it mentioned, and God said; likewise he findeth the foure Elements in those wordes, darkenesse, spirit, waters, drye land. But the Cabalist frameth to himselfe two Worlds, the Visible and Invisible; Sensible and Mentall, Materiall and Ideall, Superior and inferior: and accordingly gathereth out of the former wordes, God created Heauen and Earth, That he made the highest and lowest things, meaning by the highest the immateriall, by the lowest this materiall; and this is gathered out of the first letter, Beth, which in numbering signifieth two, and insinuateth there these two Worlds. Yea they also finde two Paradises, and two Hells, one in this world, and the other in the other and future, for the body here, and the soule hereafter. Euent as, saith R. Saadia, the white of the Egge comprehendeth the yolke, so that first intelligible world insoldeth the second: in this are nine Spheres, moued of the immouable Empyrean, in that nine Orders of Angels, (Ricinus reckoneth ten, Haias, Hakadesch, Ophanim, Erelim, Hasmalum, Seraphim, Malachim, Elohim, bene Elohim, Cherubim. Some Diuinitie count them thus out of Dionysius; Seraphim, Cherubim, Throni, Dominaciones, Virtutes, Potestates, Principatus, Archangeli, Angeli: The tenth Order the Peripatetikes terme Anamastica, the Cabalists Ischim, that is, Men), moued of the vchangeable God, who in vmproueable silence first created altogether, and after by nine times speaking moued and promoted each thing to its own distinction. The Talmudists dreame of an earthly Messias to free them from this their slauerie: the Cabalists (if our Cabalists haue not scene these things through spectacles) expect a spirituall deliuerie from signe. Doubtlesse they deliuer many excellent assertions, howsoeuer their collection seemeth curious and vncertayne, gathering the same on grounds without ground, beyond all Sense, Reason, Scripture, and therefore often leauened with other superfine absurdities. And better may it serue to conuince the Iewes with testimonies of their owne, then for an instruction to vs, who can not enforce arguments out of Symbolicall senses. If any bee in loue with these mysteries, let him resort to Panlus Ricinus, his Theoremes to Iohn Reuchlin, to Iohannes Picus and his Commentes Archangelus, to Abrahams supposed Booke of the creation, to R. Ioseph Castilianensis his Porta lucis, which Ricinus hath also translated and epitomised, to Galatinus and others. Commendable is the labour of some of these, and of many others both conuerted Jewes, which haue sought to reclaim their peruerse brethren, and of our owne

And this will be further manifested in the rest of this Booke, where their superstitious deuotion is related.

As for those testimonies of the Iewes against themselves, besides the Scriptures (which (in regard of the true sense) the veils over their hearts, will not suffer them to reade, but it is a sealed Booke vnto them, and they haue left the riches thereof vnto vs, as the Aramites left their Tents, with their horses and treasure, to the pined Israelites). Their other Authors are so plaine and plentifull in the mysteries of our Religion, as I know not whether it cause greater pleasure to reade their writings, or astonishment and wonder at the Nation; so stricken with madnesse, and with blindnesse, and with astonishment of heart, since they haue shut their eyes against the Sunne of right conscience, on whom that threatned plague is come, <sup>h</sup> Thou shalt groape at Noone-daies, at the blinde doth groape in darknesse. For out of their Talmud-Authors is plainly deliuered the myserie of the Trinitie, the Incarnation of the Sonne of God, his two Natures, his Birth of a Virgin, his Spirituall Kingdome, the time of his Comming, the truth of his Prophecies, and power of his Miracles; the Redemption of mankind by his Death,

Death, his Crucifying, Descent, Resurrection and Ascension: and that their Nation was to be reiected, the Old Law to cease, New to succeed, &c. All which as they agree vnto that sweet and blessed Name, and Person of Iesus (which name, and that of Emanuel, is also found in their writings) so do they argue the severitie of Gods Iudgements, when men will not beleue the Truth, that by the efficacie of errors, they shall haue eyes and see not, eares and heare not (neither ours nor their owne) as Paul, and Christ himselfe often told them. But those particulars, as rather appertaining to disputation, then Historie, (and therefore too much impertinent to our purpose) the diligent Readers may at large finde in Morney and Galatinus, not to mention others.

The witness of Iosephus, being one, whose name we often vse in this Historie, may iustly challenge me, if I should omit him, especially seeing he liued in the very daies of the Apostles, who, as he witnesseth of Iohn Baptist, and of many other things mentioned in the Gospell, fully agreeing therewith: so concerning our Lord and Saviour, hath this testimony.

In the time of Tiberius, there was one Iesus, a wise Man (if at least wise he was to be called a man) who was a worker of great Miracles, and a Teacher of such as loue the Truth; and had many followers, as well of Iewes as of Gentiles. This was Christ. Neuertheless being accused vnto Pilate, by the Chiefe of the Iewes, he was crucified. But yet for all that, those which had loued Him from the beginning, ceased not to continue still. For he shewed himselfe aliue vnto them three daies after his Death, as the Prophets had foretold of him, both this and diuers other things. And euen vnto this day doe those continue still, which after his name are called Christians. Thus much Iosephus. Thus did the Truth force him to confesse, whose Historie of the destruction of his Nation, what is it but as a Commentarie on Iesus Prophecies therof, and their fearful imprecation, His blood be vpon vs and our children, shewing that the wrath of God was come vpon them to the vtmost?

From Mount Oliuet, where Iesus was first apprehended, and where last those blessed feet touched the earth, (as if there Mercie had left a print of Iustice) was Ierusalem besieged, and at their Feast of Pasche, (when they had crucified Christ) they were cooped vp, as it were, assembled by Diuine Iustice from all quarters to destruction, together with that their Citie, where they had slaine the Lord. But of this before. It will not be vnauourie to the Reader, obseruing herein Diuine vengeance, to relate as vnauourie a tale as euer was deuilled, which their Talmud telleth in derogation of Christs Miracles, in which I know not whether to call them Beasts or Diuels, so wilde; and withall so wicked is their blasphemie. Forsooth in Salomons Temple there was a (say they) a certaine stone of very rare vertue, wherein Salomon, by his singular wisdom, had ingrauen the very true name of God, which it was lawfull for every man to reade, but not to come by heart, nor to write out. And at the Temple doore were two Lions tied at two chaines, which rored terribly, that the feare thereof made him to forget the name that he committed the same to memorie, and him to burst asunder in the midst, that had put it in writing. But Iesus, the Sonne of Marie, say they, regarding neither the Curse annexed to the Prohibition, nor the roaring of the Lions, writ out in a Bill, and went his way with it ioyfully. And lest he might be taken with the thing about him, he had a little opened the skinn of his legge, and put it in there, and afterwards wrought his miracles by the vertue of that name; I should be almost as absurd as they, if I should dispute against it, seeing in this, and most of their braine-sicke dreames, the very recitation is sufficient refutation.

It cannot be denied that there haue beene many Rabbines very learned, as R. Moses Agrippinus, Abben Tibbon. But he which will haue notice of the RR. and their workes, let him reade Buxdorsius and his Bibliotheca Rabbinica, printed this last Mart: yet euen the best of them haue much chaffe, which needs much fanning from the corne. Many wise sentences and proverbs haue beene by Drusius and others gathered out of some of their workes, which would, as Jewels, haue beautified this Discourse; as these for a while. Vowes are the hedge or wall of defence to holinesse; Tithes are the same to riches: he which encreaseth his flesh, encreaseth wormes. Who is wife? he which lea-

OF THE SCRIPTVRES AND THEIR INTERPRETATIONS.

BEfore we shake hands with the learned Writers of the Iewes, it is not vnmeet, in my opinion, heere to meet with some question which some haue moued, concerning them and their dealing in and with the Scriptures. For since that the Councell of Trent hath decreed, in the yeare 1546. both the diuine authoritie of Scriptures Canonically, to the Apocrypha-bookes, which the Iewes receiue not, nor euer did; and hath made the vulgar Translation <sup>f</sup> Authentically in publike Lectures, Disputations, Preachings and Expositions, that none, vnder any pretence whatsoeuer, shall presume to reiect it: it is wonder to see how eagerly (that I say not impudently) diuers of them haue sought to slander the originall Text, and haue blamed, as Authors thereof, in the New Testament, Heretikes, and in the Old, Iewes; couering their malice to vs with pretence of the malice of Heretikes and Iewes, and forgetting the true Rule, That it is a shame to belie the Diuine. Thus haue Canus and Pintus, and Gregorius de Valentia, Sacroboscus, and others, traduced the Iewes in this behalfe; themselves refused by their owne (which yet by consequent ouerthrow that former Decree) Sixtus Senensis, Ribera, Cardinall Bellarmino himselfe, Andradus, Andreas Masius, Arius Montanus, Isaac Leuita, &c. Besides, of ours many, and especially our owne learned Countrymen, Whitaker, Reynolds, Morton, &c.

<sup>h</sup> Bellarmino hath both taught vs the vanitie of their opinion, that hold, That the Scriptures were all lost in the Babylonian Captiuitie, and were by Ezra renewed miraculously (who is rather <sup>i</sup> commended for his industrie in interpreting and ordering them, and for ordering and compacting them in one Volume, then for such needlesse reuelation, to finde that which was neuer lost: an Author rather, as <sup>k</sup> Hierome hath obserued, of the present Hebrew Letters, then of their ancient Scriptures, and hath so proued the absurditie of their conceit, that imagine the Hebrew Fountaines corrupted. First, by <sup>l</sup> the Argument of Origen and Hierome, That such corruption must haue bene either before or after Christ: if that; Christ would haue reproued and not commended their Scriptures to their searce: if this; how cometh it, that the testimonies, cited by him and his Apostles, are found now in Moses and the Prophets, as they were then cited? Secondly, out of Augustine, That it is not likely they would put out both their eyes (in depriving their Scriptures of truth) that they might put out one of ours: nor was it possible that such a generall conspiracie could be made. Thirdly, from their more then reuerent estimation of their Scriptures, for which they would die, if it were possible, an hundred deaths, and euen still (as Isaac answereth B. Lindan his Scholler) they proclaime a Fast to expiate, if by some accident that Booke but falls to the ground. Fourthly, some places in the Hebrew are more strong against the Iewes then our Translations are, and the Prophecies, which make most against them, remaine there vncorrupted. And lastly, the prouidence of God would neuer herein faile his Church, but hath left them, with their bookes, to be dispersed through the world, to beare witnesse to that Truth which they hate and persecute.

These are Bellarmines Arguments; which, because they are the Truth, are also ours: and therefore we haue bene bold with the Reader to insert them. As for that Emendation or Correction of the Scribes, which Galatinus mentioneth, wherein they haue corrupted the Text, he proueth it to be a late dreame of the Talmud, and answereth the Arguments of his fellowes, herein not so Catholike as himselfe.

Now although this may seeme more then enough to conuince that folly, yet it shall not bee impertinent to adde out of Arius Montanus somewhat touching the same, because it openeth another myserie touching the Hebrew Learning, and the Masoreth. <sup>m</sup> When the Iewes (saith he) returned into their Countrey after the Cap-

thirte threescore and ten yeares in Babylon, it befell them partly by occasion of their long troubles, which did distract their mindes, partly by corruption of their Native Tongue, which was growne out of kinde, first into the Chaldee, and afterward into the Syriake, that they neither knew nor pronounced so well the words of the Scripture, written (as the manner was) without vowels. Whereby it came to passe, that in the writing of them there crept in some fault, either through iniurie of the Times, or by reason of troubles which fell vpon the People, or by negligence of some Scribeuers. But this inconuenience was met withall afterward by most learned men, such as Esdra was, and afterward Jamaliel, Ioseus, Elezar, and other of great name, who prouided by common trauell, with great care and industrie, that the Text of Scripture, and the true reading thereof, should be preserued most sound and vncorrupt. And from these men, or from their instruction, being receiued and polished by their Schollers in the Ages following, there came, as wee iudge, that most profitable Treasure, which is called Masoroth; that is to say, a Deliuerie, or Traditionall, because it doth deliuer abundantly and faithfully all the diuers Readings that euer were of the Hebrew Bibles. Wherein there appeareth an euident token of the prouidence of God, for the preseruatiō of the sacred Bookes of Scripture whole and sound, that the Masoroth hath bene kept till our times these many hundred yeares, with such care and diligence, that in sundrie Copies of it, which haue bene written, no difference was euer found: And it hath bene added in all the written Bibles that are in Europe, Africke, or Asia, each of them agreeing thoroughly therein with other, euen as it is printed in the Venice Bibles, to the great wonder of them, who read it. Thus saith Montanus: and by this Masoroth, their obiection of Caarl, and Caurn, in the two and twentieth Psalme, is answered, in that certaine readings haue the later and truer, as the Masoroth testifieth. Martinus affirmeth, That these Masorites inuented the prickes where-with the Hebrew is now read, to supply the lacke of vowels, herein vsing religious care, lest by inuventing new Letters to that purpose, they should haue changed that ancient forme of writing, and somewhat impaired the maiestie thereof. They tell, that when a certaine Rabbine had read Zacar for Zécer, he was slaine of his Scholler Ioab, for violating Scripture.

• Genebrard denying their opinion, that make Esdras or Esdra Author of these Hebrew prickes and accents, saith, That they were inuented after the times of Honorius the Emperour, in the yeare, after the Temple was destroyed, 436. which is (saith he) from Christ, 476. in Tyberias, a Citie of Galilee; the chiefe Authors were Aaron, Aferius, and Iames, sonne of Nephthali, whose dissenting one from another caused a diuision among the Iewes, the Westerne Iewes following the former, the Easterne, which dwelt in Babylon, the latter.

The Syriake Tongue some hold to haue sprung from the corruption of the Chaldee and Hebrew mixt. The Editions and Translations of the Scriptures, out of the Hebrew into the Greeke, are reckoned nine, besides that which Clement Alexandrinus, saith, was before the time of Alexander, whereof Plato and the Philosophers borrowed not a little. The first (alreadie mentioned) of the Seuentie. The second of Aquila, first a Gentile, after a Christian, and now last a Iew, in the time of Adriach. The third of Theodotion, a Marcionist, vnder Commodus. The fourth of Symmachus, first a Samaritan, and after that a Iew. Of the fift and sixt are not knowne the Authors. Of all these Origen compounded his Hexapla. The seuenth was the correction rather then a translation. The eight was of Lucian, Priest and Martyr. The ninth of Hesychius. But the most famous and ancient, which the Spirit of God hath by often allegations, in some measure, confirmed, is that of the Seuentie.

As for that conceit of the Celles, which Iustine saith, were threescore and ten, in which they were diuided, and which Epiphanius placeth by couples, and numbred fift and thirtie Celles, in which, by miracle, these thus diuided did all agree, in words and sense. Hierome derideth the same as a Fable, because neither Aristeus, which then liued, nor Iosephus, doe euer mention it. Now whereas Iosephus mentioneth only the Law translated by them; Iustinus, Irenaeus, Clement, Eusebius, write, That they translated all: And although Aristeus name but the Law, yet who knoweth nor, that by

9. I beleene that the same Law is neuer to be changed, nor any other to be giuen vs of GOD.

10. I beleene that he knoweth and understandeth all the workes and thoughts of men, as it is written in the Prophet, He hath fashioned their hearts together considering all their workes. Psal. 33. 15.

11. I beleene that GOD will recompence to all men their workes: to all, I say, which keepe his Commandements, and will punish all transgressors whomsoever.

12. I beleue that the MESSIAS is yet to come, and although he do long defer his coming, yet will I hope, that he will come, waiting for him every day, till he doth come.

13. I beleue with a perfect faith, that there shall be an awaking of the dead, at that time which shall seeme fit to GOD the Creator: the name of which GOD the Creator be much blessed and celebrated for ever-more. AMEN.

Genebrard out of the Spanish Breuitarie hath annexed this their Creed-prayer. O God and King which sitteth on the Throne of Mercies, forgiveest iniquities, &c. O God which hast taught vs the thirteene Articles of the Faith, remember this day the covenant of thy thirteene Properties, as thou revealedst them to Moses in thy Law. 1. Lord, Lord. 2. Strong. 3. Mercifull. 4. Gracious. 5. Long-suffering. 6. And of great goodness. 7. And Truth. 8. Which keepest mercie for thousands. 9. Which takest away iniquitie. 10. Transgressions. 11. And sins. 12. Which absolveth nor. 13. But renderest the iniquitie of the fathers vpon the children to the third and fourth Generation: then follow those thirteene Articles in forme of an Hymne, with the exposition of R. Moses: which also you may reade in the Treatise of Philip Ferdinand a Polonian Christned Jew. And he wich thus beleueth, saith Ferdinand, is a Jew, and as a brother to be loued; and though he commit all the sins of the world, howsoeuer he shall be punished for his sinne yet shall he haue part in the Kingdome of heauen, though he be reckoned among the sinners of Israell. But he which shall ouerturne one of these Precepts shall be blotted out of the number of the Saints, and be reckoned an Heretike, Apostata, Epicure, worthe to be hated of all.

This is the Jewish Faith, in which with much vexation, doubting, and lamentation; they die, vpon which, their Religion hath bin alway founded: but it was first put in writing, and brought into this order by R. Mosche bar Maimon, a who died in the yeare after their reckoning 4964. An. Dom. 1104. and strait charge was giuen, That the Jewes theretofore for ever confessing it in this order, should according to the same, liue and die. This their Creed, howsoeuer Charity may construe much of it, a better sense, yet according to their vnderstanding doth principally aime at the subuersion of Christi-an Religion; as appeareth in a more strait examination, after their sense of the 2, 3, 4 and 5, the 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12. Articles: all which make against the person or the office of the Son of God, as they vnderstand them; denying his Godhead, and disannulling his office, affirming, as a Jew shamed not to professe and vtter vnto M. Buxatorius, That it needed not that any should satisfie for the, for euery Fox must yeeld his owne skin and haire to the slayer. And the Jewish Faith, saith R. Iosiph Albu, is founded vpon three foundations: vpon the vniety of the diuine Essence; vpon the Law of Moses, and vpon the eternal reward of good works, and punishment of euill, concerning the Passion of Christ; by whose stripes we are healed, and on whom God hath laid the iniquities of vs all. his written also in their Talmud, that all the Israelites haue their portion in the world to come, not al alike, but he shal haue a greater part that hath done more good works; and the wicked and impenitent shall be punished twelue months in Hell or Purgatorie after which time they also (and some sooner, if they haue bin lesse sinners) shall haue their part, but a lesse then the former: but to them which deny God (which become Christians) their fore-skin groweth againe, and as vncircumcised eternally are punished in Hell. And the son of a deceased Jew is bound to say, for the space of one yeare, a prayer called Kiddisch, thereby to redeeme him from Purgatorie: in which respect the father dieth with ioy. A good woman may do the like for her husband. But R. Beckai (who excludeth all other Nations from their part in the Resurrection, preferring the Jewes in a foure-fold priuiledge, viz. the Land of Canaan, the Law, the Prophetes, and the Resurrection) reciteth out of the great Talmud, That three sorts of men shall rise againe at the day of Iudgement: one, of the best Israelites; a second sort of the wicked and worst; the third of a meane, who haue done as much good as euill. The good shall presently go into life eternall; the wicked shall be cast into Hell, as in the twelfth of Daniel, and shall be for euer in torment of bodie and soule. The third and meane sort of

Cor. 3. and such like places by our Purgatory-Spirits. R. Dauid Kimchi vpon the first Psalme, and Es. 26. commenteth, That the wicked shall not rise, but in the day of death their soule shall die together with their bodie, And Aben Ezra in his Exposition of Dan. 12. writeth out of R. Higgaon, That many shall rise, and many not rise, but suffer euerlasting reproch, and expoundeth it thus, that the good Iewes which die in exile, shall rise againe when the Messias shall come, and shall liue as long as the Patriarkes before the Flood: and then they shall make merrie with the great Fish Leuiathan, and the great Bird Ziz, and the great Oxe Behemos<sup>h</sup>, of which we shall speake after. When this is done, they shall die, and at the last day shal be raised vp againe, and shall possesse eternall life, where shall be no eating nor drinking, but glory, &c. Isaeb desired to be buried in Canaan, not in Egypt, for three causes (saith R. Salomon Iarchi) because he foresaw, That of the King of Egypt shall be made Lice: Secondly, because the Israelites which die out of Canaan shall not rise againe without much paine of their rolling thorow the deepe and hidden vaults of the earth: Thirdly, lest the Egyptians should make an Idoll of him. For the better vnderstanding hereof, let vs heare what is said out of the booke Tanchum (an Exposition of the Pentateuch) concerning this subiect. The Patriarkes (saith he) desired to be buried in Canaan, because they which are there buried shall first rise in the time of the Messias, And R. Hananiah saith, That they which die out of Canaan, must endure two deaths: and the same appeareth, Ier. 20. where it is said, Labour should ye into Babel, and should there die, and there be buried. What (quoth R. Simon) shall chaunge all the Iust perishe, which die out of Canaan? No, but God will make them Mecheib, that is, deepe Clifts and Caues vnder the Earth, by which they may passe into the Land of Promise; whither when they are come, God shal inspire into them the breath of life, that they may rise againe, as it is written<sup>1</sup>, I will open your Graves, and cause you to come out of your Sepulchres, &c. The like is written in their Targum, or Chaldean interpretation of the Canticles: When the dead shall rise, Mount Oliuet shall cleaue asunder, and the Israelites which haue bene dead shall come out of the same, and they which haue died in strange Lands, comming thither by holes vnder the earth, shal come forth. And for this cause I my selfe (saith our Author) haue heard the Iewes say, That sometime some of the wealthiest and deuoutest amongst them go into the Land of Canaan, that their bodies may there sleepe, and so be freed from this miserable passage vnder many deep Seas and rough Mountains. There be three sorts of men, saith Salman, ensis in the booke Iuchasin, which see not the face of Hell; those which are extremely poore, those which are in debt, those which are troubled with the collicke (the Hidazi chastised themselves ten or twentie daies before their death with this paine of the bowels, that so they might cleanse all, and go pure to the other world) some adde in this exemption from hell, or comming to iudgement, him which had an euill wife, and some also Magistrates. But in Pauls time, they themselves did allow (saith he) a resurrection of the dead, both of the iust and vniust. They did then hold also a μετάνοιαν, in which sense it is likely, the Iewes thought Christ to be Elias, or Ieremie, or one of the Prophets: and the Disciples somewhat sowed with this leuen, asked of the blind man, whether he had sinned, vnderstanding, as it seemeth, according to the Iewish error, when his soule had bin in some former body. And the Cabalistical Authors, saith Eliu Leuita, are of opinion that euery soule is three times created, they meane, it rolleth or passeth thorow three mens bodies, according to that of Iob, God worketh all these things with a man thrice. So the soule of the first man (saith he) rolled it selfe into the bodie of Dauid, and shall thence returne into the bodie of the Messias. So they say that the soules of sinners passe into the bodies of beastes; as if a man committeth Sodomie, his soule passeth into a Hare, because that creature is sometimes Male, sometimes

Now to come from their Faith to their workes: The wise Rabbines perswade the silly people, That they are the only elect people of God, who easily can keepe; not the Decalogue, or ten Commandements alone, but the whole Law of Moses. They divide the whole Law into six hundred and thirteene Commandements, and them againe into Precepts and Prohibitions: Of the commanding Precepts they number two hundred fortie and eight; iust so many as, (according to the Rabbines Anatomie) a man hath members in his bodie. Of the prohibiting Commandements, they reckon three hundred, threescore and siue, as many as are dayes in the year, or (as in the booke Brandspiegel) veines in a mans bodie. Therefore if every member of a man doe every day performe one of the Precepts, and omit one of the things prohibited, the whole Law of Moses shall be every year, and so for euer, fulfilled. Their wise Rabbines say further, That the men only are to obserue those six hundred and thirteene Commandements, the women are only subiect to the Prohibitions; yea, of those prohibitorie Mandates, onely to threescore and foure are they obliged by some, and to six and thirtie of the former; and this because of their other household businesse, and subiection to their imperious husbands. Some of their deeply-wise Rabbines adde to those six hundred and thirteene, seuen other Commandements, making vp the number of six hundred and twentie; iust so many as are * letters in the Decalogue, and as arise of the word Keter, signifying a Crowne: for were it not for the Law, God would not haue created the World; and for the obseruation thereof it yet subsisteth. And they which keepe all the Commandements, do set a Crowne on the head of God, and he vpon the head of those which crowne him, shall set seuen Crownes, and make them to inherite seuen Chambers in Paradise, and will keepe them from the seuen infernall Dungeons, because they haue obtained the seuen Heauens, and the seuen Earthes.

Their Wise-men affirme, That every veine of the bodie of a man doth prouoke him to omit that which is forbidden, and hee which doth omit such their vaine veine-warning, hath no good veine in him: euery of his members also doe prouoke him to performe those iustorie inuentions. But as vaine should I be as they, if I should not make some end, where they can finde none. We would now from these generalities proceed to the particulars of their Superstitions, tracing them herein from their birth to their graues, Religion being, in the pretence of their Law, the square of all their (otherwise ciuill) actions; at least to speake of their Superstitions in the same. But first, seeing Sebastian Munster hath written a whole booke, both in Hebrew and Latine, of those six hundred and thirteene Precepts, taken out of Moses, with the Expositions of their Rabbines, as also P. Riccius hath done, and Philo Ferdinand likewise out of Ben Kattani, I thought good to cull out some, which seeme most remarkable and strange, to entertaine our Reader; out of him, and Riccius,

OVT OF THE NEGATIVE PRECEPTS EX-

POVND BY THE 7 RABBINES.

1. Thou shalt haue no strange Gods in my sight. Exod. 20. The name of God is forbidden to be communicated to any creature.
2. Thou shalt not violate * mine holy name. Thou shalt not destroy a Synagogue or Temple be it neuer so old, nor shall blot out one of the holy names, wheresoeuer thou findest it written. The Rabbines say, If any doe against an Affirmatiue Precept, and repent, his sinne is forgiven him: but hee which transgresseth a Negative Precept, is not cleansed by repentance, but it remaineth to the day of Expiation (which is the day of their solemne Fast and Reconciliation.) But he which committeth a sinne, whereby he deferreth Death, or Excommunication, is not then purged, but must abide thereunto the diuine chastisements: and he which violateth the name of God, cannot be absolved from that sinne but by death.

5. Thou shalt not * hate thy brother in thy heart. He which is wronged by another, should not hate him, and hold his peace, but reprove him openly; and if hee repent, he ought not to be cruell to him: But if any be often reprov'd, and will not amend, it is lawfull to hate him. This Christ<sup>f</sup> confuteth.

19. No<sup>t</sup> Idol<sup>u</sup> to be adored. If a man have a thorne in his foot, he may not bow before an Image to pull it out: and if money fall out of his hand, he may not there, be- fore an Image, stoop to take it vp, lest he might seem to adore it, but he must sit down on the ground to doe it. And if the water of a Fountaine bee caused to passe thorow the mouth of an Image, he may not drinke thereat, lest hee should seeme to kisse the Image.

22. An<sup>o</sup> Image may not be made, viz. The Image of a man in siluer or gold, if it be embossed or set out, but if it be stamped in mettall (in manner of a seale) it is lawfull. But of Beasts, Birds, Trees, and Flowers, those prominent Images (which are made standing out) are lawfull. Otherwise of the Sunne, Moone and Starres.

45. No<sup>t</sup> commoditas is to be raised from Idols. If a Tree be planted neere an Image, one may not sit vnder the shadow thereof, nor passe vnder it, if there be any other way: and if he must passe, it must be running. Things imployed to Idolatrie may be vsed of vs, if the Gentiles haue first prophaned them. It is not lawfull to sell them Ware or Frankincense, especially at their Candlemasse Feast; nor brookes to vse in their Service. Our women may not performe a Mid. wiues office to them, nor nurse their children.

65. Thou shalt<sup>t</sup> doe no worke on the seventh day. Nothing that belongeth to the getting of Food or Rayment. It is vnlawfull to walke on the grasse, lest thou pull it vp with thy feet; or to hang any thing on the bough of a tree, lest it breake; or to eat an apple, plucked on the Sabbath, especially if the tayle or wooden substance, whereby it groweth, be on it; or to mount on a horse, lest hee be galled; or to goe into water, lest thou wipe thy cloathes: which holdeth also, if they be moystened with Wine or Oyle (but not in a woman that giueth sucke) who may wipe her cloaths, for the more puritie of her prayers. The stopple of a Vessell, if it be of Hemp or Flax, may not be thrust in, though it runne, especially if any other Vessell be vnder. To mixe Mustard- seed with wine or water; to lay an apple to the fire to roast; to wash the bodie, chiefly with hotte water; to sweate; to wash the hands; to doe any thing in priuate, which may not be publicly done: (but some say, it is lawfull priuately to rubbe off the dirt with his nailes from his cloathes, which publicly he may not:) To reade by a Light, except two reade together: To set sayle: (but if thou enter three dayes before, it is not necessarie to go forth on the Sabbath) to be carried in a Waggon, though a Gen- tile driue it: If fire happen on the Sabbath, to carrie any thing out, but thy food, ray- ment, and necessities for that day, and that wherein the holy Booke lieth: to put to pa- ture Horses or Asses, coupled together: to receiue any good by the Light, or Fire, which a Gentile hath made for the Iew; (otherwise, if he did it for himselfe:) To play on any Instrument; to make a bed; to Number, Measure, ludge, or Marrie, lest they should write any thing: To reade at home, when others are at the Synagogue: To speake of buying and selling (which it seemeth they obserue not:) To visite Field or Garden: To Runne, Leape, or tell Tales, &c. All these on the Sabbath day are vnlawfull. For dangerous diseases it is lawfull to violate the Sabbath*: Such are the three first dayes after a womans trauell, &c. But of this, see* also the obserua- tion of their Sabbath. It is not lawfull to walke out of the Citie, but their limited space: but within the Citie, as farre as they will, though it be as big as Niniue.

120. It is forbidden<sup>a</sup> to hurt the Seed-members of Man or Beast. Neither Males nor Females may be gelded or spayed: and yet we may vse such Beasts.

126. It is punishable to know, kisse, or embrace one which is forbidden by the Law. Leuit. 18. Therefore our Masters haue forbidden to smile on such, or vse any meanes or tokens of Lust. Likewise they haue forbidden men to know their wiues in the day- time, vnlesse it be in the darke, or vnder some couering. The same is forbidden to a drunken-man, and to him which hateth his wife, lest they get wicked children be- twene them. Also to follow a woman in the streets, but either to go before or besides, her. And he which is not married, may not put his hand beneath his Nauell, nor touch his flesh, when he maketh water. And because* a man may not weare womans at- tire, neither may he looke in a glasse, because that is womanish.

138 The fat may not be eaten. The fat of the Heart may: but not that which is on the Inwards, and Reines, and Stomacke, and Gurs, and Bladder; the rest may be eaten.

176 If thy brother be a poore thou mayest not abuse him; to wit, to base Offices, as to vntie the shooe, or to carry Vessels to the Bath. Concerning liberalitie to the poore, they limit it at the fift part of a mans goods; lest men should become poore by relieving the poore.

191 Thou mayest not lend to an Israelite on Usury, nor borrow on Usury. Nor be a witnesse or surety in cases of Usurie; nor receiue any thing besides the principall, especially on any Covenant going before.

201 He that by constraints doth any thing worthy of death (although he violate the name of God) ought not to be slaine.

213 Wicked men are not competent witnesses. He is accounted wicked which transgresseth any Precept, for which he is worthy to be beaten. A Theefe and a Robber is not sufficient to be a witnesse, after he hath made restitution: Nor a Vsurer, nor a Publican, nor he which is enriched by play, nor children, till they haue beards, except he be twentie yeares olde.

222 The King ought not to multiplie Wines. Our Masters say, That the King may haue eighteene wiues.

225 If any of the seuen (Canaanitish) Nations shall come in the hands of a Jew, he ought to slay him.

242 The Father or the Husband may disannull the vowes of their Children or Wives. And the Wife-men may releale the vowes of those which repent of their vow. A tonne of thirteene yeares and a day, and a daughter of twelue and a day (if they be out of their parents tuition) haue power to vow. * A bastard may not marry an Israelites daughter to the tenth generation.

308 There are fifty defects which make a Man or Beast incapable of sacred Function; to be either Sacrificer, or Sacrifice: five in the eares, three in the eye-lids, eight in the eyes, three in the nose, sixe in the mouth, twelue in the seed-vessels, sixe in the hands and feet, and in the bodie foure, &c. Besides, there are foure-score and ten defects in a Man, which are not in a Beast. No defect, vntil it be outward, maketh a man vnfit.

OUT OF THEIR AFFIRMATIVE

PRECEPTS.

11 Every one ought to teach his sonne the Law: Likewise his nephew; and Wisesemen their Disciples: and he which is not taught it of his father, must learne it as he can. He which teacheth another the written Law, may receiue a reward; but not for teaching the Traditionall.

13 Rise before thine Elder: that is (saith R. Ios) a Wiseman, although young in yeares. To him thou must rise when he is foure cubites distant; and when he is passed by, thou mayest sit downe againe.

16 The sinner must turne from his sinne unto God. And being returned, he must say, I beseech thee, O Lord, I haue sinned and done wickedly before thy face: so and so haue I done, and behold, it repenteth me of my wickednesse, I am confounded for my works, I will doe so no more. And thus ought all to say, which offer sacrifices for sinne; and they which are condemned to death for their crimes, if they will that death doe away their offences. But he which hath sinned against his neighbour, ought to make restitution, and aske pardon; otherwise his sinne is not remitted. And if his neighbour will not pardon him, let him bring three, other to entreate for him: if he then grant not, he is to be accounted cruel. If the offended partie be dead before, let the offender bring ten men to his graue, and say before them, I haue sinned against God and this man, and let restitution be made to his heires.

19 Prayer must be used every day. Therefore they of the great Synagogue, Ezra, Zerubabel, and the rest, ordained eighteene blessings and other prayers, to be said with every sacrifice. They ordained these Rites of Prayer; the eyes cast downe to the ground, the feet set together, the hands on the heart, in feare and trembling, as a seruant speaketh to his Master: a place where is no dunge, especially of an Ass and a Henne; a window in the roome which looketh toward Ierusalem, turning his body that way. He which is blinde, let him direct his heart to his Father which is in Heauen.

23 The Sentence Heare Israel, &c. and another Sentence is to be written on the posts of the House. He which hath his Phylacteries on his head and armes, and his knots on his garment, and his Schedule on his doore, is so fenced that he cannot easily sinne.

24 Every Israelite is bound to write for himselfe a booke of the Law.

29 Sanctifie the Sabbath. Remember those things on the Sabbath which make to the honour and holinesse of that day. And we are perswaded that Sathan and the Diuels flie into darke mountaines, abhorring the holinesse of the day; and after its past, returne to hurt the children of men. * To apply spittle to the eyes is then prohibited because it is as a medicine.

40 He which is twentie yeares olde and marrieth not, breaketh the Precept of increasing and multiplying: except it be for contemplation and studie of the Law. But if he seeke in himselfe Lezer, Lust to preuaile, he must marrie, lest he fall into transgression.

52 If a man refuse to marrie the wife of his brother deceased without issue, he must by the Sentence of the Iudges, pull off his shooe, which must not be made of Linne, but of the Hide of a cleane Beast; and the woman, whiles she is yet fasting (for then it is most truly spittle) shall spit in his face, saying, So let it be done to him which will not build his brothers house.

63 He which will eat the flesh of beast or birds, must kill them after the due manner. Nor may any be allowed to be a Butcher, except he know our Rites.

98 When the Iudges dissent in any case, the greater part is to be followed. When Sentence is past, Execution must follow the same day; and the Cryer must goe before, proclayming the Crime and Penaltie, with the circumstances of Time, Place, and Winesnesse. If any can say any thing for his innocencie, hee may cause him to bee carried backe to the Iudges: if he be led againe to death, he must haue two Wise-men by to heare his words, that if they see cause, he may be carried backe to the Iudges. If he yet be found guilty, he must be led to the place of execution, and there slaine by two Winesnesse. But before his death, let them exhort him to say, Let my death be vnto me for the remission of all my sinnes. After this confession let them giue him a cup of Wine, with a graine of Frankincense to drinke, that he may be deprived of the vse of reason, and made drunke, and so slaine.

112 Honour thy Father and Mother. R. Simeon saith, That the Scripture more esteemeth the honour of Parents then of God: for we are bidden honour God with our substance; but for thy Parents, if thou hast nothing, thou oughtest to labour in the Mill to succour them: yea, saith another, thou must begge for them from doore to doore.

132 At this time we can sanctifie nothing, because we haue no Temple.

I might adde diuers other things of like moment, which (to auoyde prolixitie) I omit: and for the same cause I let passe many things which I might hither bring out of the same Authour in his notes vpon Matthew, by him set forth in Hebrew and Latin; where he both relateth and refuteth diuers of the Iewish vanities; especially their blasphemous caulls against Christ.

Touch not (much lesse mayest thou eat) an egge layde on a festiuall day: yea, if it be doubtfull whether it were then layd, and if it be mixt with others, all are prohibited. But hee which killeth a Henne, and findes Egges in the bellie, may eat them. of the second, Isaac went to meditate in the felde; of the third, The glorie of this last house shall be greater then of the first, &c. Fit Iewish handling of the Scriptures, But I haue beene so plentifull of their barrennesse, that I feare to ouer-lade, or ouer-loath the Reader.

Munster hath likewise written seuerall small Treatises of the Faith of the Christians, and of the Faith of the Iewes, and of the Iewish Cauils against our Religion, and of diuers fabulous functions which they haue deuised in disgrace thereof; they that will, may in them further see their blindenesse. For what greater blindenesse then to thinke that their Messias was borne that day the Temple was destroyed, and to remaine at Rome till that time, when he shall say to the Pope, Let my people goe, as Moses borne so long before, at last said to Pharaoh? That he should be annoynted by Elias? That he shall destroy Rome? That Elias shall re-vnite the soule to the bodie in the resurrection, which shall be of all the iust, but not of all the wicked; not in the same bodie, but another created like to the former? which resurrection shall be effected by Messiahs prayer: That the Temple at Ierusalem shall be the very middle of the world? That in the Messiahs dayes Wheate shall grow without renewing by Seed, as the Vine? But of these and the like, more then enough in this booke following. L. Carreius a conuert from the Iewes, setteth downe these fixe, as the maine differences betwixt them and vs, The Trinity, the incarnation, the manner of his comming, whether in humility or royaltie, the Law ceremoniall, which the Iew holdeth eternall, saluation by and for our owne workes, which the Christian ascribeth to faith in Christ crucified, and lastly, of the time of his comming, whether past or present. To these he thinketh all other may be referred. But let vs examine the particulars.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the Iewish opinions of the Creation, their Ceremonies about the birth of a Childe: Of their Circumcision, Purification, and Redemption of the first-borne, and Education of their Children.

WHen a Iewish woman is great with child, and neere her time, her chamber is furnished with necessaries; and then some holy and deuoute man (if any such may be had) with chalke maketh a circular line round in the chamber vpon all the wals, and writeth on the dore, and within and without on euery wall, and about the bed in Hebrew Letters, Adam, Chama, Chuts Lilis, i. Adam, Eue, away hence Lilis. Hereby they signifie their desire, that if a woman shall be deliuered of a sonne, God may one day giue him a wife like to Eue, and not to Lilis: if it be a daughter, that she may once proue to her husband a helper like Eue, and not a shrew like Lilis. This word Lilis is read in the Prophet, interpreted a Skrich-Owle: but the Iewes seeme to meane by it a diuellish Spectrum in womans shape, that vseth to slay or carry away children, which are on the eight day to be circumcised. Elias Lenita writeth, that he hath read that a hundred and twentie yeares Adam contained himselfe from his wife Eue, and in that space there came to him Diuels which conceiued of him, whence were ingendred Diuels and Spirits, Fairies and Goblins; and that there were foure mothers or dammes of the Diuels, Lilish, Nasmah, Ogereth, and Maabalath. Thus is it read in Ben Sira, When God had made Adam, and saw it was not good for him to be alone, he made him a woman of the earth, like vnto him, and called her Lilis. These disagreed for superiority, not suffering Cesarne priorem, Pompeiusu parem: Lilis (made of the same mould) would not be vnderling; and Adam would not endure her his equall. Lilis seeing no hope of agreement, vntured that sacred word IEHOVAH, with the Cabalisticall interpretation thereof, and presently did flie into the Ayre. Adam playning his case, God sent three Angels after her, viz. Senoi, Sensenoi, Sanmangeleph, eyther to bring her backe, or to denounce unto her, That a hundred of her children should die in a day. These ouertooke her ouer the troublesome Sea (where one day the Egyptians should should be drowned) and did their message to her: she refusing to obey, they threatened her drowning: but she besought them to let her alone, because she was created to vex and kill children on the eight day, if they were men; if women children, on the twentieth day. They nevertheless forcing her to goe, Lilis swore to them, That whensoever she should finde the name or figure of those Angels, written or painted on Schedule, Parchment, or any thing, she would do infants no harme, and that she would not refuse that punishment, to loose a hundred children in a day. And accordingly a hundred of her children or young diuels, died in a day. And for this cause doe they write these names on a Scroll of Parchment, and hang them on their infants neckes. Thus saith Ben. Sira.

Their exposition of Scripture is so absurd, that we haue hence a manifest argument, that as they denied the Son that Eternall Word and Truth, whose written word this is; so that spirit which inspired the same, the Spirit of Truth hath put a vase on their hearts, and iustly suffered the spirit of errour to blinde their eyes, that seeing they should see and not understand. This will appeare generally in our ensuing Discourse; but for a taste let vs begin with the beginning of Moses, whereon R. Iacob Baal Hatturim hath left to the world these smokie speculations. The Bible beginneth with Beith, the second letter in the Alphabet, and not with Aleph the first, because that is the first letter of Barach, which signifieth blessing, this of Arou, that is, a curse. Secondly, Beith signifieth two, insinuating the two-fold Law, written and unwritten: for Bereishith hath the letters of Barasheetes; first, hee made; secondly, Lawes; thirdly, Bereishith (the first word of Genesis) hath as many letters as Aleph be Tishrei, that is, the first of Tishrei or Tisri, on which the Jewes say the world began: fourthly, Bereishith hath the letters of Baijthroshe. i. the first Temple, which he knew the Jewes would build, and therefore created the world: fifthly, it hath the letters of Iare Shabbath. i. to keepe the Sabbath; for God created the world for the Israelites which keepe the Sabbath: sixthly also, of Bereishith, which signifieth the covenant of fire, to wit, Circumcision and the Law, another cause of the creation: seventhly, likewise it hath the letters of Baraiesh, that is, he created as many worlds as are in the number iesh (that is, three hundred and ten) that the Saints might reioyce therein. Now if I should follow them from these letters and spelling, to their mysticall sententious exposition of greater parts of the sentence, you should heare Moses tell you out of his first words that the world was created for the Talmudists, for the six hundred and thirtene precepts, because hee loved the Israelites more then the other people: Again, that he foresaw the Israelites would receive the Law (but he is now an Ass, saith he, which beareth wine and drinketh water). There are in the first verse seven words, which signifie the seven dayes of the weeke, seventh year of rest, seven times seventh the Iubilee, seven times seven Iubilees, seven heavens, seven lands of promise, and seven Orbes or Planets, which caused David to say, I will praise thee seven times a day. There are 28. letters in it, which shew the 28. times of the world, of which Salomon speaketh, Eccles. 3. 1. There are in it 6. Alephs, and therefore the world shall last 6000. yeares. So in the second verse, The earth was without forme and voyde, are 2. Alephs, which shew the world should be 2000. places voyd: now in the third verse are 4. Alephs, which shew other 4000. yeare, two of which should be vnder the Law, and two vnder Messias.

Now for the first man, his body (saith R. Osa in the 4th Talmud) was made of the earth of Babylon, his head of the land of Israel, his other members of other partes of the world. So R. Meir thought he was compact of the earth, gathered out of the whole earth, as it is written, Thine eyes did see my substance, now it is elsewhere written, The eyes of the Lord are ouer all the earth. There are 12. houres of the day, saith R. Aba, in the first whereof the earth of Adam, or earthly matter was gathered: in the second, the trunk of his body fashioned: in the third, his members stretched forth: in the fourth, his soule infused: in the fift, he stood vpon his feet: in the sixth, he gaue names to the creatures: in the seventh, Eue was given him in marriage: in the eighth, they ascended the bedde two, and descended foure: in the ninth he receiued the precept, which in the tenth he brake, and therefore was iudged in the eleventh; and in the twelfth was cast out of Paradise: as it is written, Man continued not one night in honour. d Tract. Sanhedrin. Psal. 139. 16.

Adam was from one end of the world to the other, and for his transgression, the Creator by laying on his hand lessened him: for before, saith R. Eleazar, with his head hee reached (a reacher indeede) the very firmament. His language was Syriake or Aramitish, saith R. Iuda, and as Roseblakis addeth, the Creator shewed him all generations, and the wise-men in them. His sinne, after R. Iehuda, was heretic; R. Isaac thinketh, the nourishing his fore-skinne.

He knew or vsed* carnall fithinesse with all the beasts which God brought vnto him before Eue was made, as some interpret R. Eleazar, and R. Salomon; but Reuchlin laboureth to purge them of that sense: who affirmeth, that hee had an Angell for his Master or Instructor: and when he was exceedingly dejected with remorse of his sinne, God sent the Angell Raziel to tell him that there should be one of his progenie which should haue the foure letters of Iehonah in his name, and should expiate originall sinne. And here was the beginning of their Cabala: and also presently hereupon did hee and Eue build an Altar and offer sacrifice. The like offices of other Angels they mention* to other Patriarchs and tell that every three moneths are set new watches of these watchmen, yea every three houres, yea and every houre is some change of them. And therefore we may haue more fauour of them in one houre then another: for they follow the disposition of the stars; so said the Angell Samael (which wrestled with him) vnto Isaac<sup>b</sup> Let me goe for the day breaketh: for his power was in the night. But let me returne to Adam: of whom they further tell<sup>c</sup> that he was an Hermaphrodite, a man-woman, hauing both Sexes & a double body, the female part ioyned at the shoulders and back parts to the male, their countenances turned from each other. This is proued by Moses his wordes, So God created man in his Image, male and female created he them. And he called their name Adam: yet after this is mention of Adams solitarinesse, and forming of Eue out of his side, that is, cutting the female part from the male, and so fitting them to generation. Thus doth Leo Hebrans reconcile the fable of Platos Androgynus with Moses narration, out of which he thinketh it borrowed. For as hee telleth that Iupiter in the first forming of mankind, made them such Androgyni, with two bodies of two sexes ioyned in the breast, diuided for their pride, the nauill still remayning as a skarre of the wound then made: so with little difference is this their interpretation of Moses. But let vs looke to our present Iewes and the historie of their life.

In their chambers alwaies is found such as Picture; and the names of the Angels of Health (this office they ascribe to them) are written ouer the chamber dore. In their Booke<sup>d</sup> Brandspiegel, printed at Cracouia, 1597. is shewed the authoritie of this Historie, collected by their Wise-men out of those wordes; e Male and Female created he them, compared with the forming of Eue of a Ribbe in the next Chapter, saying, That Lillith the former was diuorced from Adam for her pride, which shee conceived, because she was made of earth, as well as he; and God gaue him another, Flesh of his flesh. And concerning her, R. Moses<sup>e</sup> tells, that Samael the Deuill came riding vpon a Serpent, which was as bigge as a Camell, and cast water ypon her, and deceived her.

When this Iewesse is in trauell, shee must not send for a Christian Mid-wife, except she Iewish can bee gotten: and then the Iewish women must be very thick about her for feare of negligence or iniurie. And if shee be happily deliuered of a sonne, there is exceeding ioy through all the house, and the father presently makes festiuall prouision against the Circumcision on the eighth day. In the meane time ten persons are invited, neither more nor fewer, which are all past thirteene yeares of age. The night after her deliuerie, seuen of the invited parties, and some others sometimes, meete at the Child-houise, and make there great cheare and sport all night, Dicing, Drinking, Fabling, so to solace the Mother, that she should not grieve too much for the childes Circumcision. The Circumciser is called Mohel, who must be a Iew, and a Man, and well exercised in that facultie: and he that will performe this office, at the beginning giueth monie to some poore Iew, to be admitted hereunto in his children, that after his better experience he may be vsed of the richer. And this Mohel may thence-forwards be knowne by his thumbes, on which he weareth the nailes long and e sharpe, and narrow-pointed. The circumcising Instrument is of stone, glasse, yron, or any matter that will cut: commonly sharpe kniues like Rasors; amongst the rich Iewes closed in siluer, and set with ſtones. Before the Infant bee circumciſed, hee muſt bee waſhed and wrapped in clouts, that in the time of the circumciſion he may lie cleane: for otherwiſe they might vſe no prayers ouer him. And if in the time of Circumciſion (for paine) hee deſileth himſelfe, the Mobel muſt ſuſpend his praying, till he be waſhed and laid cleane againe. This is performed commonly in the morning, while the child is faſting; to prevent much fluxe of blood.

In the morning therefore of the eight day all things are made readie. Firſt are two ſeates placed, or one ſo framed, that two may ſit in the ſame apart, adorned coſtly with Carpets, and that either in the Synagogue, or ſome priuate Parlor: if it be in the Synagogue, then the ſeat is placed neare the holy Arke, or Cheſt, where the Booke of the Law is kept. Then comes the Suretie or God-father for the child, and placeth himſelfe at the ſaid ſeat, and neare him the Mobel, or Circumciſer. Other Jewes follow them, one of which cryeth with a loud voice, That they ſhould bring preſently whatſoeuer is needfull for this buſineſſe. Then come other children, whereof one bringeth a great Torch, in which are lighted twelue Waxe-candles, to repreſent the twelue Tribes of Iſrael: after him two other Boyes, carrying cups full of red wine. After them another carrieth the circumciſing knife: another brings a diſh with ſand; another brings another diſh with oile; in which are cleane and fine clouts, which after the Mobel applyeth to the wounds of the child. Theſe ſtand in a ring about the Mobel, the better to mark and learn: and theſe their offices are bought with monie by thoſe children. Some come thither alſo with ſpices, Cloues, Cinnamon, ſtrong Wine to reſreſh, if any happen to ſwonne. Theſe being thus aſſembled, the God-father ſitteth downe vpon one of theſe two ſeats: right againſt him the Mobel placeth himſelfe, and ſings the ſong of the Iſraelites, and others. Then the women bring the child to the dore, all the Congregation preſently riſing vp. The God-father goeth to the dore, taketh the child, ſitteth downe on his ſeat, and crieth out, Baruch habba, i. Bleſſed be he that commeth; in their Cabiliſticall ſenſe, habba, being applied either to the eight day, which is the day of Circumciſion, or the coming of Elias, whom they call the Angel of the covenant, (ſo they interpret the Prophet) and ſay, that Elias commeth with the Infant, and ſits downe at that other emptie ſeat. For when the Iſraelites were prohibited circumciſion, and Elias complained thus, The children of Iſrael haue forſaken the covenant, i. Circumciſion, God promiſed him, That from thence-forwards he ſhould be preſent at circumciſion, to ſee it rightly performed. And when they make ready that ſeat for Elias, then they are bound in ſer words to ſay, This ſeat is for the Prophet Elias, & otherwiſe (as an vnbidden gueſt) he commeth not. This ſeat remaineth for him three whole daies together.

Then when the God-father holdeth the child in his lap, the Mobel takes him out of his clouts, and layeth hold on his member, and holding the fore-skinne, putteth back the toppe thereof, and rubbeth the fore-skinne, ſo to make it haue the leſſe ſenſe of paine. Then hee taketh from the Boy the circumciſing-knife, and ſaith with a loud voice; Bleſſed bee thou, O God our Lord, King of the World, which haſt ſanctified vs with thy Commandments, and giuen vs the Covenant of Circumciſion; and while hee thus ſpeaketh, cuts off the fore-part of the ſkinne, that the head of the yard may bee ſcene, and preſently hurleth it into the <sup>d</sup> San-diſh, and reſtoreth his knife to the Boy againe: taketh from another a cup of Red Wine, and drinketh his mouth full, which he preſently ſpitteth out on the Infant, and therewith waſheth away the blood; and if hee ſee the child beginne to faint, he ſpitteth out ſome thereof on his face. Preſently he taketh the member of the child in his mouth, and ſucketh out the blood, ſo make it ſtay from bleeding the ſooner, and ſpitteth out that blood ſo ſucked into the other cup full of Wine, or into the diſh of Sand. This hee doth at leaſt thrice. After the blood is ſtayed, the Mobel with his ſharpe-pointed thinne nailes rendreth the ſkinne of the yard, and putteth it back ſo farre, that the head thereof is bare, Hee is more painefull to the Infant, with this rending of the remainyng ſkinne, which action is called Prinab, then with the former. This being done, hee layeth the clouts (dipped in oyle aforeſaid) to the wound, and bindeth them three or ſoure times about; and then wrappeth vp the Infant againe in his clouts. Then ſaith the Father of the child; Blessed be thou, O God our Lord, King of the World, which hast sanctified vs in thy Commandments; and hast commanded vs to succede into the Covenant of our Father ABRAHAM. To which all the Congregation answereth, As this Infant hath happily succeded into the Covenant of our Father ABRAHAM; so happily shall he succede into the possession of the Law of MOSES, into Marriage also; and other good workes. Then doth the Mohel wash his bloudie mouth and his hands. The God-father riseth with him, and standeth ouer-against him; who taking the other cup of wine; saith a certaine prayer, and prayeth also ouer the Infant, saying; O our God, God of our Fathers, strengthen and keepe this Infant to his Father and Mother, and make that his name, in the people of Israel, may bee named (here he first nameth the Childe, calling him Isaac) *Isaac, which was the sonne of Abraham. Let his Father reioyce in him that hath come out of his loynes; Let his Mother reioyce in the fruit of her wombe, as it is written, * Make glad thy Father and Mother, and her that bare thee to reioyce. And God saith by the Prophet, * I passed by thee, and saw thee troden in thy blood, and I said vnto thee in thy blood, thou shalt liue; yea, I said vnto thee, in thy blood, thou shalt liue.* Here the Mohel puts his finger into the other cup of Wine, wherein hee had set the blood, and moisteneth the childes lips three times with that wine, hoping, that according to the former sentence of the Prophet, hee shall liue longer in the blood of his Circumcision, then otherwise he should. Dauid also saith, b He is mindfull of his marvellous acts which he hath done, and of his wonders, and the iudgements of his mouth, &c. Then he continueth his prayer for the present assembly, and that God would giue long life to the Father and Mother of the Boy, and blesse the child. This done, hee offers the blessed Cup to all the yong men, and bids them drinke. Then with the Childe (who is thus made a Jew) they returne to the Fathers house, and restore him to his Mothers armes. This last prayer hee makes neare the Arke, and some of the deuouter Jewes, before and after Circumcision, take the Childe; and lay him vpon Elia pillow, that Elia may touch him. *c The skinne cast into the sand, is in memorie of that promise, d I will make thy seede as the sand of the Sea; and of Balams saying, e Who can number the dust of ACOB, i. his posteritie, whose fore-skinne is cast in the Sand or Dust, and because the Curse f on the Serpent is thus fulfilled, Dust thou shalt eate, i. this skinne in the dust: thus to their enemye the Serpent fulfilling also that precept, g If thine enemye hunger, feede him. can no more seduce this man.

If a child bee sick on the eight day, they deferre Circumcision till his recouerie; they hold also the blowing of the North winde necessarie to this action; and therefore thinke that their Fathers forbare circumcision those fortie years in the wilderness, because the North winde blew not all that time, lest it should haue blowne away the pillar of smoke and fire: and besides this winde is holseome for wounds, which else are dangerous. But least they should stay beyond the eighth day expecting this Northerne breath, their Talmud tells that euery day there blow foure windes, and that the North is mixed with them all, and therefore they may circumcise euery day. If the child die before the eight day, he is circumcised at the graue without any prayers; but a signe is erected in memorie of him, that God may haue mercie vpon him, and raise him at the day of the Resurrection. In some places all the people stand, except the God-father, because it is written, All the people stood in the Covenant. But to pursue the rest of their niceties, grounded vpon such interpretations, would be endlesse. We will follow the child home, if you be not already wearie, and see what rout is there kept.

Ten must be the number (you haue heard) of the inuited guests, and one or two of these learned Rabbins, who must make a long praier and sermon at the table, although others mean while are more busied in tossing the cups of wine. I was once present (saith Buxdorsius) at one of their circumcision-feasts, and one of their Rabbins preached on Pro. 3. 18. Wisdom is a tree of life; but more wooden or ridiculous stuffe I neuer heard in all my life. This feast they obserue by example of Abraham, who made a great feast when the child was weaned; their Kabal peruerits it, when he was circumcised. The Circumciser abideth some time with the mother, lest the blood should again issue from the child. The mother keepeth within, six weeks, whether it be a male or female: all which time her husband must not so much as touch her, or eat meat in the same dish with her. If a female child be borne, there is small solemnitie; only at sixe weeks age, some yong wenches stand about the cradle, and lift it vp with the child in it, and name it; she which stands at the head, being God-mother: and after this they iunket together.

When the fortie daies are accomplished, before the wife may accompanie or haue any fellowship with her husband, shee must be purified in cold water, and put on white and clean garments. Their washing is, with great scrupulositie, in a common watering, or in priuate Cesternes, or Fountaines; which must be so deepe, that they must stand vp to the neck in water: and if it be muddie in the bottome, they must haue a square stone to stand on, that their whole feet may stand in cleare water, and that the water may passe betwixt their toes: for the least part not couered with water, would frustrate the whole action: and for this cause they lay aside all their haire-laces, neck-laces, rings: they diue vnder the water, so that no part may bee free from the same. Some Iewesse must stand by for witness hereof, which is twelue yeares old and a day at least.

* They redeeme their first-borne in this sort; when the child is one and thirtie daies old his father sendeth for the Priest with other friends, and sets the child on a table before him; adding so much monie, or monies-worth, as amounteth to two florents of gold, or two Dolars and a halfe: my wife (saith he) hath brought me forth my first-borne, and the Law bids me giue him to thee. Doeft thou then giue me him: saith the Priest? he answereth, yea. The Priest asketh the mother, if she euer before had a child, or abortion? if shee answer, No: then the Priest asketh the father, Whether the child or the monie be dearer to him? hee answereth, the child: then doth the Priest take the monie and lay it on the head of the Infant, saying: This is a first begotten child, which God commanded should be redeemed, and now, saith he to the child, thou art in my power, but thy parents desire to redeeme thee; now this monie shall bee giuen to the Priest for thy redemption: and if I haue redeemed thee, as is right, thou shalt be redeemed: if not, yet thou being redeemed according to the Law and custome of the Jewes, shalt grow vp to the feare of God, to marriage and good workes, Amen. If the father die, before the child be one and thirtie dayes old, the mother hangeth a scroll about his neck, wherein is written, This is the first-borne, and not redeemed: and this child when he cometh of age must redeeme himselfe.

The Iewish Chasbamim, or Wise-men, haue left no part of life vnprovidid of their superstitious care: as we haue seen concerning the birth and circumcision of their children, with the Purification of the mother, and Redemption of the first-borne. To proceede with them: they enioyne the mother, while shee giueth suck, to eate holeisome foode of easie digestion, that the Infant may suck good milke; so that the heart and stomack be not stopped, but may come so much more easily to obaine wisdome and vertue. For God hath great care of children, and hath therefore giuen a woman two breasts, and placed them next her heart; yea in the dangerous persecution vnder Pharaoh, Exod. 1. he<sup>b</sup> caused the earth to open it selfe, and receiue their Mase children, and created therein two stones, from one of which the Infant sucked milke, and from the other honie, till they were growne, and might goe to their Parents: yea, and if you beleue their Gemara (can you choose?) a poore Iew hauing buried his wife, and not able to hire a nurse for his child, had his owne breasts miraculously filled with milke, and became nurse himselfe. Yea, Mardocheus (saith their Medrajch) sucked the breasts of Hester, and for this cause did shee, after her exaltation, so preferre him. The conclusion is, if shee giue grosse foode to her Infants, shee shall bee cast into hell. Shee must not goe naked breasted, nor too long fasting in a morning, nor carrie her Infants; or suffer them to goe or be naked, lest the Sunne hurt them, if it bee in the day, or the Moon in the night: and that they may soone learne that the earth is filled with the Maestic of diuine glorie: and for this cause must they beware, that they neuer goe bare-headed: for this were a signe of impudencie, and ill disposition. And as religiously they must prouide, that they be alway girded with a girdle: for the girdle distinguisheth betwixt the heart and the priuities; and in his morning prayer he saith, Blessed be thou, O God, which girdest Israel with the girdle of strength: which, if he should not haue a girdle on, would be in vaine. Their Mothers theretore sow their girdles to their

coats: with great care they auoid going bare-foot, especially in Ianuarie and Februarie.

When they can speake, they are taught sentences out of Scripture, and to salute their parents with good-morrow, good-Sabbath, &c. and after seuen yeares they adde the name of God, God giue you good-morrow, &c. but they must not name the name of God but in a pure place. These teach them the names of things in the vulgar, and some Hebrew names among, that so they may not commonly be vnderstood: for pure Hebrew they cannot speake, except their most learned Rabbines only. Their children must not conuerse with children of Christians, and their parents make all things in Christians odious to them, that they may season them from their child-hood with hatred of them. When they are seuen yeares old they learne to write and read: and when they can read, they learne to construe the Text of Moses in their vulgar tongue: When the Mother carryeth him first to the schoole to the Rabbi, she maketh him cakes seasoned with honie and sugar, and as this cake, so (saith shee) let the Law be sweet to thy heart. Speake not vaine trifling words in the schoole, but only the words of God. For if they so doe, then the glorious Maiestie of God dwelleth in them, and delighteth it selfe with the aire of their breath. For their breathing is yet holy, not yet polluted with sinne: neither is he bar-mitznab, bound to obey the Commandements, till hee be thirteene yeares old.

When he is ten yeares old, and hath now some smattering in Moses, he proceedeth to learne the Talmud: at thirteene yeares, his father calleth ten Iewes, and testifieth in their presence, that this his sonne is now of iust age, and hath beene brought vp in their manners and customes, their daily manner of praying and blessing, and hee will not further stand charged with the sinnes of his sonne, who is now bar-mitznab, and must himselfe beare this burthen.

Then in their presence he thanketh God, that hee hath discharged him from the punishment of his sonne, desiring, that his sonne by diuine grace may be long safe, and endeavour to good workes. At the fifteenth yeare of their life, they are compelled to learne their Gemara, or the complement of their Talmud Disputations and subtile Decisions about the Text of their Talmud. And in these they spend the greatest part of their liues, seldome reading any of the Prophets, and some not in the whole space of a long life reading one Prophet through, and therefore know so little of the Messiah.

At eighteene yeares their male children marrie, according to their Talmud-constitution, and sometimes sooner, to auoide fornication. Their maidens may marrie, when they are twelue yeares old and a day. At twentie yeares they may traffike, buy, sell, and circumsent all they can: for their neighbour in the Law, is (in their sense) such a Iew as you haue heard described.

THe good-wife is to waken her husband, and the parents to awaken their children, when after thirteene yeares they are subiect to the Iewish Precepts: before their Pentecost, they rise before it is light, and after, the nights being shorter, when it is now day. They are to awaken the day, not to tarry till it awaken them. For their Morning-prayer must be made whiles the Sunne is rising; and not later: for then is the time of hearing, as they interpret, Lament. 2. 19. And he which is deuout ought at that time to be sad for Ierusalem, and to pray euery morning for the reedifying of the Temple, and Cite: if in the night-time any sheddeth teares for their long captiuitie, God will heare his prayer, for then the Starres and Planets moune with him: and if hee suffer the teares to trickle downe his cheekes, God will arise and gather them into his bottle, and if any decree be by their enemies enacted against them, with those teares hee will blot out the same, Wittnes David, Put my teares in thy bottle, are they not in thy booke?

And if any rubbe his forehead with his teares, it is good to blot out certaine finnes that are there written. In the beginning of the night God causeth all the gates of heauen to be shut, and the Angels stay at them in silence, and sendeth euill spirits into the world, which hurt all they meet: but after mid-night, they are commanded to open the same. This command and call is heard of the Cocks, and therefore they clap their wings and crow, to awaken men: and then the euill spirits loose their power of hurting: and in this respect the Wise-men haue ordained them a thanksgiving to be said at cock-crow-

They must not rise vp in their beds naked, nor put on their shirts sitting, but put their heads and armes into the same as they lie, lest the walls and beames should see their nakednesse. It is a brag of Rabbi Iosef, that, in all his life, hee had not herein faulted. But to goe or stand naked in the chamber, were more then piacular: and much more, to make water standing naked before his bed, although it be night. He must not put on his garments wrong: nor his left shooe before the right, and yet hee must put off the left-foot shooe first; When he is clothed, with his head inclined to the earth, and a deuout minde (in remembrance of the destruction of the Temple) hee goeth out of the chamber, with his head, feet, and all couered, because of the holy Schechinam (diuine glorie) ouer his head. Then he goeth to stoole in some priuie place; for so hath Amos commanded, * Prepare thy selfe (O Israel) to meet thy God: and DAVID; a All that is within me praise his holy name: that is, all within the body emptie and cleane: For else must not God bee named; and therefore his garments must not be spotted and fouled. To restraîne nature too long, were a sinne, and would cause the soule to stinke: and (suing your reuerence) he must wipe with the left hand, for with the right he writeth the name of God, and the Angels. And in this place and businesse he must take heede, hee thinke not of God or his Word; much lesse name him, for God will shorten the daies of such a one. R. Sira told his Scholers, that the cause of his long life was, that in an impure place he neuer thought of the Word, nor named the name of God. Besides, he must turne his face, and not his hinder-parts toward the Temple of Ierusalem. He ought not to touch his body with vnwashed hands; in regard of the euill spirits which thereon till they be washed, and if he should touch his eyes hee would bee blinde, his eares deafe, his nose dropping, his mouth stinking, his hand scabbed with these washed, and therefore venemous hands: and when hee washeth hee must powre water three times on his right hand, and as oft on the left, before one hand may touch the other: he must not be sparing in his water, for store of water, store of health: after the hands, the mouth and face must be washed, because they were created after the Image of God: and how should the name of God be vttered out of a foule mouth? hee must wash ouer a basen, not ouer the ground: he must drie his face very well, for feare of wheales and wrinkles: and that with a cleane Towel, not with his shirt, for this would make them blockish and forgetfull. After all this followeth his Brachab, or blessing, Blessed be thou, O God, our God, King of the whole world, who hast commanded vs to wash our hands. Their hands they must alwaies wash on these occasions: in the morning; at their returne from the stoole; from bathing; when they haue cut their nailes; haue scratched their naked bodie; haue pulled off their shoes with their hands; haue touched a dead body; haue gone amongst the dead; haue companied with their wiues, or haue killed a louse; If he respect washing after these, if he be learned, he shall forget his learning; if vnlearned, he shall lose his sense.

They haue a foure-cornered garment, which some put on with the rest, when they rise; others then, when they will pray. The foure-cornered parts thereof are made of linnen or silke, tyed together with two winding-bands, of such length that they may draw through their head betwixt them, so that those two quadrangular peeces may hang down, one on his breast, the other on his back. In euery of these four corners hangeth a labell, made of white woollen threads, by a litle knot, downwards to the ground, and the same is foure, or eight, or twelue fingers broad. These labells they call Ziqqs. Those which are deuout weare this garment euery day, vnder a long outward coat, in such sort that those labells may appeare out a litle, so that they may alwaies see them, as monitories of the Commandements of God. When they put them on, they praise God that hath commanded them to wear these Zizis. He (say they) that keepeth duly this Precept of Zizis, doth as much as if he kept the whole Law: for there are in all five knots, compared to the five bookes of Moses: eight threds added to them, make thirtieen. And the word Zizis, maketh six hundred, all together amounting to six hundred and thirtieen, the number (as you haue heard) of Gods Commandements. They ascribe the continencie of Ioseph in Potiphars house; and of Boaz, when Ruth slept by him, to these Zizis. May it please your patience, a storie out of the Talmud. One Rabbi Iochanan saw a boxe full of jewels, which one of his Scholers, Bar-Emorai purposed to steale, but was forbidden by a voice sounding out of the aire, let it alone Bar-Emorai, for it belongeth to *R. Chanina*s wife, which in the other world, shall put into the same violet wooll, to make threed for Zizis, that of them, the iust men there may haue their fringed garments sewed. Once, hee which weareth this garment without intermission, is fortified against the Deuill, and all euill Spirits.

Besides this memorable Vestiment, they weare a certaine knot neare their nose, out of Deut. 6. 8. they shall be frontlets betwene thine eyes. They make it thus. They take a little black foure-square calfe-skin, which they fold eight times, that it may haue foure double folds and distinct breadths. They put into these, distinct Scriptures, the same being foure-fold of parchment. These Scriptures are taken out of Exod. 13. and Deut. 6. Then take they haire out of a cow or calues taile, and wash them cleane, and binde them about those writings of Scripture, so that any one may see, that they are good by the ends of them appearing out of the skin. This skin they sew with cleane and fine strings, taken out of Calues or Kines bodies, or made of Bulls sinewes, or if such strings cannot be had, with strings of Calue-skin-parchment. Then doe they sew a long and black thong to that thick hide or skin, and knit a knot about it. This peece of worke they call Tephillim, to put them in minde of often prayer: and tie it so about their heads, that the thick knot, wherein the Scriptures are, may hang betwixt the eies. After this, they take another foure-cornered skin, which they fold as the former, and write certaine verses out of Exodus in parchment, and put it into a little hollowed skin, and sew it vpon the thick folded skin; to which they adde a long thong, and call it the Tephillim of the hand. This they tie to the bare skin, about the elbow of the left arme, that so that which is written may be ouer against the heart, which may hereby bee the more enflamed to prayer. That long string is so fastned that it commeth to the fore-part of the hand, thus fulfilling that Commandement, 2 Tie wordes which I command thee this day, shall be on thine heart, and thou shalt tie them for a signe in thy hand. They tie on first this Tephillim of the hand, and then that of the head, and make their brachab or prayer, saying, Blessed be thou, O God, our Lord, who hast sanctified vs in thy Commandements, and hast commanded vs to put on Tephillim; looking while he speaketh, diligently on the knot on his fore-head. In folding, sewing, knitting, and tying them, they very subtilly frame the name of God Schaddai: Other their manifold ceremonies about these Tephillim, I willingly omit. Their sanctitie is such, that hee which weareth them must be pure within and without: and if he lets them fall on the ground, all that shall see them so lying, must fast with him one whole day: they must not bee hanged vp bare, but in a bagge: nor may they bee left in a chamber, where a man and his wife lie together, except in triple chest or bagge. A man must not sleepe while he hath them on, nor may he breake winde; and if he haue list to the stoole, he must lay them foure ells from the place of his easement, or lay them against his heart in a double bag. Their women seruants, and sick folkes are free from wearing them. It is sufficient for women to say Amen to their prayers. And all this Moses learned in Mount Sinai.

We haue bene tedious in furnishing our Iew to his Mattins; at Sun-rising is their houre, as you haue heard: but their Rabbins haue enlarged and lengthened that time to about nine of the clock. Where many of the Iewes liue together, they resort at a set houre to their Synagogue. Thither they must goe chearefully: before their Synagogue they haue an yron fastened, to make cleane their shooes, according to Salomons counsell, h Keepe thy foot when thou goest into the house of God. Hee that hath Pantofles, must put them off, as it is written, i For the place where thou standest is holy ground.

At the entrance in at the doore, he pronounceth some things out of Dauid's Psalmes: they must enter with feare and trembling, considering whose presence it is; and for a while suspend their praying for the better attention. And euery Iew must cast in a halpennie at least into the Treasure, as it is written; I will see thy face in righteousness, that is, in almes, as they interpret it. In this attention they bow themselves towards the Arke, in which is the booke of the Law, and say, k How faire are thy Tents, O IACOB? and thy dwellings, O Israel? And l I will enter into thy house in the multitude of thy mercie, I will bow downe in thy holy Temple in thy feare. And, m O Lord I haue loved the habitation of thy house, and the place of the Tabernacle of thy glorie: and diuers other verses out of the Psal. After these things they begin to pray, as is contained in their common prayer booke: and because these prayers are very many, therefore they run them ouer: he that cannot reade, must attend, and say Amen, to all their prayers. These prayers are in Hebrew rimmes. Their first prayer is, The Lord of the World, which reigned before any thing was created, at that time, when according to his will they were created, was called King, and then when all shalbe brought againe into nothing, shall remaine King, to whom shall be giuen feare and honor. He alway hath bene, is, and shall remaine in his beautie for euer. He is One, and besides him there is none other, which may be compared or associated to him, without beginning and end; with him is rule and strength. He is my God and my deliuerer which liueth. Hee is my Rock in my neede, and time of my trouble, my Banner, my Refuge, my Hereditarie portion, in that day, when I implore his helpe. Into his hands I commend my spirit. Whether I wake or sleepe, he is with me, therefore I will not be afraid.

This done, they say then their hundredth<sup>a</sup> benedictions one after another, which are short and twice a day repeated. First for the washing of their hands, that if he then forgot it, he might now in the Congregation recite it. Then for the creation of man, and for that he was made full of holes, whereof, if one should be stopped he should die: then, a confession of the Resurrection: then for vnderstanding, giuen to the Cock (as you haue heard) to discerne day and night asunder; and with his crowing to awaken them; and in order, Blessed, &c. That he hath made me an Israelite or Iew, Blessed, &c. That he hath not made me a seruant, Blessed, &c. That he hath not made me a woman (The women here say, that he hath made me according to his will) Blessed, &c. That exalteth the lowly, Blessed, &c. That maketh the blind to see; which they should say at their first wakening, Blessed, &c. That raiseth the crooked; at his rising, Blessed, &c. That clotheth the naked; at his apparelling, Blessed, &c. That raiseth vp them that fall, Blessed, &c. That bringeth the prisoners out of prison, Blessed, &c. That stretcheth the world vpon the waters; when he setteth his feet on the ground, Blessed, &c. That prepareth and ordereth the goings of man; when he goeth out of his chamber, Blessed, &c. That hath created all things necessarie to life; when he puts on his shooes, Blessed, &c. That girdeth Israel with strength; his girdle, Blessed, &c. That crowneth Israel with comelineffe; when he puts on his hat, Blessed, &c. That giueth strength to the wearie, Blessed, &c. be thou God our Lord, King of the world, who takest sleepe from mine eies, and slumber from mine eie-lids. Then adde they two prayers to be preserued against sinnes, euill spirits, and men, and all euill. After this, humbling themselves before God, they confesse their sins, and againe comfort themselves in the covenant made to Abraham, We are thy people, and the children of thy covenant, &c. O happy we! how good is our portion? how sweet is our lot? how faire is our heritage? Oh happy we, who euery morning and euening may say, Heare Israel, The Lord our Lord is one God. Gather vs that hope in thee from the foure ends of all the earth, that all the Inhabitants of the earth may know that thou art our God, &c. Our Father which art in heauen, bee mercifull vnto vs for thy names sake, which is called vpon vs: and confirme in vs that which is written, o At that time will I bring you, and gather you, and make you for a name and praise among all the people of the earth, when I shall turne your captiuities, saith the Lord.

Then follow two short prayers for the Law giuen them. And then they goe onto the Sacrifices, which, because they cannot execute in action out of the Temple, they redeeme with wordes, reading the precepts concerning sacrifices, according to their times, comforting themselves with the saying of H O S E E, We will sacrifice the calves of our lippes. Then repeate they an Historie of Sacrifice, and a Prayer of the vse of the Law, and how many wayes it may be expounded. This done, they (with a still voice that none can heare) pray for the reedifying of the Temple, in these words; Let thy will bee before thy face, O God our Lord, Lord of our Fathers, that the holy house of thy Temple may be restored to our dayes, and grant vs thy will in thy Law. After, rising with great ioy and clamour, they sing a prayer of prayse in hope hereof; and sitting downe againe, they reade a long prayer, gathered heere and there out of the Psalmes: and some whole Psalmes, and part of 1. Chronic. 30. and lastly, the last words of Obadia, 9 The Sanitours shall ascend into Mount Sion, to indge the Mount of Esau, and the Kingdome shall be the Lords. Which they speake in hope of the destruction of the Christians, whom they call Edomites, and of their owne restitution. (In some of their close Writings, which they will not suffer to come into the hands of Christians, they say that the ioule of Edom entered into the bodie of Christ, and that both hee and wee are no better then Esau.) The proceed * singing, And God shall bee King over all the earth: in that day God shall be one, and his name one, as it is written in thy Law, O G O D, Heare Israel, G O D O U R G O D I S O N E G O D: And these words in their next prayer they repeat, resounding that last word: One by the halfe or whole houre together, looking vp to Heauen: and when they come to the last letter thereof, Daleth, d, they all turne their heads to the foure corners and windes of the World, signifying that God is King of the whole world: hauing in the word, echad, many superfluous subtilties: that the letter Daleth in regard of his place in the Alphabet, signifieth foure, and the word echad two hundred forty and five, whereunto adding haselebechem emes, God your Lord is true, they take vp the number of three hundred fortie and eight, and so many members there are in mans bodie: for euery member, a prayer secures them all. And this verse thrice recited, secureth against the ill spirit. They esteeme it a holy prayer, by which miracles may be wrought, and therefore vse it morning and euening. They haue another prayer called Schone esre, that is, eightene, because it containeth so many thanksgiuings, which they say twice a day, and the chiefe chanter of the Synagogue singeth it twice by himselfe. They thinke by this prayer to obtaine remission of their finnes. They must pray it standing so, that one foot must not stand more on the ground then the other, like the Angell, * And their foot was a right foot. When they come to those words in it, holy, holy, holy, Lord God of hosts; they leape vp three times aloft. And he (say their bachamin) which speaketh a word during this prayer, shall haue burning coales giuen him to eate after his death. These eightene thanksgiuings, are for the eightene bones in the chine or backebone, which must in saying hereof be bended.

After this followeth a prayer against the Iewes revolted to Christianitie, and against all Christians, saying; Those which are blotted out (that is, revolters) shall haue no more hope, and all vnbeleeuers shall perish in the twinkling of an eye, and all thine enemies which hate thee, O God, shall be destroyed, and the proud and presumptuous Kingdome shall quickly be rooted out, broken, laid euen with the ground, and at last shall utterly perish, and thou shalt make them presently in our dayes obedient to vs. Blessed art thou God, which breakest and subduest them which are rebellious. They call the Turkish Empire the Kingdome of Ismael; the Roman, Edomiticall, proud, &c. They are * themselves indeed exceeding proud, impatient, and desirous of reuenge. The Talmud saith, That the lying spirit in the mouth of Achab's Prophets, which perswaded him to go and fall at Ramoth Gilead, was none other but the spirit of * Naboth, whom he had before slaine. And * Vilior Carbenus, a Christian Jew, testifieth, That there are not vnder Heauen a more quarrellsome people, themselves acknowledging the Christians far meeke then themselves: when they haue this prouerb, that the modestie of the Christians, the wisdome and industrie of the Heathens, and faith of the Iewes, are the three pillars which sustaine the world.

But to reture to their deuotions: After those other before mentioned, followeth a prayer for the good sort, for proselytes, reedifying of the Temple, for sending the Messias, and restauration of their Kingdome. In the end they pray God to keepe them in peace, and when they come to these words, He that make peace aboue, shall make peace onet

Other their niceties in praying, as laying the right-hand on the left ouer the heart; not spetting nor breaking winde vp or downe; not (interrupted by a King) to rease prayer; to shake his bodie this way and that way; not to touch his naked bodie; and to say Amen, with all his heart: for they that say Amen, are worthy to say it in the world to come. And therefore David endeth a Psalm with Amen, Amen: signifying, that one is to be said heere, and the other in the other world: also in a plaine eminent place, purged from all filth, freed from the sight of women, his face to the East, standing, his feete close together, fixing his eyes on the ground, eleuating the heart to heauen, &c. I hold it enough thus to mention.

Their praying to the East must be vnderstood from our Westerne parts, because Ierusalem standeth that way: for otherwise Romans sheweth that Abraham prayed in Mount Moriah toward the West; and the Sanctum Sanctorum was in the West, which place also Abraham set forth and determined. And because the Gentiles worshipped the Sunne toward the rising, therefore Abraham worshipped Westward, and appointed the Sanctuarie so to stand. The Talmud saith, Praying to the South bringeth wisdom; toward the North, riches.

I might here also adde their Letanie and Commemoration of their Saints almost after the Popish fashion. As thus for a taste. We haue sinned before thee, haue mercie on vs. O Lord doe it for thy names sake, and spare Israel thy people. Lord doe it for (Abraham) thy perfect one, and spare Israel thy people. Lord, doe it for him which was bound in thy porches (to wit, in Mount Moriah, where the Temple was afterward builded) and spare Israel thy people. Lord, doe it for him which was heard in the ladder (Jacob) from thy high place, and spare Israel thy people. Lord, doe it for the merit of Ioseph thy holy one, &c. Lord, doe it for him which was drawne out of the waters (Moses) and spare &c. Lord, doe it for (Aaron) the Priest, with Urim and Thummim. Lord, grant it for him that was zealous for thy name (Phineas). Lord, doe it for the sweet Singer (David). Lord, doe it for him which builded thine house. They name not any, but expresse him after this sort. And then proceed in like manner, with the titles, attributes, and workes of God. Doe it for thy name, Doe it for thy goodness, for thy couenant, thy law, thy glory, &c. in seuerall verses. And then to their Saints in a new passage. Doe it for Abraham, Isaac and, Jacob. Doe it for Moses and Aaron, for David and Salomon (as if their combined forces should effect more then single) Doe it for Ierusalem the holy Citie, for Sion, for the destruction of thy House, for the poore Israelites, for the bare Israelites, for the miserable Israelites, for the widowes and Orphans, for the sucking and wained; and if not for our sake, yet for thine owne sake. Then in another forme, Thou which hearest the poore, heare vs: thou which hearest the oppressed, heare vs: Thou which heardest Abraham, &c. With renewing a commemoration of their Saints larger then before: and (after some repeating the diuinites) in another tune they oppose their Saints and wicked ones together: as Remember not the lie of Achan, but remember Iosua, forgiving him, and remember Heli and Samuel, and so on in a tedious length.

CHAP. XVI.

Hus haue we seene the Iewish Mattins, which they chant (saith <sup>a</sup> another) in a strange wilde hallowing tune, imitating sometimes trumpets and one ecchoing to the other, and winding vp by degrees from a soft and silent whispering, to the highest and lowest Notes, that their voices will beare, with much varietie of gesture: kneeling they vse none, no more then do the Græcians: they burne Lampes: but for shew of Deuotion or Elevation of spirit, that yet in Iewes could I neuer discerne: for they are reuerend in their Synagogues, as Grammar boyes are at Schoole, when their Master is absent. In summe, their holinesse is the very outward worke it selfe, being a brainelasse head, and a soulelesse bodie. Meane-while, the good-wife at home, against her husbands returne, sweepeth the house that nothing may disturbe his holy cogitations, and layeth him a booke on the table, either the Pentateuch of Moses, or a booke of Manners, to read therein the space of an houre, before he goeth out of the house about his businesse. This studie is required of euery deuout Iew, either in his owne house, or else in their Schoole or Synagogue. And being thus come home, they lap vp their Tephillin in a Chest; first that of the head, then that of the hand.

They account it healthfull also to eate somewhat in the morning before they go to worke: for whereas there are threescore and three diseases of the gail, a bit of bread, or a draught of wine can cure them all. About eleuen of clocke his wife hath prepared his dinner, pure meats, purely dressed: but if she haue pullen or cattell, she must first feed them. For it is said, <sup>b</sup> I will giue grasse in thy field for thy cattell, and thou shalt eate and be satisfied: you see, the Cattell are first mentioned. And to keepe such Domesticall cattell, is good in respect of the disastorous motions of the Planets, which must some way fort to effect. But if they be studious of almes, and good workes, then Saphyra Rabba the great Chancellor (some Angell) according to his office, regiteth the same, and commendeth them vnto God saying, Turne away that planetarie misfortune from such a one, for he hath done these and these good workes. And then doth it befall some wicked man, or else some of the Cattell. Before they come to the table, they must make triall againe in the priuie what they can doe: for it is written, <sup>c</sup> Thou shalt carry out the old, because of the new. Especially let there be cleane water, wherein the household must first wash, then the wife, and lastly the good-man, who, presently without touching or speaking ought else, might more purely giue thanks. He (saith R. Iose in the <sup>d</sup> Talmud) that eateth with vnwasht hands, is, as he that lieth with an Harlot, for it is written: <sup>e</sup> For the strange woman a man commeth to a morsell of bread. They must wash before meat and after, so strictly, that they may not keep on a Ring on their finger, for feare of some vncleannesse remaining vnder it. I had rather (saith R. Akiba) die for thirst, then neglect this washing tradition of the Elders: when he had onely so much water brought him into prison, as might serue him but to one vse of washing or drinking, at his owne choise.

On the Table cleanly spread, must be set a whole loafe well baked; and the salt, and then the housholder or the chiefeest Rabbi at Table taketh the loafe into his hands, and in the cleaneft and best baked part thereof, maketh a cut into it, and then setting it downe, and spreading his hands on it, saith, Blessed art thou Lord God, King of the world, who bringest bread out of the earth: and then breaketh off that peece of bread which he had cut before, and dipping it into the salt or broth, eateth it, without speaking a word for if he speake, hee must say ouer his grace againe: After this, hee taketh the loafe, and cutteth for the rest. Then he taketh a cup of wine * (if they haue any) with both hands, and with the right-hand holdeth it vp a handfull higher then the table, and looking stedfastly on the cup, saith, Blessed &c. who hast made the fruit of the Vine. Ouer water they pronounce no blessing: and if there be not three at least at the Table, each man must blesse for himselfe: if three or more, the rest say, Amen. Salt is religiously set on in remembrance of the sacrifices. If when they cut, they should cut off the peece of bread, it would offend God. Both hands they spread ouer the Loafe in memorie of the ten Commandements, which God hath published concerning Wheate, of which bread is made. The bread must be had in speciall honor, no vessell supported with it, or set vpon it: and a spirit called Nabal giueth attendance, as deputed to obserue such as (through negligence) treade it vnder soote, and to bring them into povertie: and another man (dogged by this spirit, which sought to bring him to povertie) eating victuals one day on the grasse in the field, the spirit hoped to effect his purpose: but this deuout Iew, after he had eaten, pared away the grasse, and threw it with the crummes scattered into it, into the Sea for the fishes, and presently heard a voice, saying, Woe is me foole, who haue attended to punish this man, & cannot haue occasion. They dreame that Elias and euery mans proper Angel attendeth at table; to heare what is said, if they talke of the Law: otherwise an ill Angell commeth and causeth bralles and diseases: and in respect of these spirituall attendants, they cast not their bones beside or behind them. They are curious not to eate flesh and fish together: but first flesh, and then scoure their teeth from the flesh, and eat a bit of bread, and drinke a draught of drinke, before they eat the fish. They must not vse the same knife to meats made of milk, which they vsed in eating flesh. Milke must not stand on the table with flesh, nor touch it.

Besides the 23. Psalme set before them in the meale time, they testifie their deuotion by multitudes of new graces or thankesgivinges, if any better wine or dainties be set before them, yea besides the particulars of their cates, euen for euery good sent, as of Oyle, Roses, Spices, &c. and are of opinion, that to vse any thing without thankesgiving is to vsurpe and steale it. Let this be spoken to the shame of many *profane Esau*s with vs, that will rather sell Gods blessings for their meat, then seeke them to their meate: although in them the painment of these by tale, and not by weight is no better then a beast's supposition. They make a religion of leauing some leauings of their bread on the table: but to leaue a knife there were dangerous, euer since that a Iew once in the rehearsing that part of their grace after meat, which concerneth the reedifying of Ierusalem, in a deepe agonie tooke his knife so left, and thrust into his heart. This their grace is long, containing a commemoration of the benefites vouchsafed their fore-fathers, & a prayer for regranting the same: to send Elias, and the Messias: & that they may not be brought to beg or borrow of the Christians: & for his blessing vpon all of that house, &c. wherunto is answered with a loud voice, Amen: and they say to themselves: Fearre the Lord ye his Saints, for they that feare him haue no want: the Lions lacke and suffer hunger, but they which seeke the Lord shall want nothing that is good: and while this is said, there must not a crumme be left in their mouthes. The prayers must be in that place where they haue eaten: or else they shall lose the benefit of buriall: and a certaine deuout Iew in the field, remembering that he had forgotten his grace, returned backe to the house, and there performing his duty, had maraculously sent vnto him a doue of gold.

In cities where are Synagogues, about five in the afternoone their h Cleark (or some such office) goeth about, & with knocking at their dores, giues them notice of euening prayer: thither being come, they sit downe and say this prayer (of the first word, called Afchre.) i. Blessed are they which dwell in thy house praying thee continually, Selah. Blessed are the people that are thus, blessed are the people whose God is the Lord, I will magnifie thee O God my King, &c. all that 145. Psalme throughout: he which saith this Psalme thrice a day shall haue his portion in eternall life. Then the chiefe Chorister or Chanter, singeth halfe their prayer called Kaddesch: and then all say those eighreene praises mentioned in Morning Prayer. Then goeth their Chorister out of his pulpit, and kneeleth downe vpon the steps before the Arke, and falleth downe with his face on his left hand (all the people doing likewise) saying, O mercifull and gracious God, I haue sinned in thy sight, but thou art full of mercy: be mercifull vnto me, and receiue my prayer proceeding from an humble heart. Reprone mee not O Lord in thy wrath, nor correct mee in thine anger, and so proceedeth through that whole sixt Psalme: his countenance covered and inclined to the ground. This is done in imitation<sup>k</sup> of Ioshua. Then the Pracenor or chiefe Chorister againe rising vp saith, And we know not what to doe, burth that we direct our eyes vnto thee. And then they say vp the other halfe of their Kaddesch, and so endeth their Euen-song.

Now should they goe home, and after supper returne to performe their Night deuotions: but because a full belly would rather be at rest, and might easily forget his duty, after some pawse and stay, they proceede before they goe to their other taske: and in that time of pawling between their vespers and nocturnes, if there be any strife between any, and reconciliation cannot be made, then he which cannot reconcile his neighbour, goeth to the common prayer-booke, and shutting it, knocketh thereon with his hand, saying anikelao, I conclude the businesse; as if he should say, I conclude praying till mine aduersarie be reconciled to me: vntill which thing be effected they may not pray further: and so sometimes their prayers are intermitted then and diners daies together, if one party will be stubborne. These prayers are for substance much like the former: as against the Christians, and for their owne restitution by their Messias. They depart out of the Synagogue with repetition of those sentences mentioned in the former Chapter.

At Supper they behaue themselves as at Dinner. Going to bed they put off the left shooe before the right; their shirt they put off, when they are colered in their beds, for feare of the walls beholding their nakednes. He that maketh water naked in his chamber shall be a poore man: and the prayer,<sup>l</sup> Heare Israel, must be his last words on his bed, and sleeping on the same, as in Psal. 4. 5. Speake in your heart on your bed, and be silent. Selah. If he cannot by and by sleepe, he must repeat it till he can; and so his sleep shall proue good to him. The bed must be pure: for how else should they think on the name of God? And it must be so placed, that they must lie with their heads to the South, their feet toward the North, for by this meanes they shall be fruitfull in male children. They haue also their Chamber Morals, instructing of duties betwixt the man and wife, vnto meet for sober and chaste eares. Tis time for our pen to sleepe with them, and end this Chapter.

CHAP. XVII.

Hitherto haue we heard of their prayers euery day obserued. They haue also their times designed to the reading of the Law. In the<sup>m</sup> Talmud is reported, that Ezra in the Babylonian captiuitie was Authour vnto the Lewes of ten Commandements. First, that on the Sabbath: secondly on Munday and Thursday, with singular solemnitie, some part of the Law should be read: thirdly, that Thursday should be Court or law-day for deciding controuersies: fourthly, that it should be a day of washing, sweeping, and cleansing in honour of the Sabbath: fifthly, that men should then eate Leekes: the sixt, seuenth, eight, and ninth are of womens baking, clothing, combing, battering: the last is of cleansing after vnclane issues. Their learned men confirme this institution of Ezra, by authority of scripture,<sup>n</sup> They went three daies in the desert, & found no waters. By waters they vnderstand the Law. For so it is said, Esay 55. 1. Come ye to the waters: that is, to the Law: and therefore they ought not to let three daies passe without some solemn reading of the Law. Munday, and Thursday are chosen to be the daies, because on<sup>o</sup> Thursday Moses went the second time into the Mount, and returned with the two Tables on the Munday, on which day<sup>p</sup> also the Temple was destroyed, and the Law burnt.

This their deuotion is as ancient, as that Pharisee, Luk. 18. I fast twice in the weeke; that<sup>q</sup> which the most deuout amongst them doe to this day obserue. Yea it seemeth the deuouter sort fast foure daies, saith<sup>r</sup> another, on Munday, Tuseday, Wednesday and Thursday, the first for Mariners and traouellers by sea, the next for such as passe thorow desert places, the third for children which are troubled with the squinancie: (of this Eliu Lenita<sup>s</sup> testifieth, that after the beginning of the world it first assailed children, and after that men; so that sometimes when they neezed, their spirit fled away and they died, whence came that custome of saluting and praying well to men in neezing. The strangling of Achitophel, they also inteprete of this neezing farewell. The fourth dayes fast is for women which are with childe or giue sucke: but the Tuesday and Wednesday in likelihood were not ordinary, as the other. Sunday might not be thus honoured being the Christian Sabbath; and Friday was the preparatiue to their owne. Those two dayes are generally halfe holy dayes. Assembling early in their Synagogues, besides their ordinary prayers they annex many other. Among others they vse one Prayer called Vebn rachû, of miraculous effect, as appeared in Vespasians time, who committing three ships full of Iewes, without Oare or Marriner to the wide Seas, which arriued in three seuerall regions, Louanda, Arlado, Burdeli (worke for Geographers): Those which arined in this last port, by tyrannicall Edict of the King, were to be tryed whether they were true Iewes, as Hananiah, Misael, and Azarias made proofe of their Religion. Whereupon three dayes being required (as they said Nabuchadnezzar had granted them) wherein to betake themselves to fasting and prayer: in this time of despite three deuoute Iewes, Ioseph, Beniamin, and Samuel, inuented each of them a prayer, which they ioyned into one, and continued in praying, the same three dayes, at the end whereof they cast themselves into the fire, and there continued til it was consumed. Hence arose this ordinance euery Munday and Thursday to vse the same prayer, which is this; And he is mercifull, and pardoning sinne doth not destroy the sinner. He often turneth his anger from vs, and doth not kindle all his wrath. Thou, O my God, suffer me not to want thy mercy: let thy gentlenesse and truth keepe me alwayes. Helpe vs, O God, our God, and gather vs from the Gentiles, &c. for their restitution, as in other their prayers and destruction of their enemies, the Christians. After this they prostrate themselves on their faces (as beefore) with many other orisons to the like effect.

Their solemne ceremonie of the Lawe-lecture followeth; In all<sup>d</sup> their Synagogues they haue the fise bookes of Mosés, written in great letters on Parchments of Calueskins, sowed together in length, which at both ends are fastened to pieces of wood, by which the book may be lifted and carried. This book is kept in an Arke or Chest set in som wall of the Synagogue. Before the doors of the Ark is a hanging of Tapestry, more or lesse precious, according to the qualitie of their Feasts, & for the most part wrought with Bird-worke. The booke is wrapped in a linnen cloth, wrought with Hebrew wordes: without that is hanged about some other cloth of Linnen, Silke, Veluet or Golde, to which is fastened a plate of Siluer by a chaine of Golde, vpon the which is written, the crowne of the Law, or holinesse of the Lord. Then goeth one about, crying, Who will buy e Gellah et z chajm. This is an office whereby they are authorized to handle those pieces of wood, and to open the book of the Law. He which giueth most for it, hath it: the money is reserued for the poore. The pieces of wood are called et z chajm, tree of life, according to Salomon: Wisedome is a tree of life to them that lay holde thereon. When the chiefe chanter hath taken out the booke, and goeth with it into the Pulpit, they all sing out of Num. 10. 35. Arise O Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered, and let them that hate thee flee before thee: and out of Esay 2. 3. Many people shall goe and say, Come, let vs ascend to the mount of the Lord, to the house of the God of Iacob, and he shall teach vs his wayes, and we will walke in his pathes; for the Law shall goe out of Sion, and the word of the Lord from Ierusalem. When this Pracantor layeth the booke on his arme, he saith, h Magnifie the Lord with me, and let vs exalt his name together: to which all the people answer, Exalt ye the Lord our God, and bow before his foot-stoole, for it is holy: exalt ye the Lord our God, and bow to the mountaine of his holinesse, for Iehonah our God is holy. There, vpon a Table couered with silke, hee layeth downe the booke; and he which hath bought the Office, taketh from it the clothes wherein it is wrapped. Then these two call some one of the Congregation by his own and his fathers name, who commeth forth and kisseth the book, not on the bare Parchment (for that were a sinne) but on the clothes which couer it; and taking it by those pieces of wood, saith aloude, Praise the Lord, &c. Blessed be thou O Lord, who hast chosen vs before any other people, and giuen vs thy Law. Blessed be thou, O God, the Law-giuer. Then the Pracantor readeth a chapter out of the booke; and then he which

which was called forth, with like kissing and blessing returneth. Then another is called forth, and doth likewise. After him another, who had need be of strong armes: for he listeth vp and carrieth this booke that all may see it, all crying, This is the Law which Moses gaue to the Israelites. This Office is called Hagbabah, and is solde as the former. The women meane while contend amongst themselves in this Synagogue by some Lattice to haue a sight of the Law: for the women haue a Synagogue apart seuered with Lattices so, besides their pretence of modestie, to fulfill the saying of Zacharie,<sup>k</sup> The family of David shall mourne apart, and their wines apart, &c. If he which carrieth the booke should stumble or fall, it were ominous, and should portend much euill. These two Officers fould vp the booke as before; and then come all and kisse the same, and then it is carried to his place with singing. After this they end their Prayers as at other times, saying, Lord leade me in thy righteousness, because of mine enemies, direct thy way before me: and, The Lord keepe my going out and coming in from henceforth for euer. Which they also say when they goe forth on a journey or to worke.

apart from the
k Zach. 12. 1.

They prepare* themselves to the obseruation of their Sabbath, by diligent prouision on the Friday before night of the best meates well dressed; especially the women provide them good Cakes. They honour the Sabbath with three bankets: first, on the Friday night when their Sabbath beginneth, another on the Sabbath day at noone: the third before sunne-set. <sup>l</sup> Eate ye it to day, to day is the Sabbath of the Lord, to day ye shall not finde it (Manna) in the field: do you not see To day thrice mentioned, and therefore by Moses owne ordaining, that Manna must so often be eaten on the Sabbath? The richest Jewes and most learned Rabbins, disdain not some or other office, as chopping of hearbs, kindling the fire or somewhat toward this preparation. The table remaineth covered all that night and day. They wash, and if neede be, shauē their heads on the Friday, and very religiously cut their nailes, beginning with the fourth finger of the left hand, and next with the second, then with the fist, thence to the third, and last to the thumme, still leaping ouer one; in the right hand they begin with the second finger, and after proceede to the fourth, and so forth. These parings if they treade vnder foot, it is a greater sinne; but he which burieth them is a iust man, or which burneth them. Now must they also whet their kniues and put on their Sabbath-holy day-ayment to salute Malebah the Queene; so they terme the Sabbath. The Clarke goeth about and giueth warning of the Sabbath; and when the Sunne is now ready to set, the women light their Sabbath-Lampes in their dining roomes, and stretching out their handes toward it, say ouer a blessing. If they cannot see the Sunne, they take warning by the Hens flying to roost. The cause why the women now and at other feasts light the Lampes is Magistrally determined by the<sup>m</sup> Rabbins, because that Eue caused her husband to sin, yea, with a cudgell be-laboured him, and compelled him to eate, which they gather out of his wordes.<sup>n</sup> The woman gaue me of the tree (to wit, a sound rib-roasting) and I did eate. Now after they had eaten, the sunne which before shined, as it shall doe in the other life, diminished his light, and for dimming that light she lightens this. And for three causes (you shall beleue their<sup>o</sup> Talmud) women die in trauell; for forgetting their dough wherewith to make Cakes with Oyle, Ex. 25. for neglecting their termes; and not lighting the Sabbath-Lampes, which their Cabalists gather out of the three letters of the name of Eue or Chanah. These lights are two or more, according to the condition of the roomes.

* This preparation of Parasceue they obserue before the Sabbath, and other feasts. Tertullian calls them cena pura.

They begin their Sabbath thus soone, and end it also later, then the iust time, in commiseration of the purgatory-soules, which begin and end with them this Sabbath-rest, being the whole weeke besides tormented in that fire. Indas himselfe, in honour of the Christian Sabbath, from Saturday Euen-song obtained like priuiledge: witness S. Brandon in the legend (can you refuse him?) who found him cooling himselfe in the Sea, sitting vpon a stone which he had sometime remoued out of a place, where it was needlesse, into the high-way. (So meritorious euen in Indas is any the least good worke.) There did Indas acquaint Brandon with this Sunday-refreッシング of the hellish prisoners, and desired his holy company to scarre away the diuels, when they should after Sunday Euen-song come to fetch him againe, which for that time Brandon granted and performed.

The Jewes will not quite emptie any place of water, that on the Sabbath these fiery soules may finde where to coole them. Two Angels attend them home from the Synagogue, one good, and the other euill, which if they finde all things well, that is, lewisly prepared for the Sabbath honor, the good Angell saith it shall be for the next Sabbath, and the euill Angell (will he, will he) answereth, Amen. If otherwise, the good Angell is forced to say Amen to the euill Angels denunciation of the contrary. They feast it with much ceremonie, pronouncing their blessing on the wine: with looking on the Lamp, to repaire that fiftieth part of their eye-sight, which they say in the week time ordinarily is waisted: they couer the bread, meane-while, that it should not see the shame thereof, in that the Wine is blessed, for the Sabbath vsf before it. This good cheere on the Sabbath is of such consequence, that for this cause in their 9 Talmud is reported, that a Butcher in Cyprus, which still reserued his best meates for the Sabbath, grew by Diuine reward so rich, that his Table and all his Table-furniture were of gold. You may receiue with like credite the Legend of Ioseph following, who buying continually the best Fish, to honour the Sabbath with it, found in the belly of one of these Sabbath-fishes, a Hat-band of Pearles, worth no lesse then a Kingdome. The Table remaineth spread till the next night. The Lampes must not be put out, nor the light thereof applyed to the killing of fleas, to reading or writing, &c. The good man must honour that night with more kindnesse to his wife, then on other nights: therfore eate they Leekes before: therfore they marry on the Sabbath: and the children, then conceiued, must needes be * wise and fortunate. If a Jew trauell, and on Friday euening be further from his home, then a Sabbath. dayes-journey, he must there abide, be it in the midst of a Wood or Wildernesse, till the Sabbath be past. They sleepe longer on the Sabbath morning; so with their greater pleasure to honour it. They then vsf more prayers in their Synagogues; and reade seuen Lectures of the Law. They now also reade the Prophets. They stay here till noone and no longer, least by longer fasting and praying they should breake the Prophetically commandement, Thou shalt call my Sabbath a delight. After dinner also they reade in their Law: for on a time, the Sabbath and the Law put vp their complaints to God for want of a companion and learner, and the Israelites were giuen as a companion to the Sabbath, and on the Sabbath a learner of the Law. But for all this they talke not more busily all the weeke through of Vsurie, buying and selling, then on the Sabbath, and haue their trickes to decoue God Almighty. Their Euen-song they haue soone done, that they might returne, and while the day yet lasteth, make an end of their third banquet, by which they are secured against hell and against Gog and Magog: They conclude it with blessings and singings, till it be late, to prolong the returne of the soules into Hell: for presently after they haue ended, there is proclamation through hell, to recall them to their dungeons. In these Songs they call vpon Elias to come; so iustly are they deluded, who scoffingly imputed vnto Christ the calling of Elias. But their Elias being busie (as he sometime said of Ababs Baal) and not comming, then they request him, to come the next Sabbath. But he (it seemeth) is loath to leaue his place vnder the Tree of life in Paradise; where he standeth (say they) enrolling their good workes in the keeping of the Sabbath. When this their deuotion is done, the women in haste run to draw water, because the Fountaine of Miriam, Num. 20. flowing into the Sea of Tiberias, doth from thence emptie it selfe in the end of the Sabbath into all Fountaines, and is very medicinal. After this doe the Jewes make a diuision betwene the Sabbath and the new weeke. The Housholder lighteth a great Candle, called The Candle of Distinction: whose light he vieweth his walls, a blessing a cup of Wine, and a little silver boxe full of sweet spices, poureth a little of the Wine on the ground, and applyeth the boxe to euery ones nose to smell to, thus to remedie the stinke, which is caused at the new opening of hell for the returne of the soules: or else to keepe them from swowning at the departure of one of their soules. For they are of opinion, that themselves haue a superfluous Sabbatharie soule, which on that day is plentifully sent in to them, to enlarge their heart, and to expell care and sorrow. Antonius Margarita affirmeth, that they dreame of three soules in each man, besides the Sabbatharie soule, two of which leaue him in his sleepe, one mounting to Heauen, where it learneth things to come; the other ther called brutish, contemplating sinne and vanitie. The viewing of their nailes at the candle, is in remembrance of Adams nakednesse, all fauing where the nailes covered his fingers and toes ends. The wine they poure on the ground, to refresh Corah and his complices vnder the ground.

For their Sabbath-workes they are determined Rabbinically: a horse may haue a halter, or a bridle to leade, but not a saddle to lade him: and he that leadeh him, must not let it hang so loose, that it may seeme he rather carrieth it, then leadeh the horse: a Henne may not weare her hose sowed about her legge, but this marke must on friday be taken off. And if any cattell fall into a pit, yet may they not helpe it out on the Sabbath: so spitefully haue their Talmudicall Rabbins endeouored to make (where they could not finde) a falshood in the wordes of Christ, testifying the contrary; But from the beginning it was not thus. The Iew may not milke his cattell, nor eate of the milke when he hath procured a Christian to milke them, except he first buy it but at his owne price. A Taylor may not weare a needle sticking on his garment. The lame may vse a staffe: the blinde may not. Clogges or Pattens to keepe them out of the dirt they may not burden themselues with. It is lawfull to carrie a plaister on their sores, but if it fall off, they may not lay it on againe; nor may they binde vp a wound anew; nor carrie money in their purses or garments; nor rubbe their durtie shooes against the ground, though they may wipe it off against a wall; nor wipe their hands, fouled with dirt, on a Towell, but with a Cowes or Horse-raile they may doe it. If a flea bite, he may remoue it, but not kill it; a lowfebe may. But their Doctors disagree in this lowfe question: for R. Eliezer saith, One may as well kill a Camell. If a flie light on meate, or a spider run thereon, it may not be remoued: they will let men rake their money vpon pawnes, but not deliuer it themselues; as the Franciscan hath his boy to take your almes, which his vow will not suffer his holy fingers to touch. Hee must take heede of leauing more corne to fowles that day then they shall eate, if it be in an open place, lest it may there grow, and he be said to sowe corne on the Sabbath. To whistle tune with his mouth, or play it on an instrument, is vnlawfull; as also to knocke with the ring or hammer of a doore, and therefore the Clarke knocks with his hand when he calleth them to the Synagogue. To knocke on a Table to still a childe; to draw a Letter in dust or ashes, or a moistned Table, is vnlawfull; in the ayre not so. Of these Sabbath-labours they haue nine and thirtie chiefe Articles: whereto the smaller (as these) are referred, with much ridiculous nicetie, as the first Article is of tilling ground, wherein is reserued digging, filling vp ditches, &c. and to this, going ouer a fallow, rubbing his durtie shooe on the ground, &c. This time this ditch be now filled, and we proceed further.

CHAP. XVIII.

For the Iewish Feasts, as they were celebrated before the comming of Christ, we haue already spoken. In these dayes they blindly and stubbornly persist in like Observation of times, though with some variation of ceremony. Their Talmud reckoneth foure New-yeares daies; besides the former<sup>d</sup> in March and September, whereof we haue spoken, the first of August beginneth their yeare of breeding cattell, accounting from thence their time of tything. In Ianuarie the first, or, as R. Hillel would haue it, the fifteenth began their new yeare for trees, in reckoning the time of lawfulness to eate or tythe their fruit. Their months and moueable feasts are guided by the Moon: of which they tell this storie; The Moone, say they, expostulated with God, because the Sunne shined with her, whereas no Kingdome could endure a partner: whereat God being angrie, darkned her light, that from the fourth day wherein she was created till man was made on the sixth, she shined not. Hence it comes to passe, that at the change in two dayes space she is neuer seene. This is the Rabbinicall custome, if they cannot vnyte the knot, they haue (not a cutting-sword, as Alexander for that Gordian) but some leaden Legend or fable Rabbinic-all-ly to determine it. Hieronimus à Jude (who about two hundred yeares since was the Popes Physitian, and turned from Iudaisme to Christianity) thus relateth it: The Moone, before equall with the Sunne, postulated with God for the reason aboue recited, and therefore was commanded to goe lessen her selfe. She (like some shrewish Iewesse) replied, she had wrong, and had spoken but reason; he to satisfie her, said, the Sunne should not shine by night, and yet should she appeare in the day. What, saith she, is a candle before the Sunne? He then promised that his people Israel should obserue their solemne festiuals, according to her designement. But when all this would not content her, as yeelding himselfe guiltie he enioyned a pecaliar meat-offering every New-Moone, for indulgence of that sinne. Thus doe they both dreame ridiculously, and blaspheme also beyond all names of impietie, in their Talmudicall Tract Holyn. And this they proue out of Num. 18. as truly, as in another place out of Es. 40. that God hauing polluted himselfe with burying of Moses, purged himselfe with fire; the water not being sufficient thereto.

f Their order of celebrating the Passconer at this day, g Thus curious were the Roman women in the rites of Bona Dea, nor leauing a Mouse-hole vnsearched, lest some male mouse might marre the solemnity.

The richer Iewes prepare thirtie dayes before for their Passconer (dentes mentem) good Wheat for their vnleauened Cakes. The Sabbath before the Passconer is solemne and sacred, wherein they haue a Sermon concerning the Paschall Lambe. Two or three dayes before the Passconer, they scowre their housholde implements, of Wood and Mettall, with much curiositie and varietie of Rites. For he that in this Feast vseth an impure vessell, is as hee that hath laine by an vnleane woman. The night before the Feast, the goodman of the house with a Waxe Candle, a Dish, and Wing, beginneth his search for vnleauened bread; and with other men or boyes to helpe him, after their Amen to his blessing, with Waxe Candles in their handes, they leaue not a Mouse-hole vnsearched, and hide that bread which they meane to eat that night, lest they should finde that, and be forced to burne it. That which they finde, they curiously couer, lest some Mouse by carrying it, should make them haue new worke: and for this cause suppe also in a corner, with great care that nothing fall to the ground. When he hath ended his search, Whatsoeuer Leauen (saith he) is vnder mine handes, which I haue not seene, let it be tossed too and fro, like the dust of the earth. In the morning they make their vnleauened Cakes of meale, grownd three dayes at least. The kneading-trough must be lined with Linnen, lest some of the leauened Meale should cleaue thereto. The goodman himselfe must draw the liquor that it is kneaded with, and that at Sunne-setting. The Cakes are made with as much scruple, round, and pricked full of holes in a colde place, &c. to keepe them from leauening. They eat little, and the first-borne nothing, till night, that then they may haue the better Paschall-stomacke. At the Euen-song they obserue much-what the same ceremonies, as at the Sabbath. They make at home the fairest shew of their plate and riches, and seate themselves on Chaires (as it were) of State, and account now of themselves as great Lords, triumphing ouer their late Egyptian seruitude; at their returne from the Synagogue they haue a Dish with three Cakes set before them, representing the high Priest, the Tribe of Leui, and the people of Israel: another Dish hath in it a loine of Lambe or Kidde, with a hard egge: another containeth a Gallimawfrey of Apples, Nuts, Figges, Almonds, &c. dressed with Wine in Bricke-fashion (with Cinnamon strewed on it, in remembrance of the Egyptian Fornace). They haue also a Sallet of hearbes and a Sawcer of Vineger set on the Table. Then sit they down, and euery one (to the child in the Cradle) hath his cup filled with wine. And here with a carowse after a blessing begins the feast, with a scrupulous vse of these things mentioned: then followeth the supper it selfe, with much riot til midnight, with such cheere as they haue, with diuers ceremonies, cursing their enemies, calling for Elias, praying for the redifying of the Temple; vsing many Diuine Attributes, as, Mercifull God, Great God, Bountifull God, High God, Faire God, Sweet God, Mightie God, and God of the Iewes, now build thy Temple shortly, very soone, very soone, in our dayes, very soone, very soone. Now build, now build, now build, now build, now build thy Temple quickly; quickly; Strong God, living God, &c. ouer and ouer with such battologies. This night they thinke themselves secure against men and Diuels; they leaue their doores open all night to entertaine Elias; and one to their solace playeth Elias in a white linnen garment. Each man drinketh foure cups full of the blessed wine, in regard of foure deliuerances, which the Rabbins finde in Exod. 6. ver. 6. 7. The ceremonies of Moses they are not ryed to (forsooth) because they are not in Canaan.

In the morning they visite the Synagogue with their Sabbath-rites. They bring two Bookes out of the Arke, and call forth fise men (and if this feast be on the Sabbath, seuen) to reade out of the same. Nice are their determinations what workes they may doe on this day, and what not: they may dresse no more meat then is this day eaten. If they beate spice, the mortar must lie side-wise, for distinctions sake of the day, &c. fasting and weeping must be auoided; if any farse a Henne, the needle must be threaded the day before, and the threed must be burned, not bitten or broken asunder. In such trifles the Schoole of Schammai licenseth to eate the same day an egge laide on a festiual day. Hillel denies it, and betwixt them they haue set the Rabbins by the eares, in this and such profane questions. Their Euen-song hath a short dispatch: and then the next day they reiterate the same ceremonies, and that for certainty, because they doubt of the first day of the moneth, and therefore obserue two. The foure daies following are halfe-holy daies. Some workes may be done in them, and not some, and what they doe (to make a difference) must be done otherwise, as writing crooked, &c. and that which cannot without losse be deferred, may now be done. The seuenth day they obserue in more compleate holinesse, and the eight too, for the reason before alleadged, to be more secure of the true day. After the feast ended, they satisfie with fasting their feasting-riots, & that on two Mundaies and one Thursday: vnto the three and thirtieth day after, they are sad and heauie in remembrance of R. Akiba, of whose Disciples foure and twentie thousand died in that space, and were buried by women in the night, and therefore after sunne set, all this while the women lay aside their worke; on the three and thirtieth day the men bathe them and shauie their beards, and are merry, because then his Disciples ceased dying.

From the second night of their Pesach they number to their Pentecost fifty daies inclusively, and say, Blessed be thou, &c. which hast commanded vs to number the daies before haruest, of which this is the first or second, &c. they number the same standing, praying withall for the restitution of Ierusalem. They let not bloud on the euen of the Pentecost, because of a supposed winde Tabach, which should haue slaine all the Israelites, if they had refused next day to accept of the Laws. They keepe it two daies, for the former doubt. They take the Booke twice out of the Arke, and reade thereout the precepts concerning this Feasts sacrifices, now that they cannot performe the things. In remembrance of receiuing the Law, they strew the pauement of their houses, streets and Synagogues with grasse. They eate meates made of milke and cakes. One cake they make seuen times folded in thickenes in remembrance of the seuen heauens, by which God descended to Mount Sinai. Now they must haue good cheere, because at this time the King married his daughter, that is, the Law vnto them.

The Feast of Tabernacles is obserued eight daies; the two first, and two last more solemnely: the middle foure are halfe-holy. They mutter ouer their prayers with such haste, that he is the perfectest who speaks most with a breath. They make them Tabernacles with boughs of foure kinds of trees (more scrupulous then the Law) in which they sup, but doe not lodge. The Precentor in the Synagogue taketh a bundle of boughs, and blesteth and shaketh them, for it is written, The trees shall clap their hands, and moueth them three times to the East, and as often to the West, and to the N, and S, and then vp and downe like a Fencer, and then shaketh them againe, as hauing now put the Diuell to flight. Then one taketh out the Booke, and layeth it on the Pulpit, which they all with their boughs compassie seuen times a day, during the Feast; in hope of like destruction to the Christians as befell Iericho, and then renew the shaking of their boughs. The seuenth day is most solemne, called by them Hoschana rabba, the great Hosanna; as if one should say, the great feast of saluation or helpe, because then they pray for the saluation of al the people, & for a prosperous new year: and al the praiers of this feast haue in them the words of sauing, as, O God save vs, and O God of our saluation and as thou hast saued the Israelites, and such like: the prayers are therefore called Hofan-nah. Then they produce seuen books, & in euery of their seuen compassings lay vp one again. This night they know their fortunes by the Moon: for stretching out their arms, if they see not the shadow of their head by Moone-light, they must die that yeare; if a finger wanteth, he looseth a friend; if the shadow yeeld him not a hand, he looseth a sonne; the want of the left hand portendeth losse of a daughter; if no shadow, no life shall abide with him, for it is written, Their shadow is departed from them. Some Iewes goe yearly into Spaine, to prouide Pome-citrons and other necessities, for the furnishing this feast; which they sell in Germanie, and other places to the Iewes at excessive prices. They keepe their Tabernacles in all weathers, except a very vehement storme driue them with a heauie countenance into their houses. Their wiues and seruants are not so strictly tyed hereto.

day.

The new Moones are at this day but halfe festiuall to the Iewes, accounting themselves free to worke, or not in them; but the women keepe it intirely festiuall, because they denied their Eare-rings to the molten Calfe, which after they bestowed willingly on their Tabernacle. The deuouter Iewes fast the day before. Their Mattins is with more prayers, their dinner with more cheere then on other dayes; and a great part of the day after they sit at Cardes, or telling of Tales. That day when the Moone is eclipsed, they fast. When they may first see the new Moone, they assemble, and the chief Rabbi pronounceth a long prayer, the rest saying after him.

The Iewes beleueing that God created the world, in September or Tisri, conceit also, that at the reuolution of the same time yearly, he sitteth in iudgement, and out of the bookes taketh reckoning of euery mans life, and pronounceth sentence accordingly. That day which their great Sanhedrim ordained the New-yeares festiuall, God receiuing thereof intelligence by his Angels, sent thither to know the same, causeth the same day a Senate of Angels to be assembled, as it is written, Daniel 12. All things prouided in the solemnest manner, the three bookes are opened; one, of the most wicked, who are presently registred into the Bookes of Death: the second, of the iust, who are inrolled into the Bookes of Life; and the third, of the meane sort, whose iudgement is demurred vntill the day of Reconciliation (the tenth of Tisri), that if in the meane time they seriously repent them so, that their good may exceede their euill, then are they entered into the Bookes of Life; if otherwise, they are recorded in the Blacke Bill of Death. Their Scripture is produced by R. Aben: Let them be blotted out of the Bookes of the lining, and not be written with the iust. Blotting points you to the Booke of Death: Linig, that of Life; and not writing with the iust, is the third Booke of Indifferents. All the workes which a man hath done through the yeare, are this day examined: The good workes are put in one balance, the bad in the other (what helpe a siluer Chalice or such heauie mettall could afford in this case, you may finde by experience in Saint Francis Legend, who, when the bad deedes of a great man, lately dead out-weighed the good, at a dead life cast in a siluer Chalice, which the dead partie had sometime bestowed on Franciscan deuotion, and weighed vp the other side, and so the Diuels lost their prey: ) God (say they) pronounceth sentence of punishment or reward, sometime in this life to be executed, sometime in the other. In respect hereof, their Rabbins ordaine the moneth before to be spent in penance, and morning and euening to sound a Trumpet of a Rams horne, as an Aue Mary-Bell, to warne them of this iudgement, that they may thinke of their sinnes; and besides to befoole the Diuell, that with this often sounding being perplexed, he may not know when this New-yeares day shall be, to come into the Court to giue euidence against them. The day before they rise sooner in the morning, to mutter ouer their prayers for remission: and when they haue done in the Synagogue, they go to the graues in the Church-yard, testifying, that if God doe not pardon them, they are like to the dead, and praying, that for the good workes of the Saints (the iust Iewes there buried) he will pittie them, and there they giue large almes. After noone, they shauie, adorne, and bathe themselves, that they may be pure the next day; (for some Angels, soiled with impurity here below, are saine to purge themselves in the fiery brooke Dinor, before they can praise God; how much more they?) and in the water they make confession of their finnes; the confession containeth two and twentie wordes; the number of their Alphabet; and at the pronouncing of every word, giue a knock on their breast; and then dive wholly vnder water. The feast it selfe they beginne with a cup of wine, and New-year Salutations; and on their Table have a Rammes head, in remembrance of \ that Rammes which was offered in Isaacks stead*: and for this cause are their Trumpets of Rammes horne: Fish they eate, to signifie the multiplication of their good workes: they eate sweet fruits of all sorts, and make themselves merrie, as assured of forgiveness of their finnes; and after meat, all of all sorts, resort to some bridge to hurle their finnes into the water: as it is written, \ He shall cast all our finnes into the bottome of the Sea*. And if they there espie any fish, they leape for joy, these serving to them as the scape-goate, to carrie away their finnes. At night they renew their cheare, and end this feast.

From this day to the tenth day<sup>b</sup>, is a time of Penance or Lent, wherein they fast and pray for the cause aforesaid; and that if they haue bene written in the booke of Death, yet God seeing their good workes, may repent, and write them in the Life-booke. Thrice a day very early they confesse three houres before day, and surcease suites at Law, &c. And on the ninth day very early<sup>c</sup> they resort to the Synagogue; and at their meeting, every male taketh a Cock, and every female a Hen; if shee bee with child, both: and the houtholder, saying out of the hundred and fift Psalme, verses 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, and out of Iob chapter 23. vers. 23, 24, 25. swingeth the Cock three times about his head, every time saying, This Cock shall make an exchange for me: bee shall doe for me: and I shall goe into life with all the people of Israel, Amen. He doth it three times, for himselfe, for his children, for the strangers that are with him. Then hee killeth him, and cutteth his throat, and hurleth him with all his force to the ground, and roasterh him: signifying that he himselfe deserueth death, the sword, stoning, and fire: the inwards they hurle on the top of the house, that the Crowes may, with it, carrie away their finnes. A white Cock for this purpose is principall; a red Cock they vse not, for they are full of sinne themselves by *Esaia*s authoritie, \ If your finnes were red as scarlet, &c.* Antiphus Margaria saith, That this propitiatorie creature should beare Ape, as most like to a man; but they vse a Cock for the names sake: a man in Hebrew is Geaher: which is the Talmudicall or Babylonish name of a Cock. Thus those that with a Rammes horne beguiled the Deuill, and with a Cock beguiled God, iustly beguiled themselves, who refuse that sacrifice of Christ, in whose stripes they might bee healed. They haue another fable of a Cock mentioned by Victor Carbenis, thinking that as often as a Cock stands on one legge and his combe lookes pale, that God is angrie: which hapneth, they say, every day, and only in the day time, and that but the twinkling of an eye. And therefore they praise God which hath giuen such vnderstanding to a Cock.

After the performance of this Cock-sacrifice, they goe to the buriall-place, vsing like ceremonies there, as on New-yeares euen: and after noone, bathe them likewise. After Euen-song, he which hath offended others, askes them forgiveness, which if he obtaine not at first, then the offender taketh with him three other, and asketh the second and third time: if all this be in vaine, he taketh ten others and reneweth his suite; if he obtaine, it is well; if not, God will hold him excused, and the other partie shall be guiltie<sup>d</sup>; if the partie offended be dead, the offender, with ten other goeth to the graue, and there confesseth his<sup>e</sup> faulkes. They confesse one to another also, and that in a secret place of their Synagogue, where each receiueh mutually at his fellowes hand with a leather belt nine and thirtie blowes: at each blow the partie beaten beareth himselfe on the breast, and saith one word of his Confession, taken out of the seuentie and eight Psalme, and eight and thirtieth<sup>f</sup> Verse, being in the Hebrew fifteen words, which he thrice repeareth: then the striker lyeth downe and receiueh like penance at the hands of the former, you may iudge with what rigour. This done, they runne home, and make merrie with the Cocks and Hens before mentioned, supping largely, because of the next dayes fast. Their supper must be ended before Sunne-set: for then beginne their fast. They put on their cleaneſt rayment, and ouer the ſame, a great and large ſhirt downe to the ſhoes, to teſtifie their puritie. They reſort to their Synagogues with waxe candles (in Germanie they haue for euerie man one) and then light them. The women alſo light Candles at home, as on the Sabbath. It is ominous, if the Candles burne not clearly. They ſpread the floore with Carpets, for ſoiling their pureſt clothes.

Their humiliations at this Feaſt are ſixe: firſt, ſoure and twentie, or ſeuē and twentie houres faſt, whereunto children are ſubiect: the Males after twelue yeares, the females after eleuen. Secondly, they weare no ſhoes. Thirdly, they muſt not anoint them. Fourthly, nor bathe them, nor put a finger into the water. Fifthly, nor companie with, nor touch their wiues. Before they beginne prayers, thirteene of the principall Rabbies, walking in the Temple, giue licence to all, both good and badde, to pray. And the Præcentor or Reader fetcheth the Booke out of the Arke, and openeth it, ſinging a long prayer, beginning all compacts, vowes, and oathes, &c, inſinuating, that all the vowes, promiſes, oathes, and covenants, which euery Iew had that yeare broken, be diſannulled and pardoned: and that, becauſe now all haue power to pray and praiſe God. They continue ſinging till late in the night. Some remaine all night in the Synagogue: yea the deuouter ſome ſtand vpright ſinging and praying without intermiſſion all that feaſt, the ſpace of ſeuē and twentie houres in the ſame place. Thoſe that departed the Synagogue, returne in the morning before day, and there ſtay all that day. Often they proſtrate themſelues with their face covered, according word of their Confeſſions knocking their breaſt. When it beginneth to bee night, the Prieſt draweth his Talles (a large cloth made of haire) before his eyes, and pronounceth the bleſſing, Numb. 6. holding his hand towards the people, who muſt while couer their faces with their hands: for they may not looke on the Prieſts hand, becauſe the ſpirit of God reſteth thereon. Then he ſingeth a prayer ſeuē times together, ſometimes higher, ſometimes lower with his voice: becauſe that God now aſcendeth from them into the ſeuenth Heauen: and they with their ſweet melodie bring him on the way. Then they make a long and ſhrill ſound with their Rammes home-trumpet: and there followeth preſently a voice from Heauen, Goe eat thy bread with ioy and gladneſſe, &c. After this they returne home, ſome carrying home their lights, to diſtinguiſh the holy Times (as you haue heard) from the prophane: ſome leaue them in the Synagogue all the yeare, at certayne times lighting them. Some Saints provide to haue a wax-light continually burning all the year long in the Synagogue, when their returne they wiſh to each other a good yeare. For the Bookes, before mentioned, are now cloſed; nor may they expect any alteration. They ſup largely, and betimes the next morning returne to the Synagogue, leſt Sathan ſhould complayne at ſo ſoone a cooling of their zeale. But the Deuill may be quiet; for when the Law was giuen, a Sammael the euill ſpirit complained, that he had power ouer all people, but the Iſraelites: God answered; That he ſhould haue power ouer them, if on the Reconciliation-day he found any ſinne in them: But he finding them pure, ſaid, That this his people were like the Angels, living in vnitie, without eating or drinking. The Iewes haue a ceremonie to giue the Deuill gifts on this day, either not to hinder them: or elſe, becauſe b Gifts blinde the Wiſe.

c The feaſt of the Lawe finiſhed.

The Iewes diuide the Law into two and fiftie parts, and reading euery Sabbath one, the laſt falleth on the next day after the feaſt of Tabernacles, about the three and twentieth day of September. In this c day they leape, dance, and make much ioy. They aſſemble in their Synagogue, and take all the bookes of the Law out of the Arke (leaving in it meane-while, that it be not left emptie, a burning light) they reade the firſt Lecture and the laſt thereof, and leape about the Arke with the Bookes; and they hurle Peares, Nuts, and ſuch fruits among the youth, which in their ſcrambling ſometimes fall together by the eares, and marre the ſport. On this day they ſell their Synagogue-offices, the Clarke making proclamation: who will giue moſt at the third time, obtayneth firſt the office of lighting the Lights all the yeare, then that of providing the Wine, which they uſe to beginne the Feaſts with, in reſpect of the poore, which haue have no wine to hallow at home. Thirdly, Is set to sale the office Gelilah, of folding vp, and vnfoldng the Law. Fourthly, Hagbobab, of lifting vp the Law, and carrying it in Procession. Fifthly, The office Eitz-chajm, of touching those turned peeces of wood, whereto the Law is fastened: which the yong men are forward to buy, in hope of holinesse and longer life. Sixthly, Acheron, to bee called forth last on the festiuall dayes, to reade soniewhat of the Law. Seuently, Schetrin, to be deputed, or substituted in place of the negligent officer, &c. The monie, hence arising, is for the vie of the poore, and reparations of their Synagogue: but in these sale-offices, wealth hath more honour then worthinesse.

Their feast of Dedication, wee cannot say much more of; then that which already hath beene said: much nicenesse herein is obserued, about the lights wherewith they solemnize this darknesse, which I willingly omit: these lights they vse in their houses all the space of these eight daies burning.

Their feast of Lots they keepe with all riot two dayes, as with some at Shroue-tide: the men disguising themselves in womens habite; the women in mens: they quaffe and drinke (it is, saith Rabbi Isaac, Turne, a good worke) till they finde no difference betweene Avir Haman, and Baruch Mordecai: cursed bee HAMAN, blessed bee MORDECAI; vociferations that day obserued.

They obserue festiuall the Equinoctials and Solstices; and a certaine Regation day: they vie the fasts before mentioned out of Zach. 7. with other superstitions. Some of them fast also, as is said, on Mondayes and Thursdayes; and some on the tenth of March for the death of Miriam: at whose departure; a certayne fountaine dried vp, and the people were left without water: but in this moneth the most Rabbins will not allow fasting, because of their deliuerance therein out of Egypt. Some fast for the death of Samuel, Aprill 28. and for the taking of the Arke, Aprill 10. and at other times for other Prophets. Some fast on the new-moones euen: some, when they haue had an infortunate dreame; and all that day in which their Father died; through their whole life. Their fasting is an abstinence from all eating and drinking till night. But of these fasts and other their solemnities, is said before in the abstract of their Kalender, taken out of Ioseph Scaliger. Their fast on the 17. of the fourth Moneth for the destruction of their Citie is rigorously kept, and from thence to the ninth day of the moneth following, are holden vnluckie dayes; in which schoole masters may not beat their scholars, nor any man will sue at the laye. And for the burning of the Temple in the ninth day of the fifth moneth they goe bare-foot, reade heauie stories, and Ieremies Lamentations, and moune among the graues of the dead, and are sad all that moneth: from the first to the tenth they eate no flesh nor drinke wine, nor bathe, nor marrie, nor cut their haire; the sue not at the law; for Hosee saith, The moneth shall deuoure their portion: and they shall be taken, saith Ieremie, in their moneth. On the eight day they eate only Lentils: for they may not eate Pease or Beanes, because they haue black spots like mounthes, which Lentils want, and therefore more fitly represent a heauie man which wanteth his mouth for sorrow: egges they may eate in the night for their roundnesse: for sorrow as if it were round rolleth from one to another. They haue their fasts also on speciall occasions, as they tell of one Chone Hammagal, which in a great drought, put himselfe into a pie made fit for his body, and prayed, saying, Lord of the World, the eyes of thy children are upon me, as one whom they thinke familiar with thee: I sweare by thy holy name that I will not come hence till thou shew mercie. And then it rained presently, for how could it choofe. They tell the same pie-tale of Moses likewise, and of Habacuc, expounding that Hab. 2. 1. I will stand on my watch, I will stand in my Pie. Their manner is, saith Viſlor Carbenſis, to curse Tisue, and say he was of the generation of Agag the Amalechite, and such a blasphemers as neuer was any, and that for his blasphemies he was stricken with madnesse.

CHAP. XIX.

Buxdorf. Syn.
Jud. c. 26. & d.

Ye why doe we interrayne you so long in Feasts and Fasts? both almost violent to humane nature, howsoever the Glutton is neuer glutted with the one, and the superstitious rather kill the flesh, then the vices of the flesh, with the other? Medio tutissimus ibis. We will soberly recreate your spirits with a walke into the Cooke-roume, and thence to the butchery, and then to the Bride-chamber, to take view of their Espousals, Marriages, Diuorces, and thence diuorce your eyes from these spectacles; and direct them to their Beggars, Penances, and to that fatall diuorce, ending your walke where the walkes of all flesh end, at Death and the Graue. They haue Kitchen-vessells of two sorts, one for flesh, another for whit-meats. Their milke vessels of wood are marked with three cuts, because that sentence, Thou shalt not see the a Kid in his mothers milke, is three times in the Law repeated. Every Jew carrieth two kniues with him, one for flesh; the other for cheefe and fish, and these also are marked with three cuts. And if these vessels should be intermingled, our Jew might not care that which is dressed therein: yea the innocent vessels are broken if of earth, most accurately washed if of wood, and purged in the fire if they be of yron. They see the not milke and flesh at one time, and ouer one fire, ouer against each other: nor set them together on the Table, but separate them with somewhat set betweene. One cloth is laid for flesh, and another for whit-meate. Hee which eatech flesh, or broth thereof, may not eate whit-meates an houre after, yea the most religious will abstaine sixe houres after. Yet may they eate a Hen together with Almond-milke. If any haue not the gift of such abstinence, very carefully must he cleanse his teeth and wash his mouth, and with a peece of drie bread take away the taste of the flesh. If any suet fall into their whit-meats, they may not be eaten, except there be sixtie times as much of the meat as of the suet. An egge may not be poched in a flesh-vessell: they breake it also, and diligently obserue that none of that bloudie resemblance in the top of the egge remaine. If in cutting vp of a Hen they finde egges, they may not eate them till they bee washed and softened in water and salt. Flesh and fish may not be dressed, or set on the table, or eaten, together for this (they write) would bring the leprosie. In their diet difficulties they consult with their Rabbines. Glasses, kniues, and all their kitchen vessels new-bought, must be curiously washed, and if they will beare it, purged with the fire.

Butcherie is with the Jew exalted aboue the liberall sciences, and must be learned by much bookishnes and long experience. They haue a booke of shamble-constitutions, and in harder cases they aduise with some learned Rabbi. Neither may any practise this Arte without licence from the Rabbi, whereby he signifieth that he had taken examination and prooffe of the partie, and found him expert therein both in word & deed, and therefore hath permitted him to kill, and others to eate the meate by him killed: prouided that he diligently reade every weeke for one yeare, and every month the next yeare, and once a quarter during his life, the Constitutions abouesaid. They haue their especiall kniues, for this businesse, great ones for greater cattell, and small for the smaller: the greater haue blunter and broader points: if they haue any rifts in them they may not vse them. The greater beasts feet must be bound in remembrance of Abrahams binding Isaac, and then with one cut or thrust he cutteth the Wesand asunder; which done he lookes on his knife if there be any rift in it, for that would terrifie the beast, and cause the bloud to recoil back to the heart, whereby the beast would not be fit for vse as retayning some of the bloud. After this, hee hangs vp the beast, takes out the inwards, and cutting a hole on both sides of the heart, thrusteth his hand through the same into the bodie of the beast, to search if there bee any bloud; and if there bee any fault in the beast it is not for their diet, applying that which the law saith of a carkasse found torne in the fields. They cut the throat of a bird in like manner, if it be a Foule which hath quills in the wings, in remembrance of an office performed by the fowles sometimes, a The knife may not after be vsed, except heated red hot in the fire three houres, and three daies hidden in the earth, and three times put into water. Vit. Carb. l. 1. c. 12.

Exod. 22. 31.

sometimes, * as they say to Rebecca, when she descended from her Camel at the sight of Isaac; and therefore they let the fowle bleed into a heap of ashes, and therein couer the blood. They couer the bloud also of oither creatures in the ground, because the Earth opened her mouth to drinke in the bloud of Abel: and because Satan should not accuse men of iniustice for slaying the innocent beasts, seeing so much blood-shed by them. When they haue killed a great beast, they cut out all the veines and sinewes (of which subiect they haue written speciall Treatises) and likewise all the Suet: which done, they diue them in water to mollifie them, and wash them throughly to rinse away all the blood; and then lay them on a bord, that all the water may passe from them: after which they salt them in a vessell full of holes, that the salt may draine out all whatsoeuer bloudiness yet remaining. They eat not the hinder parts in remembrance of Laban's thigh.

But in Italy they haue inuented a new anatomizing trick, by taking away the veines and sinewes to make them lawfull. Pitle they cannot doe the like for swine and other forbidden meats: but you see they haue some trickes to cousin God, as before to cousin the Diuell: but the most coufinage (saue that in the former they coufin themselves) is to Christians which buy those hinder parts of them, in polluting those meats, before they sell them, with filth, and with vrine of their children, adding curses and imprecations to the eaters. Thus you see the Jew-butcher had need be no botcher, but halfe a Physician in Anatomizing, and halfe a Rabbin in cases of conscience. And who knoweth whether so many Iewish Physicians come not from (and perhaps also carrie to) the Shambles?

But weary of this bloudie spectacle, let vs take a more pleasant view, of their Virgins and Espousals. These were made, saith * Moses de Kósi, either with money, or with an instrument, or with copulation. It seemeth this last is vnderstood of such as had lien with a maide, and therefore must by the <sup>d</sup> Law marrie her (if the father denied him not his daughter) whereas otherwise they might not haue carnall companie before the marriage were solemnized, this being forbidden no * lesse then to lie with a woman in her disease. Their Prayer-booke <sup>f</sup> saith thus, He which shall espouse a woman, bringeth witnesses, and before them doth betroth her with money, or somewhat money-worth, which he giueth her saying, Be thou espoused to me according to the Law of Moses and Israel. If there be no witnesses it is nothing, notwithstanding they both confesse it. If one shall affiance a woman to another, he saith, Be thou espoused to N. with this Ring, according to the Law of Moses and Israel. <sup>g</sup> Buxdorsius (to whom I am most beholding in many of these reports) writeth that when promise hath passed betweene two, many Jewes are called together into a great chamber: where euerie of the youtnes holdeth a pot in his hand. Then comes one, and reades the letters of contract, that N. sonne of N. and N. daughter of N. haue promised marriage to each other, each giuing so much in dower, which marriage is to be solemnized on such a day: and the partie which faileth in the promises, shall giue the other fiftie Florens. This done, they wish ioy to each other: and the Jewlings presently breake their earthen pots, whereby they signifie to the parties prosperitie and abundance. At parting, every one hath a cup of wine given them. Eight dayes after neither partie goeth out of the house: and many youtnes come and make merrie with the Bridegrome, imitating (they thinke) Sampson herein. Some say <sup>h</sup> that the man taketh the espoused Bride home to his house, to be both witness and keeper of her virginie till the marriage solemnitie. The day before the marriage, the Bride must wash her in that absolute manner <sup>i</sup> before described, certaine women ringing with somewhat when she goeth in and out of the water, some of them also leaping and dancing. The Bridegrome sends the bride a wedding girdle embossed with <sup>k</sup> gold, and she him another with siluer studs. On the wedding day the Bride adorne her selfe in the best Iewish dresse, with her marriage attire, and by women singing their sweetest Epithalamia is conveyed into a chamber, and there placing her on a faire seate, braid her haire into goodly curlles, and put a vail over her eyes (in imitation of Rebecca's modestie) hanging meanwhile, dancing, and expressing the greatest signes of ioy, thinking they therein please God, as being taught by their Rabbines, that God vsed the like curling, singing and dancing, when

when he presented Eue to Adam; <sup>1</sup> yea refused not to serue that new couple, and with his owne hands made the canopie vnder which they were to receiue their marriage blessing, the Angels with pipes and trumpets making musicke to leade the dance. That which Moses saith <sup>m</sup>, God built a woman, the Talmud interpreteth, He made curls, and he brought her to Adam, to wit, with leaping and dancing. When the marriage benediction is to be solemnized: foure boyes beare a <sup>n</sup> canopie on foure poles into the place appointed, which is some street or garden <sup>o</sup> abroad in the open aire, the people sounding their acclamations, Blessed be he which commeth. The Bride (being led by others) goeth three times about the Bridegrome, as a cocke goeth about a hen, and that forsooth to fulfill that Prophecie, <sup>p</sup> A woman shall compass a man: he also must fetch one compass about her. The people also besprinkle the Bride with wheat, crying out, Increase and multiply, according to that of the Psalmist, <sup>q</sup> He filleth thee with the fat of wheat. In some places they mingle money with the wheat, which the poore Iewes gather vp. The Bride stands on the right hand, for it is written, <sup>r</sup> Thy wife standeth at thy right hand: with her face also to the South, for then she shall be fruitfull. The Rabbi which marrieth them, taketh the end of the Vestment about the Bridegromes necke, (they call it Talles) and puts it on the Brides head, after the example of <sup>s</sup> Boaz and Ruth: and then takes a glasse filled with wine, ouer which hee vttereth the marriage blessing praying God by whose instinct these persons were espoused: and so reacheth the glasse to them, and bids them drinke. This glasse, if she be a Virgin, hath but a narrow mouth, at Wormes they vse an earthen pot. Now the Rabbi receiuing a Ring of pure gold, without any <sup>t</sup> Jewell in it, and sheweth it to some witnesses, asking them if it be good and worth the money it cost; and then puts it on the brides finger, and with a loud voice pronounceth the spousall letters. After this he takes another glasse of wine, and blesteth God that the Bridegrome and Bride haue accepted of each other, and giues it them to taste. This done, the Bridegrome breaketh the former glasse against the wall or ground, in remembrance of the destruction of Ierusalem: in which respect, in some places they put ashes on the Bridegromes head. Hee weareth for this cause a black hood on his head like a mourner: and the bride likewise weareth a black cloth, fit to terrifie children with the deformitie. Thus doe they mixe mirth and mourning, as David warneth, Reioyce vnto him in trembling. This ended, they sit downe at tables, and then must the Bridegrome make triall of his breast in singing a long prayer: others in the meane time call to make readie the hens. Then is there a hen and an egge set before the Bride: of that the Bridegrome carueth her a peece, and then presently all the company, men and woman, teare the hen amongst them like hungry hounds, snatching out of each others hands and mouthes, and all to glad the new married couple. The egge is not fodde, but in another scene of mirth, one casteth it in the face of another, of some Christian especially, if any be present at the nuptials. In the same is a mysterie included for the Bride, that she shall haue as easie trauell in child-birth, as the hen layeth her egges. After this they fall to their cheere, and dances; one they call the Mitzuah or commandment-dance, as if God had enioyned it. The chiefe guest takes the bridegrome by the hand, another him, and so on through the company: likewise the chiefe woman takes the Bride, another her, and so one another: then do they dance in a long row with a tumultuous noise, and so end the nuptiall sports. Among all their other blessings, the Bridegrome is to say one, ubi perspexeris sanguinem virginum, to vse the words of Genebrard, who expresth it, being borrowed from some words of the Canticles, fleshly abused by such application.

The mariage commonly lasteth eight daies: and on the Sabbath they dance the lustiest of all, doing the Sabbath herein a singular honor, because that also is called a Bride. It is prohibited to bid any vncircumcised guest to this banquet: for <sup>u</sup> Salomon saith, The stranger doth not intermeddle with his ioy. Yea the good Angels seeing such there, will depart; and the euill will come and raise strifes and contentions. For they thinke no <sup>x</sup> place emptie from the earth to the skie, but all full of good or bad Angels flying or standing in the same. The mariage <sup>y</sup> is in publike, lest whoredome should bee couered vnder that pretext, pretending themselves married when they were not.

Let it not grieue you to heare somewhat of the duties betwixt man and wife. The husband oweth ten things to the wife: <sup>a</sup> three according to the Law; her nourishment, her cloathing, and her time; namely, of due beneuolence to be performed: and seuenthings according to the words of the Scribes: the first whereof is the fundation of dowrie, viz. two hundred denarij, if she be a virgin, otherwise an hundred. The other concerne the condition of the dowrie. The woman which rendereth not her husband his due, is rebellious and refractarie; and he is bidden to expell her without a dowrie. The conditions of the dowrie were: first, to cure her in sicknesse: secondly, to redeeme her being captiue: thirdly, to burie her, being dead: fourthly, to nourish her out of his owne goods, and that she dwell in his house in her widow-hood: fifthly, to keepe her daughters till mariage: sixthly, that her sonnes inherit. They appoint not only loue, but honor to the wife (as Peter also enioyneth to this weaker vessell) which honor, they say, is in meat and drinke, and goodly garments, for which he shall (this was a womans friend) haue fauour with God. The Author of Arban Turim, addeth, That a man should loue his wife as his owne bodie, and honor her aboue his bodie, and keepe her as one of his members. For the wife is the other halfe of man, and a man without a wife, is but halfe a man. And let him take heed of striking his wife, said ban- other, or to be virulent in termes against her. For, for her teares (how pitifully easie are they to some?) his punishment is neere. And howsoeuer since the destruction of the Temple, the dores of Prayers hath beene shut, yet the dores of teares hath not bin shut, as saith Dauid, Be not thou silent at my teares. And should not a man honor his wife? Yes, saith R. Hanina, for a man hath no blessing but for his wife, as it is written, He blessed Abraham for her. Let a man cloath himselfe (I would not haue women heare it) beneath his abilitie, his children according to his abilitie, and his wife aboue his abilitie. Let the wife honor her husband as her father, and feare to displease him, and let him spare her in his anger, remembring that she was taken out of his ribbes. But for the wiues choice, A man ought, saith <sup>d</sup> one, to sell all that he hath and buy a wife, the daughter of a wise Disciple: if he finde not such an one, let him take a daughter of the great men of his time: if not such, the daughter of a Synagogue-Ruler; in that defect, let him take the daughter of one which gathereth almes: if not, then of a Schoole-master, and not the daughter of the people of the Land, of whom the Scripture saith, Cursed be he that lieth with a beast.

They say that a man ought <sup>f</sup> not to lodge in the same chamber, no not with his sister, daughter, or daughter in law: yea, their wise-men forbid conference with a woman altogether.

The bill of diuorce is still practised among the Iewes: it must be written in twelue lines (it is therefore called 8 Get) neither more nor lesse, and deliuered to the woman before three credible witnesses, vnder their hands and seales. Then doth the husband deliuer it to her, saying, Lo woman, the bill of thy diuorce, take it of me, by it being diuorced from, be thou free to another husband. The tenor of this bill is this: The second day of the weeke, the eight and twentieth of the moneth, N. in the yeare of the world 3363. as we heere at Mentz vpon Rhene vse to reckon, I Isaak, sir-named Eckendorf, sonne of R. Abr. now dwelling at Mentz: of my free will, without constraint, thee Sara, sir-named Trummerle, daughter of R. Lewi, which hitherto hast beene my wife, haue determined to free, forsake, and diuorce. And now to forsake, free, and put thee from me, that thou mayest be thine owne, and at thine owne free will and pleasure mayest depart whither thou wilt, and none from hence forth for euer shall prohibite thee: And thou art so freed, that thou mayest marry to any other man.

This diuorce may not be done in euery place, but they haue some speciall place appointed, noted, and knowne, situate on some knowne Riuer: whereto certaine chiefe Rabbines are called by writing, if there be none there dwelling, which consummate the businesse. By the old <sup>h</sup> Law, a woman might be reconciled to her husband before the Bill of diuorce giuen, not after.

The obseruation of the brother, to marrie the wife of his brother deceased without issue, or else to lose the inheritance, which was testified by pulling off his shooe, and spetting in his face; is now thus ruled by the Rabbines, that none shall marrie such a widow;

widow, but rather suffer the premised ignominie; which is performed in this sort. She comes before the chiefe Rabbi with five witnesses, where the Rabbi demands, if she haue been three months a widow, if her husband had a brother vnmarried, if the partie conuerted be he, &c. and lastly, if she be fasting (for otherwise) she might not spee in her brothers face. Of him also the Rabbi asketh like questions, and receiuing a deniall of marriage, there is brought a shooe of singular fashion for that purpose, which he pinneth on his right foot bare, and then setteth himselfe against a wall. The woman comes, and disclaiming his affinitie, stoupeth, and with her right hand (for if she want a right hand, it putteth the Rabbines out of their right wits to skanne, whether with her teeth, or how else it may be done) vnlooseth the shooe and taking it off, spets in his face, so that the five witnesses may see it, saying, Thus it shall be done with him which will not build the house of his brother.

For this they

In the time of her vncleannesse, a woman may not enter into the Synagogue, nor pray, nor name the Name of God, nor handle any holy booke; which if they obserue, the Rabbines promise them longer life. As soone as she knoweth of her vncleannesse, she presently separateth her selfe from her husband the space of seuen dayes, not touching him, nor sitting on the same seate, nor eating in the same dish, or on the same cloth, nor may drinke out of the same cup, nor stand against him, nor speake in his face. If one will giue any thing to the other, one layeth it on a bench or table, and goeth away, and the other cometh and taketh it. They say it procureth the Leprosie in the children which are then gotten, which they obiect to Christians.

When shee hath numbered seuen<sup>i</sup> dayes of her vncleannesse, shee proceedeth to number as many of her purification: after which time finding her selfe pure she clotheth her selfe in white, and taking a woman with her, washeth her selfe in cold water (some in winter put in warme water to it, which others in the coldest season refuse) and leaues not a haire of her head vnwashed, as before is described. Some<sup>k</sup> fast till they haue done it, lest the flesh in the teeth should hinder the water from comming to them; for mouth and eyes must be open, and they must stoope, that the pappe keep not away the water from the breast: and if they haue a plaister on a sore, it must off, and their nailes must be pared.

They<sup>l</sup> write, that if any shall exceed twentie yeares and not marry, or if he shall marrie a wife which is barren, he sinneth as much as if he had slaine a man, and deserueth the punishment of Onan, whom God slew. Prouided, if hee addiect himselfe to the studie of the Law, and findeth no need of a wife: but if he finde concupiscence preuaile, he ought to marrie notwithstanding. And this necessitie remaineth<sup>m</sup> till he hath begotten a sonne and a daughter.

The poorer Iewes on the Friday night, and euery Festiuall, entering into the houses of the richer, beg prouision for the Feast. And if any be exceeding poore, the Rabbines make him a lence to beg, therein testifying of his honestie and Iewish faith; where-with he wandereth through the Countrey, visiting all the Iewes he can finde. And if he come to a place where are many Iewes, he sheweth his licence to the chiefe Rabbi; or to the Clarke which calls men to the Synagogue, or to the Elders, or Ruler of the Synagogue, which is as their Consul, or to the Ouerseers of the poore, and craueth their fauour: which granted, he standeth with two others at the dore of the Synagogue, and beggeth; or else those two go from house to house and beg for him. The like is done when a poore Iew hath a daughter marriageable, to beg for her dowrie. When poore Iewes trauell, they may turne in to another Iewes house, where (their prouerb is) the first day he is a guest, the second a burthen, the third a fugitiue.

Cap. 34.
Iewes.

The falling sicknesse is vsuall among the Iewes, and they vse to imprecate it to each other in their anger, as they also doe the plague. In a generall pestilence they write in their chamber strange characters and wonderfull names, which (they say) are the names of the Pest-angels. And I once saw (saith our Author) Adiridon, Bediridon, and soon, the word Diridon riding on quite through the Alphabet, written with great letters in their houses, as a present remedie for the Plague. The Leprie they haue seldome, which may be attributed to their diet.

Cap. 35.
Iewish penan-
cies.

Now the Sword and Scepter is taken from them, in stead of other penalties, they inflict inflict sharpe penances according to the nature of the crime. Thus the Adulterer satisfieth for his hot lust in cold water, wherein he is enioyned to sit some winter dayes; and if the water be frozen, the ice is cut, and he set therein vp to his chinne, as long as an egge is roasting. In summer time he is set naked in an Ant-hill, his nose and eares stopped, and after washeth himselfe in cold water. If the season be neither cold nor hot, he is enioyned a certaine kind of fasting, in which he may not eat any thing till night, and then only a little bread and water is allowed him, and yet he must after endure the Ant or water-penance. In Medrasch is written, that Adam sate vp to the nose in water an hundred and thirtie yeares, till he begate Seth, for eating the forbidden fruit. If the penance seeme lighter, they enioyne him further to runne thorow a swarme of Bees, and when the swelling of his bodie through their stinging is abated, he must do it againe and againe, according to the measure of his offence. If he hath often that way offended, he is bound to endure that penance many yeares, yea sometimes a three yeares fast together, eating bread and water at supper, otherwise nothing, except he rather chuse to redeeme this, with fasting three whole daies together in each yeare, without tasting any refection at all, as Queene Esther did. When any hath lien with a woman in her vncleanness, he incurth the penance of fortie daies fast, and twice or thrice euery of those dayes to receiue on his bare back with a leather thong or girdle nine blowes: to eat no flesh or hot meat, nor drinke any wine, but on the Sabbath. If a man kisse or embrace his menstruous wife, the case is alike. A robber is adiudged three yeares banishment, to wander three yeares thorow the Cities where Iewes dwell, crying aloud, I am a robber, and suffer himselfe to be beaten in manner aforesaid. He may not eate flesh, nor drinke wine; nor cut the haire off his head or beard: hee must put on his change of garments, and shirts vnwashed. He may not wash himselfe: euery month once he must couer his head: he must weare his arme, wherewith he committed murder, fastened to his necke with a chaine. Some are enioyned that where they sleepe one night they may not sleepe the next, that they may wander ouer the world like Cain. Some are constrained to weare an iron breast-plate next their skinne: and some to throw themselues downe before the dore of the Synagogue, that they which go in may treade on him. That Iew which accuseth another before a Christian Magistrate, is accounted a Traytor, and neuer made reckoning of after.

But why doe I tire the Reader, to whom I feare I haue beene ouer tedious? But in this matter of Religion, of whom is it fitter to protract discourse, then of them, whom the old world yelded the onely example of Truth, and the present age, a principall example of falsehood and superstition? Let it not grieue the Reader, to performe the last office of humanitie to our Iew, and as he hath seene his birth, his Synagogue-Rites, and home-superstitions, so to visit him on his death-bed, and help lay him in his graue: and examine his hope of the Resurrection, and of their Messias, and we will end our Pilgrimage in this Holy Land.

When <sup>a</sup> a man lieth sicke, the Rabbines visit him; and if he be rich, order is taken for his Will, and then they exhort him to perseuere constantly in their Faith. They aske him if he beleue that the Messias is yet to come. He maketh his confession on his bed, saying; I confesse before thee my God and Lord, God of my parents, Lord of all Creatures, that my health and death is in thy hand, I pray thee grant me recouerie of my former health, and heare my prayer, as thou diddest heare Hezekiah in his sickness. And if the time of my death be come, then grant that death may be my remission of all my sinne, which of ignorance or knowledge I haue committed, euer since I was a man: grant that I may haue my part in Paradise, and the world to come, which is reserved for the iust: grant that I may know the way of everlasting life. fill me with the joy of thy excellent countenance by thy right hand for ever. Blessed be thou O God, which hearest my prayer.

Thus they which refuse the merits of Christs death, ascribe remission of sinnes to their owne. When he <sup>b</sup> giueth vp the ghost, all the standers by rend their garments, but in a certaine place of the same, where they doe no great harme, about a hand-breadth. They lament the dead seuen dayes. They presently after his death powre out all the water in the house into the streete: they couer his face that it may no more be seene: they bow his thumbe in his hand, framing a resemblance of the Hebrew name Schaddai: his other fingers are stretched out, to testifie a forsaking of the world: they wash him with horte water, and hauing annointed his head with wine and the yolke of an egge mixed together, they put on him a white vestment, which he vied to weare on the Feast of Reconciliation. When they carrie him out of the house, they hurle after him a broken sherd, signifying, that with him all heaviness should be expelled and broken. When they are come to the place <sup>c</sup> of buriall, they say, Blessed be God, which hath formed you with Iudgement and Iustice, hath created, fed, sustained, and at last hath deprived you of life (speaking to the dead.) He knoweth the number of you all, and will quicken you againe in his time. Blessed be God, which doth to die, and maketh alme. Let thy dead liue, with my carkasse let them rise againe. Awake and reioyce that lie in dust, because thy dew is the dew of light, and the earth shall cast forth the dead. This the Minister saith alone: then he goeth on with a long prayer, of three and twentie sentences, which the people say after him, going about the sepulchre. They call this prayer Taiduck haddin, the subiect whereof is the iustice of God; calling for pardon in the name of Abraham, Isaac, and Iacob: acknowledging that by three things the foundations of the world are founded, the Law, worship, and pietie to the dead: calling for deliuerance for the blood of his seruants shed in the 856. yeare, for the confession of his holy Name, and for the merit of the only-begotten, which was seuen and thirtie yeares old, in whose place a Ramme was taken; concluding with the mention of their Captaines slaine in the 136. yeare. Heere they take downe the corpe, and then the Minister singeth, the people following. This is the way of all the world, let him sleepe in peace, &c. Tee Fathers of the world which sleepe in Hebron, open vnto him, the gates of the garden of Eden, and say, his comming bee in peace. Tee everlasting hills of the double cause, open vnto him the gates of the garden of Eden, and bid him welcome. Tee Angels of peace go forth to meete him, vnlooke to him the gates of Paradise. Tee keepers of the treasures of the garden of Eden, open the gates and let N. enter, and enioy the fruits of Paradise; good things be at his right hand, pleasant things at his left. Heare this O Lord, and let his comming be in peace. Then they lay him into the ground, and his neereft kinsmen cast in the first earth: after which they turne to the East with diuers other blessings. When <sup>d</sup> they returne, they bow themselves backwardes three times, and throw grasse ouer their heads, signifying their hope of the Resurrection, according to that, Es. 66. 14. and your bones shall bud as the grasse: saying also, Dust thou art, and to Dust thou shalt returne. Then doth euery one mutter a prayer to himselfe, as he goeth out of the buriall place. In the porch of the Synagogue, God <sup>e</sup> shall destroy death for ever (say they) and wipe away all teares from their eyes, and will take away their sorrow from all the earth, for the Lord hath spoken it. Then enter they into the Synagogue, and leape vp and downe, and change their Seates seuen times, and there say ouer their Purgatorie prayer Kaddisch. The Mourners goe bare-foote seuen dayes, and eate not Flesh, nor drinke Wine, except on the Sabbathes and Festiualls. They bathe not in three and thirtie dayes after, cut not their nailes, worke not, make a pitifull howling, &c. The first night the Mourner eateth nothing of his owne, but maketh sent him from his friends. The childe mourneth for his father a yeare. The sonne, euen monethes, saith ouer his Kaddisch; for meane sinners are freed sooner; but the wicked stay the whole twelue monethes: and therefore to persist the twelfth moneth in his prayer, should be to acknowledge his father a wicked man. And for this effect hereof, Rabbi Akibba met once in the way a man, with an Asse-like burthen of sticks, which vpon examination confessed, That hee was a Purgatorie-ghost, carrying to burne himselfe, such bundles euery day. Rabbi Akibba enquired if he had a sonne or wife, and where; and finding out his sonne, taught him this prayer, which was so effectually, that in a dreame this ghost returned to the Rabbi with thanks, for his deliuerance, and said hee was now in Gan Eden, or Paradise. Rabbi Akibba signified this to the Iewish Synagogues, with iniunction to teach their children this prayer.

But to returne to our Funeralls: when they are come backe to the mourning-house they wash their hands, but obserue not the Mosaicall Rites, because the Temple is not standing. Then doe they power out a long blessing ouer a cuppe of Wine, and another ouer their meat exceeding much longer. Their Purgatorie-prayer, or (as Genebrard calleth it, their) Requiem, vel libera, is this. It is better to goe into the house of mourning, then into the house of feasting, in which is the end of all men? which let the living remember. Let vs heare the end: Feare God, and keepe his Commandements: this is the duty of euery man. A sure rest in the high habitation vnder the wings of God, in the degree of the Saints, shining as the brightnes of the skie. The change of boade, pardon of sins, grans of saluation, indulgence and mercy from the sight of him which dwells in heauen, and a portion in the life to come: there let the portion be, and the dwelling of the soule of the wise Master N. The Spirit of the Lord make him to rest in Gan Eden, and giue him peace, as it is written in Esay, Let peace come, and let him rest in beds, walking before it, he and all the deceased of Israel, through his mercy. Amen. They write also on the Tombe, Let his soule be in the garden of Eden, Amen. Or, let his soule be bound in the bundle of life. And sometimes, Thou art the Tombe of N, which departed into Eden, such a day of such a month and yeare. Thus poore Purgatorie with Iewes and Rōmists is preached by walking ghosts. They haue a light burning for the dead seven daies. They powre the water out of the dorts, because the Angell of Death washeth his sword (lately vsed) in water, and enuenuometh it. This his sword he holdeth in his hand at the beds head, hauing on the end thereof three drops of gall: The sick man spying this Deadly angell, openeth his mouth with feare, and then those drops fall in, of which one killeth him, the second maketh him pale, the third rotteth and putrifieth, Elias Lewis * addeth, that after a man is dead the Angell of Death cometh and sitteth on his graue, and presently the soule entreteth into his body, and he maketh him stand on his feet, hauing to that purpose, in his hand a chaine, halfe of iron and halfe of fire, wherewith he striketh him. At the first blow his members are dissol-ued, at the second his bones are scattered; then come the Angels and gather them: at the third he is brought to dust and ashes, and returneth into his graue. And this, saith R. Adair, is more grieuous then the iudgement of hell, for the iust, and the sonnes of the Princes, and abortiues are iudged therewith, except they which die on the euen of the Sabbath, and in the land of Israel: of which you haue heard their rolling opinion before; neither will we roll this stone to our Reader againe.

CHAP. XX.

He Iewes generally beleeue, hope, and pray for a Messias; but such a one, whose kingdome shall be of this world, and who shall (so vsē the Apostles * phrase, who were also, euen after Christs death and resurrection, partakers of this dreame) Restore the Kingdome to Israel. And because the Scripture speaketh somewhat of the poore, contemptible, and dejected state, of the promised Messias, sometimes of the puissance, renowne, and glorie of his kingdome: they therefore frame to their conceits, two Messiahs, one poore and simple, but a mightie warrior, whom they call Messias Ben-Ioseph, the other, Messias Ben-David; after the other in time, but before him in glory, and the true Messias: howfoeuer euen this also be in their opinions but a meere man, and one which shall marie and leaue behind him a remaining and reigning posteritie.

The ancient Iewes looked for this Messias to be sent them about this time, when Iesus came in the Flesh: as that Prophecie which is fathered on Elias testifieth to wit, that the world should be two thousand yeares Tebu, emptie and without Law, two thousand vnder the Law, two thousand vnder the Messias: and accordingly Christ Iesus came into the world about the yeare after the Creation, 3963. The Iewes reckon 402. yeares fewer in all their computations, then the Christians. Vpon this occasion, and in regard of the generall expectation of the Messias, about that time rose so many sects, and especially that rebellion of Ben-Cochab, before spoken of, to whom R. Akiba (famous for his foure and twentie thousand disciples) gaue testimonie, and called

- him Messias the King. But this Ben-Cochab, the sonne of the Starre, Numb. 23. was by Adrian (as you haue seene) besieged, taken, and executed, and was called after Ben-Cochab, the sonne of lying. They therefore, when as they found no Messias, said, that the time was deferred, because of their finnes: and after renounced Ananias to him, that should set downe the time of his coming. And being conuincid in their consciences, that the Prophecies of this time were already past and accomplished, they affirmed in their writings, that he was then borne, but did not yet reueale himselfe, because of their finnes. R. Salomon Iarcho writeth, that the ancient Jewes thought he was borne on that day in which Ierusalem was last destroyed; but vncertaine where he hath lien hid. Some say that he abideth in Paradise tied by the haire of a womans head: so interpreting that of the Canticles, The haire of thy head is as purple; The King is tied in the rascals; by rascals meaning Paradise. The Talmudists write, that he lay in the gates of Rome among the Lazars and Leapers, according to Esay 53.
- Before he cometh, they write, that ten notable miracles shall happen to waite them thereof. First, God shall raise vp three Kings, which shall make profession of the true Faith, but shall indeed betray it, and seduce men, and cause them to deny God. The Iouers of the Truth shall flee and hide themselves in caves, and holes of the earth, and these Tyrants shall pursue and slay them. Then shall there be no King in Israel (as it is written) no Pastor, no holy men. The heauens shall be shut vp, the people shall be made few: for these Tyrants, (which yet by diuine dispensation shall raigne but three moneths) shall impose ten times as much, as was before exacted, and they which haue not to pay shall lose their heads. And from the ends of the earth, shall come men, black and loathsome; the dread of whose countenance shall kill men: for they shall haue two heads and seuen eyes, sparkling like fire.
- The second Miracle shall be a great heate of the Sunne, causing Feuers, Pestilence, and other diseases, so that the Gentiles shall digge themselves graues, and there lie and with for death. But the Israelites shall haue this heate to be as a wholesome medicine to them: so interpreting the Prophet.
- God shall make a bloody dew fall on the earth, of which the people, and the wicked of the Israelites shall drinke, thinking it to be good water, and shall die: it shall not hurt the iust, who shall shine, &c.
- Fourthly, God shall make a wholesome dew to fall, whereof the indifferent meane sinners, sicke of the former dew, shall drinke and liue, Hos. 14.6.
- Fifthly, The Sunne shall be darkened thirtie dayes, and then receiue againe his light, whereby many shall embrace Judaisme.
- Sixthly, God, shall permit the Edomites (or Romans) to rule ouer all the world: but one especially at Rome shall raigne nine monethes ouer all the world, wasting large countries, laying heauie tributes vpon the Israelites. Then shall the Israelites haue no helper (as saith Esay 49.16.) But after nine months God shall send Messias Ben-Ioseph of the children of Ioseph, whose name shall be Nehemias, the sonne of Husiel. He shall come with the race of Ephraim, Manasse, Beniamin and Gad, and the Israelites hearing of it, shall flocke to him, as Jeremie sheweth, Conuert ye to the Lord, ye rebellious children, I will take ye, one of a Citie, and two of a Tribe, &c. This Messias shall ouerthrow the Edomites, and slay their King, and destroying the Empire, shall carrie to Ierusalem holy vessels, reserued in the house of Alian for a treasure. The King of Egypt also shall make peace with the Israelites, and shall kill the men about Ierusalem, Damascus, and Ascalon; the same whereof shall affright all the inhabitants of the earth.
- Seuenthly, There is at Rome a marble Image of a Virgin, not made by mans hand, to which shall resort all the wicked of the world, and shall incestuously conuerse therewith. Hence shall God frame an Infant in the same, which shall with breach of the marble come forth. This shall be named Armillus the wicked, the same which the Christians call Antichrist, of ten elles quantitie of breadth and length; a span-breadth betwene his eyes, which shall be red and deepe in his head; his haire yellow, the soles of his feet greene, deformed with two heads. Hee shall professe himselfe the Roman Messias and God, and shall be accepted of them. He shall bid them bring him the lath which he hath giuen them, which they shall bring with their Prayer-booke: he shall cause them to beleue in him; and shall send Embassadors to Nehemias the sonne of Hufiel, and to the people of Israel, commanding them also to bring him their Lawe, and to acknowledge him for God. Then shall Nehemias goe vnto Armillus with three hundred thousand Ephramites, carrying with him the booke of the Law; and when he comes at him, he shall reade out of the same this sentence, I am the Lord thy God, thou shalt haue none other Gods in my sight. Armillus shall reply, that there is no such sentence in their Law, and therefore they should acknowledge him for God, as well as the Gentiles. Then shall Nehemias ouerthrow two hundred thousand of Armillus his Armie; whereat Armillus shall be so wrathfull, that he shall assemble all his forces into a deepe valley, and there shall destroy (with many other Israelites) this Nehemias. But the Angels shall take and hide him, that Armillus may not know of his death, lest he should not leaue one of Israel liuing. All Nations shall then expell the Israelites, and such affliction shall befall them, as neuer since the beginning of the world. At this time shall the Angell Michael come forth, and separate the wicked from Israel, as writeth Daniel. They which remaine shall flie into the desert, and for fise and forty dayes space, liue with grasse, and leaues, and hearbes; but all the wicked Israelites shall die. Armillus shall after subdue Egypt, and shall turne thence against Ierusalem, and seeke againe to waste it. These things after their manner they fable out of the eleuenth and twelfth of Daniel.

The eighth Miracle is the arising of Michael, who three times shall winde his great horn, Es. 27. 13. and Zach. 9. 14. At the first sound, the true Messias Ben David, and Elias the Prophet, shall shew themselues to those deuout Israelites in the deserts of Iuda, who shall then gather courage: and all the Jews in the world shall heare this sound, and shall confesse Gods deliuerance, and all that haue beene led captiue into Assyria shall assemble together. The same horn shall strike feare and diseases into the Christians and other people. Now shall the Iewes make great iourneyes towards Ierusalem, and together with Elias and Messias shall come thither with ioy. Armillus hearing this, in his proude furie shall re-assemble his Christians against the Messias and Ierusalem. But God not suffering his people to fall out of one trouble into another, shall say to the Messias, Come place thy selfe at my right hand; and to the Israelites, Be still and waite for the great succour of the Lord this day. And then shall God raine fire and brimstone from heauen, as Ezekiel reporteth, wherewith Armillus and his armie shall die, and the house of Iacob shall be as fire, and the house of Ioseph as a flame, and the house of Esa (the Idumzean Atheists which destroyed Gods house) as stubble.

At the second sound or blast of this horn of Michael, the graues at Ierusalem shall open, and the dead arise, and Messias Ben David with Elias shall reuoke into life that Messias Ben Ioseph; and the Israelites shall send Messias Ben David into all countries of the Iewes dispersion, to cause them to come to Ierusalem; and the Nations with whom they are, shall bring them in their Chariots, and on their shoulders.

The last Miracle, is the third time of Michaels winding his horn, when God shall bring forth all the Iewes, which are by the Riuer Gosan, Lachbach, Chabor, and in the Cities of Iuda, and they without number or measure, shall with their infants enter into the Paradise of Moses; and the ground before them and behinde them shall be meere fire, which shall leaue no sustenance to the Christians. And when the ten Tribes shall depart out of the Nations, then the pillar of the cloude of Diuine glory shall compass them, and God shall goe before them, and shall open to them the fountaines flowing from the tree of life, Esa. 49. 10. I might adde to these miracles that of the Assie, which Abraham rode on when he went to sacrifice his sonne; which Moses also vsed when he returned into Egypt (and some say Balaams Assie was the same) this shall the Messias ride on according to Zacharies Prophecie, Zach. 9. 5.

Their cheere in these dayes shall be the greatest beasts, birds, and fishes, which God euer created; and no other wine then what grew in Paradise, and was kept in Adam Celler till that time: the great Oxe Behemoth mentioned in Job, and Psal. 50. 10. All the beasts of the wood are mine, and the beasts feeding on a thousand hills, that is, Behemoth which euery day feedeth on a thousand hills. But lest this deuouring beast should consume all the hills in the world, they tell you that he is a stalled Oxe, still abiding in the same place, and what he eateth in the day, groweth againe in the night. The huge Whale Leuiathan, or, as they pronounce it, Lipiasan, must honour also this Feast: of this they write in the Talmud; that to preuent filling the world with these huge monsters, God gelded the male Leuiathan, and the female is slaine, and preserued in pickle, for the iust, to be eaten in the times of the Messias, Esa. 27. The male Behemoth was gelded also, and the female was stored vp for this feast. Eliu Lenita reporteth of a huge huge bird, also called Barinuchne, to be roasted at this feast; of which the Talmud saith, that an egge sometime falling out of her nest, did ouerthrow and breake downe three hundred tall Cedars; with which fall the egge being broken, ouerflowed and carried away sixtie Villages. We will haue the Whetstone before we part. R. Barabananab saw a Frogge as big as Akra, a Village of sixtie households: then came a huger Serpent and swallowed that huge Frogge. Lastly, the hugest hugest Crow that euer the Rabbin saw, flew and deuoured these both; and flying away, sate on a tree, which tree sure could not be lesse then the three hundred Cedars before mentioned, if this Crow were but as bigge as that egge. R. Papa answereth, that he would neuer haue beleueed it, but that he saw it (I hope they will pardon vs if we be of the same mind). But would you not faine heare of a man, holding like proportion? then let R. Sam tell you of his adventures in the burying of a dead corps, where hee encountered with a bone of a man, into which there flew a Rauens, and the Rabbi would needes follow after, to see what became of her: and so, he went and he went, three leagues in the hollow of the same bone, and could finde no end thereof, and therefore returned: so he perceiued it was one of the bones of Og the Giant, whom Moses had slaine. Perhaps you will maruell how Moses could atchieue such an explot. Forsooth you must vnderstand that Moses was tenne cubits high, and had an Axe tenne cubits long, and leaped other ten cubits in the ayre, and so gaue the deadly blow to Og (who it seemes was laid along in some deepe Trench, or else you will thinke the Rabbin lied. Tush, your incredulitie makes you vnworthy to heare their storie of R. Osua, who beguiled the Angell of Death, of whom (when he came to smite him) he would in kindnesse needes learne his future place in Paradise; wherewith the deadly Angell was content; and went with him, yea, for his security, at his request resigned his deadly weapon into his hands. Thus at last they came at Paradise, where he shewed him his place: which he desirous to take better view of, required his helpe to lift him higher, and then with a quicke deliugre leapt into Paradise. Thus did the poore coufused Angel misse his prey, and was glad with much a-doo to recouer his sword from the Rabbin. And that you might see their skill, no lesse in Cosmographie then Theologie, another was carried to the place where heaven and earth meet, and kisse each other; where, whiles he might take the more diligent view in obseruing those parts (which the Frier of Oxford neuer saw, nor Faustus with his Mephosphiles) he hanged his Cloke on a window in beauen; and suddenly it was conueyed out of sight. Hereat amazed that there should be theues in beauen, a voyce tolde him it was the heauens motion, and at such an houre the next day he might attend, and againe obtaine his Cloke; which he did accordingly. But to take view of other strange creatures, make roome, I pray, for another Rabbi with his Bird; and a great deale of roome you will say is requisite: Rabbi Kimebi on the 50. Psalm auerreth out of Rabbi Iehudab, that Ziz is a bird so great, that with spreading abroad his wings, he hideth the Sunne, and darkeneth all the world. And (to leape back into the Talmud) a certaine Rabbi sayling on the Sea, saw a bird in the middle of the Sea, so high, that the water reached but to her knees; whereupon he wished his companions there to wash because it was so shallow; Doe it not (saith a voyce from heauen) for it is seuen yeares space since a Hatchet, by chance falling out of a mans hand in this place, and alwayes descending, is not yet come at the bottome. I perceiue by your incredulous smiles, you will scarce beleue<sup>m</sup> that a Lion in the wood Ela, roared so dernelly, that all the women in Rome (foure hundred miles from thence) for very horror proued abortiue; and when he came an hundred miles neerer, his terrible noyse shooke the teeth out of all the Romans heads; and the Emperour himselfe, that caused the Rabbi to obtaine of God by his prayer to make this triall of the Lion, fell downe from his Throne halfe dead: and with much importunity requested his helpe, to caute him retire to his den. But this roaring hath almost marred our feast.

Our wine you haue heard of, fetched out of Adams Celler, Esa. 27. 2. 3. and Psal. 75. 9. Before the feast, Messias will cause these prettie creatures, Behemoth and Leuiathan to play together, and make them sport; but when they haue wearied themselves in the fight, Messias with his sword shall kill them both, Esa. 27. 1. Then followeth the feast, and afterwards his marriage; <sup>o</sup> Kings daughters shall be among thine honourable women: A thy right hand standeth the Queene in the golde of Ophir. Amongst the Messias his excellent women (Rabbi Kimchi expoundeth) shall be Kings daughters, for euerie King shall repute it his owne glory to bestow a daughter on the Messias: but the true Queene shall be one of the fairest Israelites daughters, and shall continually conuerse with him, whereas the others must come onely at call. He shall thus beget children, which shall raigne after him, Esa. 53. 10. when he is dead.

Now the state of the Iewes in his time shall be such, that the Christians shall freely build them houses and Cities, and till their grounds, and bestow on them their goods; yea Princes shall serue them, and they shall walke in faire garments, Esa. 60. 10, 11, 12. and Esa. 61. 5. 6. The ayre also shall be new and wholesome, Esa. 65. 17. by the benefite whereof, they shall abide sound, and liue long, and in their age be as fresh as if they were young, Psal. 92. 14. 15. The Wheat once sown shall alway grow vp of it selfe, no other wise then the Vines, Hosea 14. 8. And if any shall desire any raine for his field, or garden, or one hearbe by it selfe, he shall haue it, Zach. 10. 11. Then shall be peace among men and beasts, Hos. 2. 19. Esa. 11. 7. If there arise any war among the Gentiles, the Messias shall accord them, Esa. 2. 4. They shall liue in great felicitie, full of the knowledge and praise of God. The earth shall be ful hereof, &c. The Talmud also speaketh of a thousand yeares wherein the world shalle be renewed (somewhat like the opinion of some Ancients in the Primitive Church) in which time the iust shall haue wings giuen them like Eagles, whereby they may flie ouer the face of the waters. But the bodies of the iust which shall rise againe, shall neuer returne to dust. Reiurs in this and many other of their absurdities, seekes to giue an allegoricall interpretation: but which of the Heathen haue not so patronized their superstitions and idolatries? as appeareth in the Poets, Philosophers, Chaldean and Egyptian Priests, whose mysticall learning cannot free their religions from being mysteries of iniquitie. Sixe thousand yeares the world endureth, saith R. Katina, and a thousand yeares shall be a desolation, and God onely shall be exalted in that day (for one thousand yeares is one day of the Lord) as it is written, A thousand years in thy sight are as yesterday; and this is a Sabbath, wherein shall be the feasting aboue mentioned. And thus did Elias affirme; as is said two thousand yeares the world was empty, two thousand the Law, & a thousand Messias; but for the sins of men that is wanting which we see wanting. (This last clause Reiurs saith is added by the Talmudists, who shal expect their Messias eighty five hundred yeares after the world endure, & in the last, saith this Elias shall come the son of Dauid.

Thus haue we heard the infancie of the Church in the time of her nonage, and of those Hebrew Patriarchs: wee haue scene also their present Infancie in these Iewish fables; the iust reward of Louing darknesse rather then light. And so with our prayers to God, at last to take that Veile of Moses from their hearts, that there may bee

One proper Shepheard, and one sheepsfold, and that mean-while, we may learne preciously to esteeme, and reuerently to make vse of that light we haue; warned by the spectacle of Diuine Iustice in them, through so many ages blinded in so palpable fooleries; we will now leaue them and this Holy Land, and seeke further what aduentures we shall light on in the next neighbouring Nation, hoping and crauing for pardon of such prolixitie in this part of our Discourse, fittest, of all the other in this part of our worke, to be considered.

CHAP. XXI.

Of the hopes and hinderances of the Iewes Conuersion.

When I had now (as I thought) brought this Jewish Relation to an end, and euen wearied the Reader with that which might much more wearie the Writer: that Prophecie of Paul, That all Israel shall be saved, &c. which by most Interpreters is construed of the generall conuersion of that Nation, after the fulnesse of the Gentiles be come in (as in the beginning of this Worke is said) caused my straying penne (ready to wander from these, so farre wandering from their holy Progenitors) to vndertake this taske, also to declare, what future hopes, and what present feares and lets may be conceiued of their conuersion to Christianity. The hope (though it be yet tossed vpon surges of almost desperate Seas, yet) hath Anchoram sacram, a sure Anchor to relie on, and a kinde of obscure kenning of that wished-for Hauen, where it would be. For Non ita perirunt ad unum Iudai, vt nulla super sit de illorum salute spes. The destruction of the Iewes (saith Peter Martyr) is not so desperate, but that there is some hope left of their salvation. And a little after (alluding to the Apostles mysterie) (cum enim plenitudo fuerit iam ad Christum conuersa ex Gentibus, tunc & Israelita accedent: For when there shall haue been a full conuersion of the Gentiles vnto Christ, then shall the Iewes also come in. So Chrysostome; Quia subintravit plenitudo Gentium, in nouissimo saluabitur uniuersa Israel; because the fulnesse of the Gentiles hath come in, at last all Israel shall be saved. The same hope is generally cherished by the rest of the Fathers: yet doth indeed depend more vpon Diuine goodnesse then on humane probability; the stability of his Truth, which hath promised (as Paul also Rom. II. expoundeth the former Prophets) the vchangeablenesse of Gods Election; the bottomlesse Sea of his Mercies, the vsearchablenesse of his Iudgements, minister hope beyond hope. Heereunto also may be added the common grounds, both of Reason, which they holde with vs in Nature; and of the Scripture, the auncienter partes whereof, and especially the Lawe of Moses, they maintaine with equall acknowledgement, and (for the most part) with more forward industrie and zeale, then doe the commoner sort of Christians.

But the impediments which haue hitherto, and do yet with-hold them from Christianity, doe excede in number and power. For that fore-stalled preiudice of theirs, the glory of the Temple, the sacrifices and legall worships past, their hopes then and still of such a Monarch to their Messias, as you haue heard of, the splendour of their renowned Ancestors, the keeping of the Diuine Oracles, their peculiar title of being Gods people, haue bred in them such a swelling pride, that they naturally enuie and abhorre the very thought thereof, that the Gentiles should in these things eyther equall or succede them.

Sooner (saith Martin Luther) then they would endure that the Gentiles (which in their daily prayers they curse and reuile) should haue any part with them in their Messias, and be accounted co heires thereof, they would crucifie ten Messias: yea (if it were possible) would doe to death God himselfe, with all the Angels and creatures else, although they should therefore vndergoe a thousand helles.

Hence, in a great part, proceedeth their naturall and long continued obstinacie. And besides that preiudice, pride, and enuie, they are not a little scandalized from the Christians

ftians themfelues, somewhat in regard of the mutuall differences and difagreements among Proteftants; which, though in it felfe bad, is made much worfe by the vnreaſonable and vnreaſonable exaggeration of their common aduerſarie, the Papiſt: but more, in reſpect of thoſe which call themſelves Catholikes, and are not, but even by theſe men are found to be manifeſt Idolaters. <sup>d</sup> A ſcandall it is to ſee Gods Law neglected, and manſ executed with rigour: a greater matter, at ſome times to eate fleſh, then the adulterous pollution of the fleſh at any time: the blaſphemies of ſome Nations; theſe being interiections to the vulgar, and phraſes of gallantrie to the Princes: the forging and packing of miracles; wherein the Friers and Iewes concur with equall diligence, the one in contriuing, the other in diſcouering them. A ſcandall are the alterations which they are forced by the Inquiſitors to make in their Authors and Monuments of Antiquitie: thinking, that theſe deuifes are our beſt euidences. A ſcandall is the vowing and praying to Angels and Saints, yea, more to the Mother of Chriſt, then to Chriſt himſelfe, or to God, to whom alone they repute this a due ſacrifice. But the greateſt ſcandall of all others, is the worſhipping of Images. Indee it ſeemed ſtrange to me, and doth to the reſt of my Brethren: according to the fleſh, (Nathaniel a Jew borne, baptiſed in London, before the Congregation at All-hallowes made this confeſſion) euen vnto this day, in whom this blindneſſe and hardneſſe of heart in part continued, through occaſion given by them that profeſſe the name of Ieſus: and not only in vs, which are of the houſe of Iſrael, but in others, as the Turkes and Mahumetanes, which are of the race of Iſmael. We and our Fathers and Elders ſay, and in our bookes call them by no other name, but Baile abodazara, Idolatrous Maſters: a thing ſo deteſtable vnto vs, as nothing more, &c. They ſay vnto vs oftentimes, that they doe not worſhip them as Gods, but God in them: Neither are the Heathen, we ſay, that are round about vs, ſo blinded, that they thinke the ſtocks and ſtones to be God, but they are perſwaded that God may be worſhipped in them. And yet they goe farther: for the Chriſtians in Spaine and Portugall haue it written in their Bookes, That the Virgin Marie is the Lords Treafure, and that ſhee beſtowes gifts and graces vpon her ſeruants: That her mercie pardoneth them, whom the Iuſtice of her Sonne might condemne, and that our ſaluation lyeth in her hands. But our Law teacheth, That God is All ſufficient, hee giueth to whom hee liſteth, Hee will not give his glorie to another, &c. The Reader may (if he pleaſe) from that Jew himſelfe, in his printed Confeſſion, be further informed of that Partition-wall, which ſeparateth the Jew and Catholike.

They are ſo much the more ſcandalized, when they ſee the Catechiſmes recite the Decalogue, with omiſſion of that ſecond Commandement; which they thinke (as one of their greateſt Rabbines conteſted with our <sup>e</sup> Author) was the Ordinance of Chriſt himſelfe. Yea, the Priests and Friers let paſſe in their Conferences with them for current, their Iewiſh vpbraidings, That Chriſt, a Carpenters Sonne, was an Image-maker, or at leaſt an Author of their worſhipping. As for thoſe ſpeculative plaſters of σωαία and αγαπία, of intention instrumentall and finall in worſhip, of Images of the true, and Idols of the falſe Gods, they are (as euen now you heard) the vnſauoureſt dregs to the Jew in the world.

The poore Idiot, among the Chriſtians, can as little diſtinguiſh as the Pagan, and both amongſt the Chriſtians is like honour done to Gods Image, and to that of Saints, and to them both, in like forme of worſhip, as amongſt the Pagans. They are forced to be at ſome Sermons, and there are well edified by their hearing, when they ſee the Preacher direct his prayer to a Crucifixe, calling it his Lord and Saniour. Their Tranſubſtantiation is a monſter as hideous as the former.

The meanes vſed to their conuerſion are weak; eſpecially in ſome places, where they haue not the New Teſtament in ſuch Language as they can vnderſtand: and the Inquiſitors haue inhibited and taken from them all bookes written on that Theame, in defence of Chriſtian Religion, or againſt it, alledging, they will haue no diſputing in matters of Religion either way, like the Ieſuites Ediſt at Dola, forbidding all talke of God, either in good ſort or in bad.

But of all other this is a good furtherance, that when in their Baptiſme they denie

the Devil and all his works; they must renounce their right and propertie in all their goods and possessions; the shamefull covetousnesse of hypocriticall Christians having brought these irritamenta malorum within the compasse of the Devils works: presuming (forsooth) that either the converted Jew, or his corrupt ancestors, have scraped together such heaps of wealth by vsurie, or oppression, or some unlawfull meanes or other. Therefore for the good of his soule, his body shall bee left to begge or starue; while, with the leauing of his Jewish superstition, hee must likewise leaue all that he hath: and his new-receiued Religion must be a meanes to strip him of his riches, and to weane him from his well-beloued Mammon, which that Nation is naturally so fast in loue with. This alone, to the world-bewitched Jew, is such a partition-wall to keepe him from Christianitie, that he will venture soule and all, rather then thus betray himselfe, his wife and children, to extreme beggerie and want. And so much the worse, saith Victor Carbenus, one of these conuerts, because in their Jewish estate they had not learned any arte which now might minister vnto them substance: Thus are they driuen to begge from dore to dore for their foode, exposed not only to this extremity of want, but to the opprobries also of vnchristian Christians, who Jewishly hate the name of a Jew, nor can the Jew be washed from it with the sacred tincture of Baptisme, scumme of the irreligious religious vulgar, which scoffe and point at them, saying there goes a baptised Jew (a name best fitting themselves) while on the other side their owne Countrey-men hate and abhorre them as Apostataes, Renegadoes, and Legitiues. And if any shew them kinder intertainment, yet (as a nine-dayes wonder) it lasteth but a little while, whereof the Jewes haue this prouerbe, A new conuert is as a new or cleane cloth: which at first is pleasant, but after a little wearing groweth soke and loathsome. Especially since the fairest of his preferment (to welcome him to our Religion) is to turne Frier: then which profession, nothing can be more hatefull to him, who accounteth it a course against Nature; and a breach of that Ordinance of God, (Crescite & multiplicamini) of multiplying the world by a holy propagation in the honorable estate of Marriage, which that doctrine of Devils hath made the Frier vncapable of. As for the example of Elias, and some other holy Men (whom our Popish Votaries would make Patrones of their disorderly Orders;) the Jew (hence more truly-Christian then the Papist) holdeth it a course extraordinarie, and ordinarily preferreth holy Marriage farre before that seeming-holy Vow of Virginity.

Thus wee see what outward scandalls, besides their generall preiudice against Christianitie, doe hinder them from it: which offences, in behalfe of the Christians, together with that preiudice, Pride, and Enuie, and aboue all, that Veile which Diuine Iustice hath left vpon their hearts, God in his good time remoue, and grant, according to that Prophecie,
 be saved.*

Of ARABIA, and of the ancient Religions, Rites, and Customes thereof.

ARABIA is a very large Region, <sup>a</sup> lying between two Bayes or Gulfses of the Sea, the Persian on the East, and that which hereof is called the Arabian, on the West : On the South is the Ocean ; on the North is Syria and Euphrates. <sup>b</sup> Plinie sets downe the Northerne Limits, the Hill Amanus, ouer against Cilicia and Commagena ; many Colonies of them being there planted by Tigranes the Great : it thence (saith he) declineth to our Sea and the Egyptian shore, and to the heart of Syria to Mount Libanus. By a certaine workmanship of Nature it much resembleth the forme and site of Italie.

Tract of Land are many. It is the next to be spoken of in this our Discourse, according to our Geographickall methode, as confining vpon Iudæa, whence we last departed.

and Ishbak and Shuah, with their posteritie, the issue of Abraham by Keturah: who, after that Seba and Sabbetha, and Rama and Sabibeca, had peopled some parts of Arabia, were sent away with their portions Eastward to the East Countrey, that is, into Arabia; where it is likely they mingled their Seede and Generations with those former of the posteritie of Cham: for therefore it seemeth Moses wife, Zipporah, was called a Cushite, or (as some read) an Ethiopian, not that shee was of the Countrey Ethiopia in Africa, but a Midianite of Arabia, of Abrahams race: which Countrey, because the posteritie of Cush had first inhabited, and happily had mingled themselves in marriages with them, shee is called a Cushite, which some wrongly expound an Ethiopian, if they vnderstand it properly; although Cush were also the Father of the Ethiopians. But of this name Ethiopia sometimes taken more largely, otherwhiles more straitned, you shall see more in our seventh Booke, the first Chapter. This posteritie of Abraham are, in Scripture, often called the children of the East. The many names of the Arabian Nations, they which will may read in Plinie and others.

The name Felix, or Happie, is giuen to the Southerly parts of Arabia, for the fertility thereof: the name Petraa to a second part, of Petra the seat Royall, after called Arach, of Aretas an Arabian King.

The Desert Arabia hath a name answerable to the nature thereof; being, in great part, without Inhabitants, for the barrenesse of the soile: as is also a great part of that which is called Petraa. This Desert Arabia is also called Astera, Inferior, Cana, and of the Hebrewes Cedar. It is bounded on the East with Babylonia, and part of the Persian Gulfe; on the North with Mesopotamia, neare to Euphrates; on the West, with Syria and Arabia Petraa; on the South, are the Mountaines of Arabia Felix. Neare to them and to Euphrates it hath some Townes, and is frequented with Merchants, otherwhere partly vnpeopled, partly (Strabo therefore termeth it Scenitis) fed with such Roving Arabians, as haue no dwelling-houses, but remoue to and fro, seeking where to finde pasture for their Beasts, and lodge in Tents.

David accounteth himselfe miserable for this dwelling in the Tents of Kedar, or (as Tremellins reades it) as the Scenites of Kedar. Thus did the Patriarchs of old, thus did the Scythians, and thus doe the Tartars and the Arabians in Asia, Africa, and Europe, at this day, roving, robbing: and therefore the Iewes call the Tartarians Kedarim, because of their like course of life.

They which dwell in Townes and Cities, obseruing a more ciuill life, are called Moorees, the other Arabians, in more proper appellation. The name Moorees was giuen them of the Spaniards, because out of Mauritania they invaded Spaine, and now is taken vsually, not so much for the Inhabitants of the Arabian Cities, as for all of the Arabian and Mahumetan superstition. Bosra is the chiefe Citie.

Arabia Petraa adioyneth on the West and North of Syria; on the East to the Desert Arabia; on the South to the Happie. Plinie, Strabo, and Ptolemie, call it Nabathæa. Some thinke, of Nebaioth, sonne of Ishmael. Tyrinus calls it Arabia Secunda. Now it is called by Ruscelli, Baraah; or after Ziglerus, Barra; or Bathalatha, after Castaldus. Ptolemie ascribeth the Hill Casius hereto: which saith he, is so high, that from the fourth watch of the night, or the last quarter thereof, it sheweth the Sunne rising. But Nonius Pintianus correcteth him, saying, there are two Casii, the one of Syria, the other of Arabia, and that this report is to bee applyed to the Syrian Casius; wherein Schottus is of another minde.

Nigh to Syria it is more plentifull, then in other parts. The scarcitie of wood and water, with the barrenesse of the soile in other places, shew how it is maligne of the Elements. Both in this part, and the former, they had neede goe strong and well accompanied, for feare of robbetrie and spoile, which the Arabians attend.

This part is famous vnto all Generations, not so much for the Amalekites, Midianites, and other their bordering Neighbours (of whom and their Religion somewhat is spoken before) as for the miraculous passage of the Israelites through the same, and abode therein fortie yeares, in which time they receiued the Law, were fed with Manna; their Meat, Drinke, Clothing, Iudgements, Mercies, continually yeelding miraculous euidence of Gods presence amongst them.

Bellonius visited the Mount Sinai: he saith, it is a mile and a halfe from Horeb, and farre higher: from whose top, (which is hard stone of yron colour) may both shores of the Red Sea be seen. This Sea is not therefore called Red, because either the ground, or the sand, or the water thereof is Red, as Bellonius hath observed, for none of them are so. The people thereabouts take care for no other houses then the boughes of Palme-trees, to keepe them from the heate of the Sunne (for raine they haue but seldom:) the cattell are lesse there then in Egypt. In the ascent of Mount Sinai are steps cut out in the Rock: they beganne to ascend it at breake of day, and it was after noone before they could get to the Monasterie of Maronite Christians, which is on the top thereof. There is also a Meschit there for the Arabians and Turkes, who resort thither on pilgrimage as well as the Christians. There is a Church also on the top of Mount Horeb, and another Monasterie at the foot of the Hill: besides other Monasteries, wherein liue religious people, called Caluier, obseruing the Greeke rites who shew all (and more then all) the places renowned in Scriptures and Antiquities to Pilgrims. They eat neither flesh nor white meates. They allow foode vnto strangers such as it is, rice, wheat, beanes, and suchlike, which they set on the floore without a cloth, in a wooden dish, and the people compose themselves to eat the same, after the Arabian manner, (which is to sit vpon their heeles touching the ground with their toes, whereas the Turkes sit crosse-legged like Taylors.) There is extant an Epistle of Engenius Bishop of M. Sinai, written 1569. to Charles the Archduke, wherein hee complaineth that the Great Turke had caused all the reuenues of the Churches and Monasteries to bee sold: whereby they were forced to pledge their holy vessells, and to borrow on vsurie.

Arabia Felix trendeth from hence Southwards, hauing on all parts the Sea: against which is dorth about the space of three thousand fise hundredeth and foure miles. Vngul calls it Panchza, now Ayaman, or Giamah. This seemeth to be the Countrie wherein Saba stood, chiefe Citie of the Sabzans, whose Queene visited Salomon: for so the Iewes reckon, howsoeuer the Abassines challenge her to themselves. Aben Ezra on Dan. 11. calls this Saba Aliman or Alieman: and Salmanticensis, Ieman, which is all one (for all is but the article) signifying the South: as the Scriptures also call her Queene of the South. For so it was situate, not to Iudaea alone, but to the Petraan and Desert Arabia. The name Seba or Saba agreeth also with the name of Sheba, Gen. 10. 7. As for Sheba the Nephew of Abrabam by Keturah, it is like he was founder of the other Seba or Saba in Arabia Deserta, the elder posteritie of Chush hauing before seated themselves in the more fertile Southerne Countrie: and because both peoples, these in Arabia and those in Africa were comprehended vnder one generall name of Ethiopia, hence might those of Africa take occasion to vsurpe the Antiquities of the other. Yea it is more likely that these Abassens in Africa 1000. yeares after that Queene was buried were seated in Arabia, and thence passed in later ages into Africa, subduing those Countreies to them. For so hath Stephanus, Abassini idus Arabias: p. rti Zu Bais. The Abassens (so we now call those Ethiopians in the Empire of Prishyur Iohn) are a Nation of Arabia, beyond the Sabzans: so that out of Arabia they carried this Tradition with them, as it is likely, into Africa, where want of learning, and plentie of superstition, hath so increased their Legend of this Queene, as we shall after heare. Beniam. Itiner. Tudolensis writeth likewise that the Region of Seba is now called the Land of Aliman, and that it extendeth sixteene dayes iourneis alongst the Hills: In all which Region there were of those Arabians; which had no certaine dwellings but wandred vp and downe in Tents, robbing the neighbour Nations (as is also reported of the Saracens neare Mecca, which gouernement of Mecca Salmanticensis adioyneth to that of Aliman, or the Kingdome of Saba: for so, saith he, the Iewes in those parts still call the chiefe Citie of that Kingdome. It hath store of Riuer, Lakes, Townes, Cities, Cattel, fruits of many sorts. The chiefe Cities are Medina, Mecca, Ziden, Zebit, Aden. Beniam. addeth Theima or Themian, a Citie walled fifteen miles square, enclosing ground forillage in the walls. Tilmaas also, Chibar and others. There is store of siluer, gold, and varietie of gemmes. There are also wilde beasts of diuers kindes. As for the Phoenix, because I (and not I alone) thinke it a fable, as neither agreeing to reason nor likelihood, lihood, and plainly disagreeing to the Historie of the Creation and of Noahs Ark, in both which God made all Male and Female, and commanded them to increase and multiply, I thinke it not worthie recitall. One wonder of Nature done in Abis a City of this Region, will not, I thinke, be distastfull: cited by Photinus out of Diodorus Siculus, written in some part of his workes which is now wanting. One Diophrantus a Macedonian being married to an Arabian woman in that Citie Abis, had by her a daughter called Herais, which in her ripe age was married to one Samiades, who having lived a yeare with her, did after trauell into farre Countries. In the meane time, his wife was troubled with an vncouth and strange disease: a swelling arose about the bottome of her belly, which on the seventh day breaking, there proceeded thence those parts whereby Nature distinguisheth men from the other sexe: which secrets shee kept secret notwithstanding, continuing her womans habite till the returne of her husband. Who then demanding the companie and dutie of his wife, was repelled by her father, for which he sued him before the Iudges, where Herais was forced to shew that which before her modestie had forbidden her to tell: and afterwards naming himselfe Diophrantus serued the King in his warres, with the habite, and heart of a man, and leaving her feminine weakenesse, as it seemed, to her husband, who in the impatience of his loue slue himselfe. Our Author addeth also, that by the helpe of the Physicians, such perfection was added to this worke of Nature, that nothing remaind to testifie her had beene a woman: he annexeth also like examples in some others.

Ludonicus Vertomanus, or Barthema (as Ramusius nameth him) tells * at largely journey through all this threefold Arabia: hee trauelled from Damasco to Mecca Anno 1503. with the Caravan of Pilgrims and Marchants, being often by the way set vpon by Armies of those Theuifish and Beggerly Arabians. This journey is of five dayes trauell, traunning two and twentie houres, and resting two for their repast. After many dayes they came to a Mountayne inhabited with lewes, ten or twentie miles in circuit, which went naked, and were of small stature about five or sixe spanes high, black of colour, circumcised, speaking with a womanish voice. And if they get a Moore in their power, they slay him aliue. They saw there certaine white thornes, and in the same two Turtles, which seemed to them as a miracle: for in fifteene daies and nights they had neither seene Birds nor Beasts. They giue their Camells by the way not aboue five Barly loaves at a meale, as bigge as a Pomegranate, and drinke once in three dayes. At the end of eight dayes they stayed a day or two to rest then. Their Pilot directed their journey by the Compasse (in Diodorus times, they obserued the North-starre) no lesse then if it had beene at Sea. They trauelled five dayes and nights through the sandie Sea, which is a great plaine Champaine, full of a small white sand like meale: where if, by some disalter, the winde blow from the South they are all dead men. And although they had the winde at North, yet could they not see one another aboue ten paces off. And such as ride on Camells are inclosed with wood, with holes to receiue the aire; the Pilots going before with their Compasse for direction. Many dyed there for thirst, and many with fulnesse, drinking too much when once they came at water. When the North windes blow, those that are driuen to a heape. Hee supposed that Mummia was made of such as the sand had surprised and buried quick: but the truer Mummia is made of embalmed bodies of men, as they vse to doe in Egypt, and other places. For I haue read, not only of Women, but Infants also, (which were not likely to take such dangerous iourneys) whose bodies haue beene thus vsed to Mummia. As for the other parts of Arabia, they which list, may by this our Author, by Plinie, Niger, and others, be informed further.

To come to the disposition of the people, they are small, naked, beggerly. What they haue done in Asia, Afrike, and Europe, by force of Armes, vnder the name of Saracens, and pretence of Religion, shall follow in the next Chapter: What they still doe, if they meete with purchase, Trauellers know to their cost. The practise of Marchandise amongst some of the Arabian people, and namely the Ismaelites, the b Scripture recordeth. For their ancient Religion, it is not like it could bee good, when as they had so bad an Author of their stock, accursed Cham; the sonnes of Abraham were better better instructed: but as they were borne after the flesh, and not according to promise, so if they and some of their posteritie did a while hold the Truth, (as the Historie of Iob and his friends euinceth) yet this lasted not long: but soone after * in Iewrie was God * Psal. 96. 1 & knowne, and he deals not so with any other Nation. Herodotus * (Father of the Greeke 147. 10. Historie) affirmeth in his Thalia, that the Arabians worshipped Dionysius, whom they a Herodot. l. 3. named Urotals; and Vrania, whom they called Alilat: these alone they esteemed Gods. They shaued their Maidens like to Dionysius, in a round forme about the temples. Suidas telleth b that they were excellent Archers, their Arrowes were as long as b Suid. Hist. themselves: their Bowes they bent not with hands, but with feet.

Curio c in his Saracenicall Historie testifieth of them, that as they descended in great c Celcius Aug. Chirio Hist. Sar. lib. 1. part of Abrahams race by Ishmael, the sonnes of Keturab, and by Esau: so they of old had and still retaine many rites obserued by the Hebrews: as numbring by Tribes, and marrying only within their owne Tribe: every Tribe also had their owne King, (which it seemeth the Tent-wandering or Scenite. Arabians obserue still.) That sonne succeedeth not which is eldest, but he which is borne first after he is proclaimed King or Ruler, being of Noble race on both sides. They vsed also Circumcision. For their Religion in old times; some were Christians, of which (about the times of Mabomet) there were many sects: some were Iewes; others worshipped the Sunne and Moone: others, certaine Serpents; others, some kindes of Trees; and some a Tower called Alcaba, which they supposed Ishmael had built; and some others, some other Deities. d Clemens Alexandrinus obiecteth to the ancient Scythians the worship of a Sword, d Clem. Alex. Paran. to the Persians the like deuotion to a Riuer, adding that the Arabians worshipped a Stone. e Arnobius hath also the same testimonie, explaining that stone to bee rude e Arnob. l. 6. and vnformed, a fit Deitie for rude, stonie, senselesse worshippers.

Eusebius f tells that they vsed humane sacrifices, which not only Sardus confirmeth, f Euseb. de laudib. Constant. Sardus l. 2. c. 15. saying, that they sacrificed euery yeare a child whom they buried vnder the Altar: but Nicephorus g also reported of one Naaman a Scenite. Arabian, a Chieftaine amongst g Niceph. Hist. Eccle. l. 18. c. 23. them, who in zeale of that superstition, killed men with his owne hands, and sacrificed them on the Altars to his Gods. He in the time of Mauricinus, warned by a vision, became a Christian, and with him an innumerable companie of his, whom he offered a li- uing vnbloudie sacrifice in baptisme vnto Christ.

When they entered league with any, their manner was, that one standing in the midst betweene both parties did wound the hand with a sharpe stone, in the palme, neare to the thummes of them both, and taking flocks of the garments of them both, annoint- ing with that blood, seuen stones set in the midst of them: Meane while inuoking Dio- nysius and Vrania: and then this Mediator becommeth suretie for the partie, who ther- by esteemeth himselfe bound to obserue it. And thus did h they make league with Cam- h Herod. l. 3. byses. To these two Arabian Gods, Great Alexander would haue added himselfe a third (saith i Arrianus, in his life.) He made great provision to inuade them, both be- i Arrian. l. 7. cause they had sent him no Embassage, and for that they worshipped only these two Deities, Heauen, for that it containeth the sunne and starres; and Dionysius, because he had invaded the Indians: and therefore equalling this his owne expedition to that of Dionysius, he would also for robbing of men, be reckoned a God. Strabo k saith, that in k Strabo. l. 15. respect of the wealthinesse of this Countrie, hee had thought (had not death prevented him) to haue made Arabia the Imperiall seate. Hee affirmeth also that Sesostris the Egyptian King, passing through Arabia, in that his renowned expedition, erected there in diuers places Egyptian temples and superstitions: that the Troglodytz which dwell in Caves, and bordering on the Egyptians, by some reputed Arabians, were circumci- sed as the Arabians and Egyptians were. Circumcision in Arabia.

The Nabathazans worship the Sunne, burning Frankincense on an Altar vnto him. They neglect the bodies of the Dead, burying euen their Kings in a dung-hill. Of the other Arabians hee reporteth that they vsed incestuous copulation with Sister and Mother. Adulterie with them is death: but that only is Adulterie, which is out of the same Kindred, otherwise all of the same blood to vse the Woman is their (ince- stuous) honestie. When fiteene brothers (Kings Sonnes) had by their continuall com- panie tyred their one and only sister, shee deuised a meanes to rid her selfe, or at least to ease her somewhat of that trouble. And therefore whereas the custome was, that hee which went in, left his staffe at the doore to prohibite others entrance, shee goe like staues, and alway hauing one at the doore, was disburthened of their importunitie; euery one that came, thinking some other had bene there before them. But they being once altogether, one of them stole from his fellowes, and finding this staffe at the doore, accused his sister to his Father of Adulterie, whereof by discouerie of the Truth shee was cleared. Linschoten k telleth of the like practise obserued by the Nam in Cochin, leauing their Armes at the doore, when they enter to their Nairo-Kindred men which they vse likewise in common, being neuer married.

Their Circumcision they obserued, as l some write, at the thirteenth yeare of their age, imitating Ismael herein. Euery one abideth in his Fathers profession. The possessions and wealth are common to the whole kindred. Alexander ab Alexandri nameth Dyasares an Arabian Deitie. Their Priests he saith were attired in linnen garments, with Mitres and Sandals. m Solinus affirmeth, that they abstaine from Swines flesh: neither will that sweet aire of Arabia breath life to that sordide and stinking creature. This is in the Happie Arabia, where happinesse maketh them vnhappy: their sweets n breeding bitter effects in diseasing their bodies, which they are forced to cure with the sents of brimstone, and Goates beards burnt. That which others admire and almost adore for rarenesse and excellencie, is here their common sewell for their fire. o Vulcans deuouring iawes being fed with hearbs, shrubs, trees, gummes, spices, for humane and diuine uses most esteemed.

Frankincense (saith p Plinius) groweth only in Arabia, but not in euery place thereof. About the midst of the Countrey is Sabota (the chiefe Citie of the Sabazans) in a high Mountayne: eight Mansions from thence is the Region of Frankincense, which is called Sabba, that is, a mysterie: looking toward the East, euery way guarded and made vnpassable with Rocks. The soile is reddish, inclining to white. The length of the Frankincense-wood, is twentie schani, the bredth halfe as much, (a schanu in this account is fise miles.) Other Arabians besides these and the Minzi see not this tree, nor all of these, but only some three hundred Families, vnto whom the right of these rites deuolueth by succession. Therefore are they called Sacri, Holy, neither may they in the time, when they cut them, be polluted with knowledge of Women or wile Funerals. What manner of tree it is, Plinie saith he knew not, nor any Roman to his knowledge. They gathered it in the Spring and Autumne: they cut the trees from whence it sweateth. There needes no watch to keepe them, but the innocencie of the Inhabitants. When Alexander in his youth bestowed large store of Frankincense in his deuotions, Leonides his Master told him, he should so doe when he had conquered the Countrey where it grew: He after enioying (some part of) Arabia, sent him a ship laden with Frankincense, and bad him serue the Gods plentifully. The Frankincense, when it is gathered, is carried on Camels to Sabota by one way, out of which to goe were capitall. There they pay the tithes to a God which they call Sabir. The Priests take it by measure, not by weight. Certaine portions are allowed to them and to the Kings Scribes. Plinius therefore q calls Frankincense Odor Arabicus. Virgil call it Panchean, and Sabean Frankincense. The manifold rites which the Heathens vsed in their holy things with this drugges, Stuckius r sheweth at large. Here also groweth Myrrhe in the same woods, and among the Trogloditz. But this and Cinamon, and other things which grew elsewhere as well as here, neede not much discourse. They vsed yet some Religion in gathering of their Cinamon, as f some obserue, sacrificing before they beganne, and after diuiding what they had gathered, with a sacred Speere assigning a portion to the Sunne: if the diuision bee iustly made, the Sunne sealeth his consent by fire, with his beames consuming the same. Thus much of their spices, and holy drugges.

Of their other riches I meane not to speake, saue of their sheepe with great tailes, some of which weigh fortie pound. t Leo, saith he, saw one at Cairo, whose taile, supported by a Cart with wheelles (for else shee could not haue carried it) weighed fourescore pound, and heard of such as weighed a hundred and thirtie pound. u Paul, presently after his conuersion preached the Gospell in Arabia.

Panchas

Panchæa, and another Island, called Sacra, are adioyned by <sup>u</sup> Diodorus to Arabia, both fertile (as he saith) of Frankincense. In Panchæa is the Citie Panara, whose Inhabitants are called the Ministers of Iupiter Triphylus, whose Temple is thence distant threescore furlongs, admirable for the Antiquitie, magnificence and nature of the place: it is two hundred foot long, the breadth answerable, having in it large Statues, and about it the houses of the Priests. Many Fountaines there springing make a navigable streame, called the water of the Sunne, which is medicinable to the bodie. The countrey about, for the space of two hundred furlongs, is consecrated to the gods, and the reueneue thereof spent in sacrifices. Beyond is a high mountaine, called the seate of heauen, and Olympus Triphylus: where Cælus is said to haue instituted the rites there yearly obserued. The Priests rule all in Panchæa, both in ciuill and religious cases: and liue very deliciously, attired with linnen stoales and mitres, and party-coloured sandals. These spend their time in singing Hymnes, and recounting the acts of their gods. They deriue their generation from the Cretan Iupiter. * They may not go out of their sacred limits assigned them, if they doe, it is lawfull to kill them. The Temple is enriched with gifts and offerings. The doores excell for matter and workmanship. The bed of the god is sixe cubits long, and foure broad, all of gold faire wrought. The Table stands by, nothing inferiour. In the midst is another bed of gold, very large, grauen with Egyptian letters; in which are contained the gests of Iupiter, Cælus, Diana and Apollo, written by Mercurie. Thus farre Diodorus. Iustine mentioneth Hierotimus an Arabian King, which had sixe hundred children by Concubines. Some <sup>2</sup> are of opinion that the Wise-men which by the ancient conduct of a Starre came to Ierusalem, (the first fruits of the Gentiles) came out of Arabia. Scaliger <sup>2</sup> mentioneth a conquest anciently made and holden by the Arabians in Chaldæa. Philostrophus <sup>b</sup> saith, the Arabians are skilfull in Auguries, or diuinations, because they eat of the head and heart of a Dragon. That they eat Serpents, Solinus affirmeth. Athenæus <sup>c</sup> saith, That the Arabians vsed to maim themselves, if their King happened to bee maimed, and that in the same member: and in <sup>d</sup> another place he citeth out of Heraclides Cymeus, the delicacies of this Arabian King, and his quiet or idle course of life, committing matters of iudgement to Officers: and if any thinke himselfe wronged by them, he pulls a chaine fastened to a window in the highest part of the Pallace: Whereupon the King takes the matter into his hand, and whether part he findeth guiltie dieth for it. His expences were fifteene Babylonian Talents a day. The Arabians kill <sup>e</sup> Mice, as a creature supposed enemie to the gods, a custome common to them with the Persians and Ethiopians. The <sup>f</sup> women couer their faces, contented to see with one eie, rather then to prostitute the whole face. They kill not vipers, but scarre them away with Clappers from their Balsame-trees, saith <sup>g</sup> Pausanias, when they gather that commoditie, because they thinke them consecrated to those Balsame-trees, vnder which they liue and feed of that liquor, with which also they cure themselves if they are bitten by them.

The Arabike tongue is now the common language of the East, especially among such as embrace the Mahumetan religion: this language in the first diuision of tongues, according to <sup>h</sup> Epiphanius, was begun in Armot, the first speaker and Author thereof. It is now the most vniuersall in the world, as Bibliander, Positellus, Scaliger, and Claude Duret in his late Historie, des Origines des Langues de cest vniuers, doe proue at large, from the Herculean Pillars to the Molluccas, and from the Tartars and many Turkes in Europe, vnto the Ethiopians in Africke, extending it selfe, which was neuer granted to any other language, since that first confusion and babbling at Babel.

Of the Saracene Name, Nation, and proceeding in Armes.

He Arabians are distinguished by many fir-names, the chiefe whereof (saith <sup>a</sup> Scaliger) are the Hagarens (so called of Hagar the hand-maid of Sara) whom the Arabians call Erabelbagiari, and Elmagarin; and the Saracens still called by their neighbours Essarak, that is, theeuish. The Hagarens were more ciuill, whose chiefe hold was Petra, and their Princes were all entituled Areta, as the Egyptians Ptolemai. Hinnu in many places affirmeth, that the Ismaelites, and Hagarens are the same which now are called Saracens: so in his Commentarie on the second of Jeremie, Cedar (saith <sup>b</sup> he) is the Region of the desert and of the Ismaelites, whom now they call Saracens. And on the 25. of Ezechiel, the Madianites, Ismaelites and Agarens, are now called Saracens. And on Esay 21. hee extendeth their desert from India to Mauritania, and to the Atlantike Ocean. <sup>c</sup> Epiphanius likewise affirmeth, That the Hagarens and Ismaelites in his time were called Saracens.

Plinie <sup>d</sup> mentioneth the Saracens: placing them neere to the Nabathzans. Ptolemy <sup>e</sup> likewise nameth the Scenites, so called of their tents, which with themselves, their flockes, and substance, they remoued vp and downe from place to place. Post <sup>f</sup> Strabo hath called all these Tent-wanderers (saith <sup>f</sup> Scaliger out of Ammianus Marcellinus) Sarracenes: and so doth Ptolemy in the next words call the next adioyning people, seating them in the Northerly bounds of Arabia Felix. In the same Chapter he setteth downe Saraca, the name of an Arabian Citie. & Some Authors haue written, that because Ismael was the sonne of Hagar a bond-woman, his nicer posteritie haue disclaimed that discent, and deriued their pedigree and name from Sara: Perrus <sup>g</sup> Perus mine, saith Hierome, assumentes sibi nomen Sara, quod scilicet de ingenua & domina uideantur esse generati. Iosephus Scaliger, in his Annotations vpon Eusebius Chronicle, after that he hath cited the former testimonie of Ammianus, and of Onkelos on the 37. of Genesis, addeth the authoritie of Stephanus; who affirmeth Saraka to be a Region of Arabia, neere the Nabathzans, of which he thinketh that the Saracens borrowed their name. We know (saith Scaliger) that the Arabian Nomades are so called: for Sarak in Arabike soundeth as much, that is (saraces & σαρaces) theeuish or robbes, such as the Cosak-Tartars, bordering on the Turkes, the Bandoliers in the Pyrene hills (and the Borderers sometimes betwixt England and Scotland). De Sara, peridiculum: To call them Saracens of Sara, is ridiculous; for then either they must be called Sarai, or thee Saraca. <sup>h</sup> Marcellinus thus writeth of them; this people stretcheth from the Assyrians to the falles of Nilus: all warriors, halfe naked, in coloured iackes. None ploweth or planteth, but they wander vp and downe without houses or lawes; their life being alwayes in flight. Their wiues they hire and couenant with for a time: which breed child in one place, and bring forth in another, and neuer rest. Their food is Venison, Milke, Hearbes, and such towles as they can take: the most that we haue seene, know not the vse of Wheat or Wine. Like Kites they snatch their prey, but stay not by it, whether they winne or lose. They are such, as the Romans need neuer wish them their friends or their enemies. In the time of Julian they made out-rodes and spoiles on the Roman Prouinces, because they were denied their wonted stipends by Julian, who told them that hee had better store of iron then gold.

k Hieron. Trad.
lib. in Genesiu.

Saint <sup>k</sup> Hierome interpreteth that Prophecie concerning Ismael, That hee should be a wilde man, his hand against every one, and every mans hand against him, of this robbing, rousing, roguing life of his posteritie: Significat semen eius habitaturum in eremo, id est, Saracenos vagos incertisq; sedibus, qui vniversas gentes quibus desertum ex latere ingitur, incurfant, impugnantur ab omnibus. In his second booke against Iouinian, he testifieth that their food was the milke and flesh of Camels, a creature easily bred in those barren deserts: but they thought it vnlawfull to eate Swines flesh, and that Swine were seldome, or not at all found among them. The Prophet <sup>l</sup> Jeremie reckoneth their Tents, Camels, and Flockes, as their greatest wealth, in that his Prophecie of their destruction by Nabuchodonosor.

This name Saracene may well besit that course of life which they embraced: in the more Southerly parts of Arabia, they are more civill and rich, dwelling in Cities, and have quicke trade, which all are wanting about Medina and Mecca, places so renowned by the life and death of Mahomet. Neither doth it seeme probable, that those which are called Agarens in the continued succession of so many ages, as appeareth, Chron. 5. 10. and Psalms 83. 6. would after grow ashamed of that: or that Ishmael, which devised the hopes conceived of Isaac the sonne of Sara, would nourish his posteritie in the same hope, or leave to them any honorable memorie of Sara, who had rejected him together with his mother. Yea, and their owne superstitious Legend prometh the contrary, as shall appeare in the next Chapter.

For their Religion in old times, One saith, " That the Saracens adore the Starre of Venus, and in their praying cry, Alla, oua, cubar, that is, God, and Venus. Ieanius Morus noteth thereon, That they worshipped the Image of Venus, set on a great stone, on which they beleue, that Abraham lay with Hagar, or else that hee tied his Camell thereunto while he was sacrificing Isaac. Anonymus in Saracens. P Scaliger calleth her Chubar and Chubar, and saith that neither Circumcision, nor the Friday-Sabbath, were of Mahomet's institution, but of ancient time both those rites had beene used by the Arabians, and left by him as he found them. Herodotus testifieth that the Arabians worshipped Alilat, which is the Moone: for still they call the Moone newly horned Halal: and the Turkes and Saracens salute the new Moone at her first appearance, with a kind of veneration. In Sylvius his Sarracenicæ, is reported, that the Saracens till the time of Heraclius worshipped the Morning-star and Venus, which they called Chubar, that is, Great. In the beginning of the Spring, and in the beginning of Autumne, the Sunne entering into Aries and Libra, the Arabians used (which they had borrowed from the Zechians and Albarachuma, people of India) to cast stones vpon heapes, being naked and bare headed, with great cries, and going about their Idols, kissing the corners in honor of their gods. This they used at Mecca in honor of Venus: and therefore in that solemnitie did they cast stones vnder their priuities, because those parts were vnder her dominion. Only whereas nakednesse was immodest, some ordained that they should binde a cloath about their raines. This Mahomet found before his time, and did not reiect, as he did some other Idolatrous Rites; but in their Pilgrimage Rites they still obserue it. Properly they called the morning Starre Chobar or Chubar: but as the Phœnician Astarte was with them in their confused worship, both Venus and the Moone: so they intended the like in this Arabian deitie. For as Orania and Alilat and Venus, were the same, as Herodotus auereth: so the same confusion of deuotion was in Arabia, as well as in their neighbour Countrey, Phœnicia. Their Circumcision, it seemeth, came from Ishmael, and the rest of Abrahams sonnes of old: their Friday-Sabbath from this Chubar-deuotion, both before Mahomet's time, as was also the abstinence from Swines-flesh, as we before haue obserued out of Saint Hierome, who also mentioneth this their worship of Chobar, so interpreting those words of Amos, The Starre of your God, that is, saith hee, Chobar or Lucifer, which the Saracens still worship to this day.

And in the life of Hilarion, he telleth, that Hilarion passing thorow the desert, came to a Citie or Towne called Elusa, on that very day whereon their Annuall solemnitie had gathered all the people into the Temple of Venus (for they worshipped her for the Morning-starre, to the worshipp whereof the Saracen Nation is addicted) These hearing that Hilarion passed by, who had before cured many of them, came flocking about him with their wiues and children, crying in Syriake, Barab, that is, Blesse vs. Hee in courteous and milde words; perswaded them rather to worship the liuing God, then those stones; promising, if they would beleue in Christ, hee would visite them ofner. Marueilous was the grace of God: they suffered him not thence to depart, before hee had laid the line for building of a Church; and their Priest, crowned as he was, was marked with the signe of Christ. Thus saith Hierome.

This robbing and roguing people liued in much obscuritie, vntill that darknesse brought them to light, and a Religion newly stamped by Mahomet, in a secret and iust iudgement of God, for the contempt of the Truth, was by as new a kinde of preaching (viz. force of Armes) obtruded on the luke-warme world. For when as Mahomet, (of whose life followeth a large discourse) had obserued that sick state of the Empire afflicted with Iewish rebellion, Persian inuasion, and Nestorian infection, besides the securitie of the Head it selfe, Heraclius then Emperour: he thought good to take Occasion by the fore-lock, and to strike while the yron was hot. First, f vnder pretence of Religion hauing inueigled a multitude of Disciples, he made a commotion in Arabia: and being therefore driuen out of Mecca, many of his followers resorted to him: Of whom he appointed Captaines and Leaders of the rest, Vbequar, Omar, Ozmen, Alifre, Talaus, Azubeirus, Zadimus, Zadinus, and Abnobend. The Arabians (as some affirme) aided Heraclius in his warre against Cosroes the Persian: and after that warre ended, the Arabians complaining for want of pay, the Treasurer answered, that there was scarce sufficient for the Greeke and Roman Souldiers, much lesse for that compa-nie of Dogges. Whereupon, as long before on like occasion they had rebelled in the reigne of Iulian, so now enraged, they departed into Syria, and adioyned themselves vnto Mahomet, who euen then after the Persian victorie had obtained (some say) of the Emperor whom he serued in those warres, to himselfe and his followers, a Region to inhabite; the Emperor so rewarding his exploits in the late warres. Mahomet with this supply assailed Mecca, which diuers times before hee had in vaine attempted, and tooke it, with other peeces in Arabia, viz. Huaim, Ierrip, Tambic, &c. He afterwards created foure Generalls, whom hee called the foure sharpe swords of God, and commanded them to goe into the foure parts of the world, and kill all such as would not embrace his Law. These foure were Ebubezer, g or Vbequar, Omer, Osmen, and Ali. Ebubezer went into Palestina, but was ouerthrowne by Theodorus Begarins, Casari Lieutenant. About the same time died Mahomet, and this h Ebubezer succeeded him; although Mahomet had designed Ali his successor. Eubocara or Abubacher (for diuersly is this Ebubezer called) hauing by his might, and the assistance of Homar and Osmen, obtrayned to be i Califa, ouerthrew the Imperials, and soone after died. Homar the next Califa, wanne Bosra, the chiefe Citie of Arabia, and all the Countrie as farre as Gabata, and put Theodorus, the Emperors brother, to flight. He besieged Damascus, and hauing broken the forces that came to rescue it, obtrayned it: subduing also all Phoenicia. After that, turning his forces into Egypt, Cyrus the Bishop of Alexandria stayed him with promise of two hundred thousand peeces of gold, for yearly Tribute. This was disannulled by Heraclius, and Emmanuel the Deputie denied the payment: whereupon entring the second time vnder conduct of Hamrus, Egypt was conquered. After two yeares siege, Ierusalem also was wonne. Iaidus one of his Captaines subdued Edeffa, and all Mesopotamia. Afterwards placig Muanias ouer all the Countries betwene Euphrates and Nilus, he inuaded Persia: where the Persians lost both their King Hormisdas, their State, Religion, and Name: of Persians being con-uered into Saracens. This victorious Homar made Ierusalem his Royall seat, where he built a Temple to Mahomet: and while he was praying, was murdered by his seruant. Ozmen, k the succeeding Caliph, sent a great Armie into Africa, vnder the leading of Hueba: who ouercomming Gregorius Patritius and destroying Carthage, subiected all that Prouince to their Empire; making Tunes the Mother-citie: but soone after translated that honour to Chairoan, which he built thirtie fixe miles from the Sea, and a hundred from Tunes. In the third yeare of his raigne Muanias the Deputie of Egypt with a Nauie of seuen hundred, or, as others say, of a hundred and seuentie saile, assailed Cyprus, and taking Constantia, wasted the whole Iland: and hauing wintered his Armie at Damascus, the next yeare besieged Arad in Cyprus, and won it, and dispeopled all the Ile. Thence he inuaded the continent of Asia, and carried away many prisoners: and after in a Sea-fight with Constantians the Emperor, died the Lycian Sea with Christian blood. He wan Rhodes, and sold to a Iew the brazen Colosse or pillar of the Sunne, which laded nine hundred Camels, sometimes rekoned one of the worlds seuen won-in the Archipelago, and then sent his Fleete against Sicilia, where they made spoyle with fire and sword, till by Olympius they were chased thence. Muani himselfe with an armie by land entred into Cappadocia: Iaid hauing ouer-run all the neighbouring Armenia, vnto the hill Caucasus. But meane while Ozmen, besieged in his house by Ali his faction, slew himselfe, when he had liued eightie and seuen yeares, and reigned twelue. The Saracens could not agree about their new Prince; Muani and <sup>1</sup> Ali with great armies, being Corriuals of that dignitie; and Ali being treacherously murdered by Muani meanes, in a Temple neare Cusa a Citie of Arabia was there buried, and the place is of him called Masladalle or Ali his house. <sup>m</sup> Albacem, the sonne of Ali and Fatima Mahumets daughter, was by Muani his owne hands crowned, <sup>n</sup> and by him soone after poisoned. Thus was Muani sole Caliph, who graunted peace to the Emperour, on condiuion that he should pay him euery day <sup>o</sup> ten pounds of golde, and a Gentelman seruant with a horse. Damascus was now made the seate royall. Of which Citie, although we haue said somewhat in our first booke, yet let vs be a little beholden to Beniamin Tudelensis, to shew vs the Saracenicall face thereof. In his time it was subiect to Noraldine (as he termeth him) King of the children of Thogarma, that is, the Turkes. The Citie, saith he, is great and faire, containing on euery side fiftene miles; by it slideth the riuer Pharphar, and watereth their gardens: <sup>a</sup> Amana is more familiar, and entreth the Citie, yea, by help of art, in Conduits visiteth their priuate houses; both striving in emulous contention whether shall adde more pleasure or more profit to the Citie, by Naaman therefore in the heate of his indignation preferred before all the waters of Israel. But no where is so magnificent a building, saith Beniamin, as the Synagogue of the Ismaelites, which is therein: the people call it the Palace of Benbadad. There is to be seene a wall of Glasse, built by Art-Magicke, distinguished by holes as many as the yeare hath dayes, and so placed, that euery day the Sunne findeth them fixed in order to his present motion, each hole hauing therein a Diall with twelue degrees, answering to the houres of that day, so that in them is designed both the time of the yeare and of the day. Within the Palace are Baths and costly buildings, so rich of golde and siluer as seemeth incredible: I saw there hanging a ribbe, of one of the Enakims or Giants, nine Spanish palmes long, and two broad, on the Sepulchre was written the name of Abchamaz. After this, in the time of Tamerlan, the magnificence of their Temple was not quite extinct, but as is reported, it had fortie great Porches in the circuit thereof, and within nine thousand Lamps, hanging from the roofo, all of golde and siluer. For the Temples sake at first he spared the Citie, but after, prouoked by their rebellion, he destroyed it and them.

He subdued the Sect of Ali in Persia, and after inuaded Cilicia, and sent (to ayde Sapor) a band of Saracens, which afflicted Chalcedon, and sacked Armaria a Citie of Phrygia; and with a Fleet inuaded Sicill, tooke Siracuse, and carried away with them the riches of Sicilia, and of Rome it selfe, lately fleeced by the Emperour, and here hordeed. Another Armie of Saracens, ouer-running the Sea-coast of Africa, led away eight hundred thousand prisoners.

Muamad and Cais on the other side subdued to Muani, Lydia, and Cilicia; <sup>p</sup> and after, with Sauns another Saracen Generall, besieged Constantinople, from Aprill to September; and taking Cizicum, there wintred their forces, and in the Spring returned to their siege, which they continued seuen yeers; but by Diuine assistance, and force of tempest, they were chased thence. And Constantine slew three hundred thousand Saracens, in a battell (not long after) against Susia the nephew of Muani, and compelled the Saracens to pay a great tribute. <sup>q</sup> Iezid reigned after the death of Muani his father (a better Poet then Souldier) he soone died. Neyther did his successors Marnan and Abdalan liue two yeeres in the roome. <sup>r</sup> Abdimelec was chosen Caliph, who descended from Hali, when as Abdalan of the lineage of Eubocara (the Arabians call this the Maraunian race; the other Abazian) had possessed himselfe of that title by force, whom Ciasa the kinsman of Abdimelec overthrew. Ciasa after this victorie, entring Damascus, pluckt Iezid (one of the former Caliphs) out of his graue, burned his bones, and hurled the Ashes into the riuer, and cruelly persecuted all the Maraunian stocke. lowers fled into Mauritania Tingitana, where he was welcomed of the Saracens there being, & first intituled himselfe Miralummim, which signifieth The Prince of Seleucus, and then builded Marocco. Abdimelec hauing other yrons in the fire, neglected this: first appeasing tumults in his own state; then ouerthrowing the Emperour in the field; after, receiuing (by treason of the Deputie) Armenia; winning that part of Persia, which yet was subiect to the Romans, and by his forces spoyling Thracia, whiles the Greekes were diuided amongst themselves. He also chased the Roman Garrisons out of the coast Townes which they held in Africke. Abdimelec being dead, <sup>a</sup> Ulitus, the sonne of Abcdramon succeeded, vnder whom the Saracens, besides the spoile of Galatia, conquered all Africke betwixt Niger and the Sea, a little pcece excepted at the mouth of the Straits subiect to Rodericus the King of Spaine: Mucas was made Lieutenant of the Saracen Empire in Africke. To him Julianus Earle of Cepra, full of indignation against his Prince, for deslouring his faire daughter Caba, about the yeare 711. offereth the conquest of Spaine, if he would furnish him with some competent forces of his Saracens. This Traytor, thus strengthened with the authority of his place (being Governour of the Ile Viridis and diuers places in Africa and Spaine) backed with his friends, and aided with the Saracens, ouerthrew the Gottish Empire, which had now ruled Spaine about three hundred yeares: Rodericus loosing the field and his state, and spending the remnant of his daies with an Hermite in a solitarie desert of Lusitania. Julianus himselfe was after slaine by the Saracens, as were the Spanish Traytors; the iust end of vniust treacherie. Scaliger out of an Arabian Geographer, calleth this Captaine, Muses or Moses, sonne of Nutzir of the Marawan stocke, who had with him a valiant Captaine named Tark or Tarik, of whom the hill and the strait is named (as the vulgar pronounce it) Gibraltar properly Gebal Tarick, that is, the hill of Tarik, because he had shipped ouer his Barbarians thither, and fortified himselfe in that hill, in the nintieth yeare of the Hegira: which he did lest his barbarous souldiers should forsake him, and therefore also caused his ships to be burnt.

Zulcimirius the next <sup>x</sup> Caliph, sent Malsmas with a great power into Thrace, where hauing spoyled the countrey, he laid siege to <sup>y</sup> Constantinople; Zulcimirius his master assaulting it by Sea, with a Nauie of three thousand Ships, in which siege he died, Ann Domini 719. Aumar, <sup>z</sup> his successeur, had no successe in this attempt, partly, through the violence of frost, causing famine and diseases in his Campe, and partly, by force of an artificiall Glasse, wherewith Leo the Emperour cast fire amongst the enemies Fleet, and fiering euen the Seas about the ships: that by this subtiltie and force of tempest, of three thousand saile, fise ships onely are said to haue escaped. <sup>a</sup> Gizid, sent with supply of three hundred and threescore ships, durst not approach for feare of this fire: and the Saracens by their Caliph were reuoked, when the plague had slaine in Constantinople three hundred thousand people.

When Aumar was dead, Gizid was chosen in his place; and after him Hafscham, son of Abdelmelech: who being murdered, Walid, or Euelit sonne of Iezid; in whose time the bottome of the Sea, neere the coasts of Asia minor, burned, and sent forth smoake first, and after, heapes of stones, with which the shores of Asia, Lesbos, and Macedonia, were filled, and a new Iland <sup>b</sup> tooke beginning of the heaping together of earth, which was annexed to the Iland called Sactra.

The Saracens in Spaine erected amongst themselves many petite Kingdomes, and by their diuisions made way to Pelagius, with some remainder of the Spaniards to recover some of their lost countrey, who dying in the yeare 732. his sonne Fasila succeeded, in whose time the Saracens passed the Pyrenzan hills into France, where Theodoricus the second was then King; but <sup>c</sup> Charles Martell master of the Kings house ruled, as did his father in that office before, and his sonne, (both Pipins) after him. The Saracens tooke Narbone, and after Burdeaux, killing in it, man, woman, and child, and rasing the Temples to the ground; they passed Garunna, and ouerturned Angolesine and Bloys, and came into <sup>d</sup> Turon, where Endo the Goth then King of a great part of France, in wars with Martell, for feare of the common enemy, entred leagued, and with their ioynt forces slew <sup>e</sup> three hundred and seuentie fise thousand Saracens; and those of Nauarre slew the rest that escaped, in their returne. But when Endo was dead, dead, Martell tooke part of his Kingdome from his sonnes, Hunoldus and Vaisarus, who thereupon recalled the Saracens, which vnder the leading of Adrianus tooke Auenion by the treason of Mauricius then Gouverneur, from whence they were driuen e by Martellus.

The Saracens made foure inuasions into Thrace while Enelus was Caliph, to whom succeeded, Anno 74. Gizit the third, who wasted Cyprus, and carried away the people into Syria. After him and Ices (which two ruled not two yeares) Marnan reigned; and after, another of the same name, and the Saracens were diuided, Tebid Dadae, and Zulciminus, challenged each to himselfe the Soueraigntie; and when all these were ouerthrowpe and slaine, Asmulinus amongst the Persians raised vp the seruants to murder their masters, and with them he ouerthrew Iblinus with one hundred thousand Saracens; and after, Marnan himselfe with three hundred thousand, who fleeing into Egypt, was there also vanquished and slaine in a Temple.

This murder grew through the faction of the Abasian stocke, who conspired against him, because he had slaine one of their kindred, Abulabus the chiefe of this conspiracie, succeeded him, in the <sup>h</sup> yeare 749. and remoued the Chaliphate to that familie from the Marannians, in the yeare of their Hegira 132, after the Arabian computation; as we follow Scaliger herein; and he the Chronicle which Abraham Zacharia gathered out of the Monuments of the Ismaelites. In the former relations, we haue principally followed Curio his Saracenicall Historie; though by the way we haue borrowed of others also.

This Abulabus being dead, Abugephar Elmantzar succeeded. Hee imprisoned the twelue sonnes of Hasin, the sonne of Ali, where they perished: Hee began first to build the Citie of Bagded: he died <sup>k</sup> in the 158. yeare. Iohn di Barros <sup>l</sup> ascribeth this Citie to the same Bagiasar also, for so he calleth him; but Curio to one Muammat long after. Scaliger <sup>m</sup> thinketh this to be Seleucia, a Citie built nigh vnto Babylon by Seleucus, neere the meeting and mixing of Euphrates and Tygris; of which see our Babylonian Historie.

Mahdi his sonne succeeded <sup>n</sup> anno Hegira 165. after him Abarun Errschid, anno Hegira 170. and in the yeare 193. Irrin the sonne of Reschid, slaine by the faction of his brother Mamon, 198. This Mamon was studious of learning, and learned men: He made Ali King of Chorasán, and made a law, That the Posteritie of Ali should be clothed in yellow silke. In his time many bookes were turned out of Greeke into Arabike; he died in the yeare <sup>o</sup> 218. Mutetzam followed; and after him in the yeare 226. of the Hegira Abarun Elwathak; and next to him Methucal, who was slaine in the yeare 247. by a Turke. Muthnatzar his sonne and successor died in the yeare after, whom Elmußtein followed; vnder him the Turke-men set vp Achmad sonne of Tolon, seruant of Mamon King of Egypt and Syria, and slew the Chalipha anno Hegira 255. Anno Domini 868.

After this time was the Caliphate or Popedome diuided, one sitting at Bagded, another in Egypt. The Egyptian Chaliphs in our Egyptian Historie are expressed in their due place and order. In Bagded succeeded Mubtadi. And the next yeare Matemad, who died <sup>p</sup> anno Hegira 279. Mutetzed his successor died 288. Muchtraphi, who slew Abaron the last of Tolon's familie that reigned in Egypt, died 295. Mutetdan held the place till the yeare 320. The next was Elkabar, to whom succeeded in the next yeare, Ratze, and after him Mukiaphe his brother, who made Tolson a Turke his chiefe Captaine; of whom afterwards he was blinded. Mustekaphe succeeded <sup>q</sup> anno Hegira 342. In his dayes the family of Bawia ruled, whose sonne Meaz Eddula slew the Chaliph. Their father had dreamed, that as hee pissed, fire ascended from his yard vp to heauen; which the Diuiners told him, signified the ensuing greatnesse of his sonnes.

He placed Matia in the Chaliphate, but ruled all things himselfe. Vnto Matia succeeded Tala, in his time Meaz Ledan Illah was made King of Mecca, Medina, Aliman; Egypt he obtained before. Etzad Eddula sonne of Meaz, repaired Bagded, now much decayed, and gaue his daughter in marriage to the Chalipha. This Etzad Eddula died anno Hegira 371. to whom Tzantzam Eddula succeeded, imprisoned by

Beha Eddula, as was also Thiar the Chaliph, and his house spoiled Anno Hegira 353. Sultan Eddula Sogus reigned after this Beha, and Kadar was Chalipha after Tais, Schuraph Eddula reigned Anno Hegira 411. Kaim succeeded in the Papacie Anno Hegira 423, and five yeares after Muktadi. The Sultan being dead, and leauing a sonne of three yeares old; his wife, the Babes mother, purchased the Sultanship of the Chalipha with a great summe of money.

About this time flourished Ben Gazela, which made many Bookes of Physicke, Mushtaber was next Chalipha; in his time the Astrologers foretold an exceeding deluge, not so great as in the dayes of Noah, because then (said they) were seuen Planets in Coniunction with Pisces, whereas now there were but six, Saturne being excluded. This made the Inhabitants of Bagded afraid, because of the low situation: and caused them to stop the passages of the waters. The Ismaelites which of deuotion performed their Pilgrimage, were most of them drowned. The Chalipha for this cause arayed the Astrologer, which foretold this, in royall apparell. He died Anno Hegira 512. Mushtab succeeded, then Raschid, and in the yeare 530. Muktaphi. In his time were terrible Earthquakes, which made hauocke of all about Damasco, Aleppo, Tripolis, Antiochia, and Laodicea. Tygris ouerflowed Bagded, and desolated many other Cities. In Anno Hegira 555. succeeded Mushteneged, who by his Physicians Policie was strangled in the Bath, by the violence of the heate, the doore being shut. His sonne Mushtaz enioyed the roome, 566. In his time the Abassian Caliphaes were receiued in Egypt, which the Phetimeans of Ali his posteritie had before separated.

Natkar succeeded Anno Hegira 575. and Taber his sonne 621. Next Meshtatza which gaue much Almes, and built many Schooles. In his dayes arose in Asia, one Bada, which professed himselfe a Prophet sent of God; who gathered an armie of the scumme of all Nations, whereby he filled Asia with bloud and slaughter, both of Christians and Israelites, vntill Giaibeddin King of Gunia destroyed him.

In the yeare 640. of Christ 1245. succeeded Mushtatza, the foure and fiftieth Saracenicall Chalipha. The Tartar King Chita made his brother Halacho King of Irak and Mesopotamia, who besieged and sacked Bagded, and slew Mushtatza. This Chalipha was slaued by his commandement in the midst of his treasures, because he would not employ the same (through niggardise) for his owne defence. From that time there hath beene no Chalipha. (saith this Arabian historie) in Bagded. In him ended the Abassian line, of which had beene siue and thirtie Chaliphaes.

After Mahomet or Muhammed the false Prophet, the first Captaines of warre were called Emirelmumenim; that is to say, Præsides orthodoxorum, the Captaines of the Sand-Beleaguers: and after, because, vnder cloake of Religion, they seised on the Primarie, and tyranny (spirituall and temporall) they named themselves Chaliphaes, that is, Vicars. The first Emirelmumenim was Abubecher. When by his successors, Gouernours were sent into Spaine and Africa, they for a time held the same as Deputies, although to their power nothing lacked but the title of a King, yet they professed to doe all in the name of the Emirelmumenim; vntill afterwards they tooke that Title also themselves and became absolute. Whence all the petite Kings of Spaine, and the African Potentates, were called Emirelmumenim; and the Kings of Barbarie are so stiled at this day, euen as the French King is called Christianissimus, and the Spaniard Catholicus. The Legats of the Chalipha were called Naib, which also signifieth the same that Chalipha; but this was made peculiar to those Saracen Tyrants, which vsed both Swords, (to speake in the Romish language) supreme in matters Diuine and Humane. Thus obserueth Ioseph Scaliger of these names: whereby appeareth, that Emirelmumenim was not giuen only to Abedramon and his successors in Africa, as is before obserued out of Curio.

Beniamin Tudelensis nameth the Chalipha, which in his time ruled in Bagded, Abmumanin Alghabassi, which Montanus translateth, The Prince of the beleaguers which line in penance; or heauinesse: it seemeth rather to, be some title arrogated to his deuotion, then his proper name; for wee finde none of that name in this Catalogue. And he was there about the time of Muktaphi or Mushteneged. Of that Chalipha Beniamin tells, That hee had a Palace of three miles compasse within the Citie, within which

which was a wood or groue of trees of all sorts, both barren and bearing: beasts also of all sorts for game, and in the midst thereof a great lake with plentie of fish, neither wanted there fowles, for varietie of disport. Hee was skilfull of the Hebrew, and well respected that Nation. He had imposed this rule on himselfe, not to vse any minie or apparell, which he had not first earned: to which purpose hee made fine minies, which being sealed with his owne seale, were by his Courtiers sold, the great men buying them for their vse. None of the Ismaelites (to hee called the Mahumetans) might see his face: and the Pilgrimes which came from Mecca, in the Land of Eliman, and passing this way, desired to see him, vsed to enter the Palace, and there cried out, O Lord, Light of the Ismaelites, and Shine-beams of our Lives, shew vs the lightness of thy face. But he answered them nothing, as not seeming to regard them. Then his Courtiers and great Attendants sued for them, saying, O our Lord, spread thy peace over these men which come from farre Countries, &c. Then would he let out at the window a shirt of his garment, which they deuoutly kissed: and (when one of those great men had said, God in peace) returned full of gladnesse to their home, where they were receiued almost with veneration for so happie an employe. Euery of the Princes which attended on him had their seuerall Palaces within the great Palace, and were duly obserued, wearing also Iron chaines, because they had once conspired to set vp his brother. But they had the reuenues of Townes and Cities belonging to them, brought them by their Officers, notwithstanding.

Thus did he conserue his Maestie with the people, and securitie with his owne. I omit the Edifices and pillars of gold and silver, adorned with Gemmes, which he mentioneth in that Palace: Out of which the Chaliph came but once in the yeare, in the moneth Ramadan, or their Easter Solempnitie, at which time they resorted thither out of far Countries to see him, as if he had been Mahomet. He was then carried on a Mule, royally apparelled, and crowned with a Diadem of vspeakable price, on which he wore a blacke cloath, in token that the day of death would obscure all that pompe and splendour. The Princes of Arabia, Media, Persia, Tuborch, did attend him: and thus he went to the great Temple built in the gate Basra. The people, men and women, all clothed in silke and purple, salute him, Peace be on thee our Lord King: Hee relusing them, with his hand, or mouing his garment. Being thus conveyed to the Porch, with musicke also of all kinds, and dances, he ascended a Tower of wood, and there maketh a Sermon of his Law; the wise-men of the Ismaelites applauding his hearing, the people answering, Amen: After this, hee giueth them all his blessing: and a Camell is brought to him, which hee killeth for the Paschall Feast, and causeth the Princes to distribute peeces of the flesh of the beast which himselfe had slaine; this they esteeme a great gift. This done, they depart, the King returning by another way, by the banks of Tygris, alone: (the Princes passing in the river) vnto the Palace. He had built a Palace on the other side of Tygris, on a branch of Euphrate, which floweth by one side of the Citie in which he had raised great Houses, Hospitalls for the sick, and for the poore, and for madde men, with all provision for them at his charge. This much I haue beene bold to insert out of this Iew, because I know none other, nor that can equiuaile vs with the State of Bagdad in the time of her chiefe flourishing, before it was destroyed by the Tartars.

Thus haue we given you a Chronographical view of the ancient Chaliphates, with their first and greatest Conquests, omitting the lesser and later; as in the yeare 807. in Sardinia and Corsica: in 826. in Crete, 847. in Sicill; and presently after in Italy, overturning Tuscan, and burning the Suburbs of Rome it selfe, with the Churches of Peter and Paul 845. the next yeare in Illyria, Dalmatia; besides the taking of Ancona: in 847. chased by Pope Leo from Ostia. These with other their affaires of war, in Lucania, Calabria, Apulia, at Beneuentum, Genua, Capua, (which Cities they tooke) I passe ouer. After this great bodie grew lubberly and vnweldie, it fell vnder the weight of it selfe, none so much as the Saracens overthrowing the Saracens, as their Sects and Diuisions make plaine. Neuerthelesse, this dis-ioyning and disioyning notwithstanding, their Religion euen still couereth a great part of the World. For besides the triumphing sword of the Turke, Persian, Mogore, Barbarian, and other a Cairo became a Papacie absolute, though schismaticall, as they called it: so did Marocco; the Persians were alway prone to such Schismes; and other, as it seru'd for their aduantage.

Mahumetan Prinets: such is the zeal of the superstitious Mahumetan, that in places furthest distant, this their Religion hath beene preached, which they trade together with their merchandize, even from the Atlantike Ocean vnto the Philippinaes: It hath founded in China, it hath pierced Tartaria: and although the name of Christian extendeth it selfe into so many Sects and Professions in the Countreies of Asia, Affrick, and America, besides Europe (almost wholly Christian;) yet is it hard to say, whether there be not as many Disciples and Professours of this ridiculous and impious deuotion, as of all those which giue their names to Christ, in whatsoever Tract Herein.

Thus hath the Field and the Church stooped to Mahomet: wee may adde more, (Saul among the Prophets;) Learning hath flourished among the Mahumetans, as fast so vnlearned and rude.

When the Kings of Africa possessed Spaine, they founded Vniuersities both at Morocco (it is Scalliger's report) and in Spaine, allowing yearly stipends to the Professors. And in those times was great ignorance of good learning in the Latine Church, when good Disciplines flourished exceedingly amongst the Muhammedans. Whatsoeuer the Latines writ, after the industrie of the Arabians had acquainted them with their ignorance, is wholly to be ascribed to the Arabians, both their Philosophy, Physicke, and Mathematickes. For they had no Greeke Author which was not first translated into Arabike, and thence into Latine, as Ptolemy, Euclide and the rest; all Constantinople being taken by the Turkes, the Greeke Exiles brought vs backe to the Fountaines. But now the Muhammedans are growne artlesse in Africa: onely in Constantinople may good Arabike and Persian workes be gotten by the helpe of the Jewes. Ludonius Vines saith, That they translated Arabike out of the Latine, but he was not so well able to iudge thereof, although he rightly ascribeth the corrupting of Art to vnskillfull translations; and sheweth the difference of Auerrois or Auerrohis Aristoteli (as the Latines haue him) from the Greeke. But his inuective is too bitter in condemning all the Arabians, as vnlearned, dotting, and sauouring more of the Arabian, then of Art. But the Spaniard might haue some grudge to that Nation, which so many hundred yeares had spoiled Spaine: still leauing the fourth part of the Spanishe Language (as Scalliger testifieth thereof) Arabike, in monument of their Conquest.

Of their learned men were Auerrois, Auerrois, Auerrois, Algazel, &c. Philosophers; Masius Rasis, and many other Physicians, and Astrologers, mentioned in the Chronicles of Zaeubis, Leo, and Abulfada Ismael, Geographers; Cairaoan, Bagdad, Fez, Morocco, Corduba, &c. were Vniuersities of Saracen students. But now Learning and Schooles are decayed and ruined: even as at first also it was amongst some of them little countenanced, as appeareth by that Hagag in the 96. Yeare of the Hejra, who being Governour of King of Irak, in his sicknesse consulted with an Astrologer, Whether the Starres had told him of any Kings death that yeare: he answered, That a King should die, but his name was Cami: Whereupon Hagag, remembering that at his birth his mother had imposed that name on him: I shall die, saith he; but that shall go one houre before; and presently caused his head to be smitten off. An vnhappy Harbengership in regard of his Art: an vnhappy Art which can better tell others Destinies then their owne. But no maruell in Hagag, who was fleshed in blood, for his Herodian Testament should be thus bloodie, who in his life had in that Medina Province slaine an hundred and twentie thousand men, besides fiftie thousand more, and fourscore thousand women, which perished in his imprisonments.

b Scal. Epist. Step. Vbert. He saith that the figures which we vse in Arithmetike, came frō the Arabians or Moores to the Spaniards, and thence to vs, about three hundred yeares since, and then much differing from those characters which now we vse.

CHAP. III.

His life of Mahomet is at large described by diuers Authors, but I find it no where so fully as before the Alcaron in the Italian Edition, the sum whereof, and of the other reports touching the same, is this; Ismael was the first (according to that Italian Author, others ascribe it to Abraham) that built the Temple at Mecca, and hauing to wife an Egyptian Idolatresse, had by her twelue sons, which (as he saith) being disperfed in Arabia, Persia, Armenia, sowed so many sorts of Religion: and Chedar his second son; placed in the Temple of his father (vpon an high Tower called Alquibla) an Idoll named Allech and Allez, instituting certaine ceremonies: and amongst the rest, the sacrificing of a Ram, in remembrance of that Ram which was presented to his grand-father Abraham at the offering of Isaac. Of Chedar<sup>a</sup> descended Thebic, and so in order, Cah-Numbib, Almucacen, Abhacen, Acaba, Amubasca, Amir, Celuf, Nisica, Abhimasta, Adirem, Scaad, Mudbar, Ilges, Mudicita, Hudbasfa, Chinene, Anascere, Melch, Phasce, Paliff, Lunai, Cabnai, Morta, Cheluf, Eacien, Abdamaneuf, Abdalmutalsi, Abdalla the supposed father of Mahomet: his mothers name was Hemina or Hemina a Jewesse (as some<sup>b</sup> write) his father was an Ethnicke or Pagan Idolator. His base condition and obscuritie was such, that the Turkes themselves doubt whether he were an Arabian or Persian, notwithstanding that genealogicall rable. <sup>c</sup> Richerius reporteth that he was a Cyrenean by birth, and that in the time of his minoritie or child-hood, he was by some Plagiary stolne away from his friends, and sold to the Ismaelite Merchants. Others say, that he was abandoned both of father and mother, and (according to the cruel custome of that barbarous people) sold to strangers. From so base a beginning did this cunning impostor and seducer of the World arise, to be the scourge of Princes, and disturber of the World.

He was comely of person, and of sharp wit, and therefore was made ouerseer of the busines of Abdalmutalsi his Master, or (as some say) his Grand-father: and traded for him in Soria, Egypt, and Persia, and after his death, inherited his goods: Continuing his trade of merchandize with a great man of Corozan, he succeeded him in his bed and wealth, by the marriage of his widow Gadisa (whom<sup>d</sup> others call Adega the daughter of Hulert) and that (as some suspect not vnprobably) by the helpe of Sorceries and incantations. With this widow, after she was become his wife, he liued in his wonted course of his life thirteene yeares, and had by her one son and three daughters. And by this means grown great, he aspired higher; assembling to himselfe a company of thieues, vnderlists, and out-lawes, which with him became Voluntaries and Aduenturers in the wars of the Emperor Heraclius against the Persians: in which he valourously behaued himselfe, and was wounded in the visage, & Cosdros the Persian King was overcome.

After this, Mahomet deuising further how to satisfie his ambitious desire of Soueraincie, met with occasion fitting those his aspiring designs. The Arabians being denied their pay (as is said) raised a mutinie and<sup>e</sup> rebellion: these chose Mahomet to be their Captaine, who vsed them as his instruments of robbery and violence about the countries of Mecca. But the Nobles opposing themselves against him; he, perceiuing that their power and authoritie would be a perillous rub in his way, thought it his safest course to insinuate with them, and therefore sought by alliance to winne their betrelling, taking some of their daughters to his wiues; of which hee had at one time eleven, and in all his life fiftene, besides two slaves.

Heraclius at that time fauouring the Heresie of the Monothelites; and neglecting the affaires of the Empire, *Mahomet*s proiects tooke better effect. Hummar also and Mauchbia caused all Soria, Iudza and Egypt to rebell, Sergius at that time a Nestorian Monke of Constantinople (thence for that Heresie excommunicated) resorting to Mahomet, kindled these sparkes into a great fire, perswading him to countenance his Rebellion, with the pretence of Religion; the rather now that Heraclius had offended the Christians by his exactions and Heresies, and the Jewes, by new cruelties because by Magicke he had bene warned to beware of the Circumcised Nation. Thus some malecontented Jewes, and some hereticall Christians being called to counsell, it was agreed, that he should professe himselfe to be chosen in this turbulent state of the world, to bring vnto the same a New Law, appointed herunto by Diuine authoritie: to the Jewes affirming himselfe their expected Messias; to the Christians promising amidst so many Heresies The rule of Truth; to the excommunicate Heretikes, restitution of their persons and goods; to seruants, libertie; to subiects, immunitie from tribute.

f He neither was Circumcised himselfe, (saith an Arabian nobleman in confirmation of the Alcoran) nor did command anything thereof in his law, but the Arabians vsed Circumcision before his time.

g Sanfonino calleth him Batira, and addeth also Nicbolus a Priest of Rome.

And thus he caused himselfe of Sergius to be baptised, and to be <sup>f</sup> circumcised also of Abdalla a Jew, hauing before bene a Paynime. After he got himselfe into a Cave two miles from the Towne called Garbe, continuing there two yeares in companie of Sergius and Abdalla, which acquainted him with the Christian and Iewish Principles and in the night resorted to his wife, whom he perswaded to this vaine beleefe by Zadinus his seruant, rewarding him therefore with freedome, and proclaiming (as by an Edict from Heauen) the like libertie to all seruants of all sorts, which would follow him. This rout resorting to him, and by their numbers strengthening his faction, their masters not a little aggrieved, gaue out a rumour, that Mahomet was made, and possessed of a Diuell, and that an euill end would befall him and his followers. And although they might haue gotten him into their hands, yet in regard of his nine vncles, and some noble Families linked with him in kindred, viz. the Corasists, the Hassinites, the Benitamines, they abstained from further rigour.

Thus with the helpe of Sergius and Baira a Iacobite, and Cillerius, in the end, with the fauour of his two vncles, Hanza and Alaben at Mecca, with his elder brother (that tooke his daughter Fatima) and Enbocara (a chiefe man of that place, afterwards his father in law) he composed after his and their pleasure Constitutions and Canons, and published the same at Mecca; with protestation that the Angell Gabriel had bene sent to him from God, as in old times to the Prophets, to teach him these things. And in the first place commanding them to beleene in God the Creator of heauen and earth the causer of raines and fruits, that inflicteth death on men, and after raiseth them vp to giue them either, in reward of their good workes, Paradis; or of their bad, Hell, and such other things, neuer before heard of among these simple Idolatrous Inhabitants of Mecca, he grew in great estimation.

k A Wittall.

For in Persia and Arabia, before this time, some worshipped a Tree, which they called Putulangua, offering sacrifices thereto: some an Idoll, called Blionum; and some the Sunne; and others, other Idolatries; spread by the so many sonnes of Ismael; and therefore the ruder multitude, astonished with these Prophetickall and Angelicall tales, were easily bewitched. And by degrees he published his intended wickednes, notwithstanding outrageous villanies, as <sup>h</sup> the stealing of a Camell, the murdering of a Jew sleeping vnder a tree. Yea, he pretended not humane infirmitie, but diuine authority, to his most mischieuous designments. For example, being lustfully affected to <sup>i</sup> Zameh, the daughter of Gaisi, the wife of Zaid, he writ in his Law, That after vow, or promise of marriage it was lawfull for him to enioy her, and (if he pleased) to take her to his wife. And being reprehended, that Aissa his wife <sup>k</sup> was dishonest with Zaphagam, the son of Almuthathum, the Angell (forsooth) said, she was chaste. And being found by his wimes, with Mary the wife of Macobe, the King of the Iacobites, he in another Chapter is absolved of his oath, and free to lye with any woman, not being able to containe himselfe, notwithstanding he had sworne so to do. And by the same authority he enioyned then penance, for blaming the Prophet. And willing to diuorce one of his wimes, but fearing the greatnesse of her kindred, he frameth one Chapter, blaming him for fearing man more then God. Meeting once with a woman on the way, hee would haue abused her, but she refusing, hee set vpon her Ass (lettice besitting his lippes) affirming that that woman had more sinned; then if shee had slaine an hundred men. And the Saracens to this day, saith <sup>l</sup> Petrus Alfonsi, deplore that fact of this Saracen woman.

He wanteth not his miracles also in his Legend. As he journeyed in the heat of the day day 1 with his Camels, a Cloud couered his head from the scorching heat of the Sun, about the seuenteenth yeare of his age. And when he first entered the Caue, he saw the Angell Gabriel in his proper shape, with white wings on a seat of gold betwixt heaven and earth, who brought him his Prophecies: and going to Mecca to tell his wife; the Beasts, Trees, Stones, and Hearbes, saluted him with the name of a Prophet, and a Messenger of God; and the trunk of a Tree standing in the way, diuided it selfe for him to passe betwene, and then after closed againe. He also, to satisfie his incredulous vncle Bugellinus, caused the Moone to descend from heaven, which entered into his slecue, and after parted it selfe in two, and then ascended againe. To satisfie the peoples doubtings, he caused a Bull (taught before to come at his call) to bring on his hornes a Chapter, which he there had tied, to testifie the truth of Mahomet.

miracles.

But while the fame of this his Propheticall Function filled the mouthes of the vulgar with acclamations, it no lesse filled the hearts of the Nobles of Mecca with disdain, who sought therefore to apprehend him; but he closely fled to Ietrib or Medina with his followers, where he liued with the name of a Prophet thirteene yeares. From this flight they begin the computation of their Hegira: the word Hegira signifieth a persecution for Religion. Wherein Mahomet imitated the Christians of those parts, who accounted their yeares from the persecution of Dioclesian. That his flight hapned on the sixteenth of July An. Dom. 622. on Friday: Therefore doe they keepe holy the Friday. And because then the Moone shewed her new hornes, that became a sacred ensigne to the Mahometans: & on Towers where they watch to obserue the new Moone, they set vp an horned Moone, as Christians on Steeples vse to erect the Crosse. For then there was no New Moone day of their moneth Muharram<sup>m</sup>, but was the second day after the Jewish account: and therefore the new Moone might then be seene. But for the Friday it was obserued, before Mahomet's time, as shall after be shewed. He deuoted a certaine Carpenters poore Orphans of their patrimonie, and consecrated their House into a Temple. This Citie being for most part inhabited with Iewes, they asked a signe in confirmation of his Office. He said, That he was not sent with miracles, but denuntiation of Armes heere, and Hell hereafter: and those which would not receiue his new Doctrine, he expelled by force. Being absolute Lord heere, he aspired also to the Dominion of Mecca. He sent thirtie horse with Hanzeta to rob the Merchants, traueiling thither: but being then preuented, he sent, foure yeares after, sixe hundred of his best souldiers, vnder Hugaida, to assault Mecca, but he also was discomfited: yet not desisting his enterprize, seuen yeares after he achieued it, and after eleuen barrai'es entered and sacked the Towne, and gaue the spoile to his souldiers: and for feare, the neighbouring Cities submitted themselves. Mahomet herewith encouraged, assaulted the Persians and Egyptians, exchanging with those he conquered, his New Religion, for their old wealth and libertie, binding the Gouvernours thereunto. But now being old, and through his intemperances weake, and diseased also with the falling Sicknes, he coloured his often falling with pretext of Gabriels brightnesse, and the vn sufferable splendour of his presence.

He was of meane stature, large sinewes, browne colour, broad face, with a cut lip, and had one of his fore-teeth stricken out in one Expedition, and in another his face wounded. He had a great head, thinn haire, long shankes, not proportionable to his head. He was of few words, but deceitfull; couetous, and withall prodigall, (but of other mens goods) and in deeds of lust equalling himselfe to fortie other men, or (as some say) fiftie. When he was threescore and three yeares of age, he died; of which he liued in trade of Merchandize thirtie eight, and in the Caue two; at Mecca ten, in Medina thirteene. He had commanded, that they should not burie him; for that on the third day after hee would ascend in bodie and soule into heaven. Meane-while the Earth being poysoned with the stinke of his carcase, they buried him, not at Mecca (as some affirme) but at Medina. His Law, in his life-time, sustained many alterations; Cellenus his Scribe writing what himselfe pleased: and the seuerall parcels of the same being collected by Odmen, one of his successors, this Booke was therupon called Alcam, that is, a Summary, or Collection of Precepts. Thus Mahomet aduantaged himselfe with the mutinous Rebels, Fugitiues, Vnchristes, Apostata-Iewes, and heretical Christians in that diseased State of the Empire: the bodie whereof was afflicted on the East by the Persians, on the West by the Gothes and other Barbarians, and fretted within the owne bowels by intestine rebellions: the Soule thereof being no lesse torne and rent by the Sects and Heresies of the Arians, Donatists, Nestorians, Pelagians, and others. He fishing in these troubled waters, set on foot his new Religion, to bring light to the Gentiles, and to mitigate to the Jewes and Christians the severitie of the Law and Gospell. But the Mahumetans themselves doe report otherwise, fabling of this Fabler great matters, as if he had bene the Promise and Hope of Nations, and the most excellent personage of the World.

They haue written a Booke of the generation of Mahomet to this effect: "The Booke of the generation of Mahomet, the Messenger of God, (the Prayer and Salvation of God be vpon him) from Adam and Eue to the time when God brought him forth gracious, perfect, and fit for himselfe. When as Kabacbar had learned out of the Scriptures, and by Astrologie, that his Prophet should be borne to the world, hee heard, That there was a man borne in Ieseras, a Citie of Arabia, hauing all such marks and tokens, as hee had fore-seene by the Prophecies and his Art, viz. A spot on his forehead, a print betweene his shoulders, &c. And to satisfie his desire, hee went thither to see; where finding those tokens fulfilled in yong Mahomet, he thereupon expounded the darke myserie of his farre-fetched Light, learned of his Master Kabelmedi, in this manner: When Adam was newly created, as he stood vp, his braine shakel and made a noyse, as the leaues doe, which are shaken with the winde: whereat Adam wondering, God said vnto him, The sound which thou hast heard is the signe of the Prophets and Messengers of my Commandements. Take heed therefore that thou commit this Seed of Light only to worthie Loynes, and to a cleane Wombe. And this Light of Mahomet that should be borne, shined from the face of Adam, as the Sun or Moone at the full. And when he had begotten Seth, that Light passed instantly from the face of Adam into the face of Eue, in so much, that the birds of the Aire, and beasts of the Earth, wondered at her beautie. Yea, the Angels euery day saluted her, and brought her odours out of Paradise, till she brought forth Seth alone, hauing before at euery burthen, brought forth a Brother and a Sister.

Seth inherited this Light, which remained betweene heauen and earth, the Angels thereby ascending and descending vpon Seth, and crying alwayes, Reioyce thou Earth, worships of the Light of Mahomet, on him be Prayer and Salvation of God. Adam drawing neere to his end, declared vnto him, by his Testament, the myserie of that Light, and the Genealogie of the Prophets. Then descended Gabriel accompanied with threescore and ten thousand Angels, bearing euery one of them a white leafe and a pen, which signed the writing, for the continuance of the order of the Propheticall generation. Seth received this writing, and was clothed with a double red garment, shining as the Sunne, and soft as the violet-flower.

From him it passed by succession to Noe and Sem; then to Abraham, at whose birth two lights from the East and West (meeting in the middest) lightned the whole world, and the Angels were heard singing, That it was the Light of the Prophet Mahomet, who should be borne of his Seed, whose Word should be in the vertue of God. This Light passed from Abraham to the face of Hagar, being with child, and after to Ismael; and God told him, That the Soule of Mahomet, in the beginning of the Creation, was mingled with his, and that his name in Heauen should be Asmet, in Earth Mahomet, in Paradise Abualiraxim. At this Sara grieved, vntill three Angels comforted her with the promise of Isaac. From Ismael it removed to Keidar his sonne, who being indued with 9 seuen Gifts, married Nulia of the Land of Isaac, but, being warned by an Oracle, he tooke to wife Algadira, an Arabian; and after, by diuine warning, carried the chest of this Light vnto Iacob. Then was Hamel borne to him, and receiued the same Light; in which succeeded Thebicht, Hamieffa, Adeth, Adwo, Adm, Machat, Nizar, Musar, Aliez, Madraca, Horeima, Knienu, Anofra, Melic, Falbrun, Luse, Galiben, Kab, Murran, Cudai, Abdamenes, Hefim, a man by diuine testimonie free of all vncleannesse. To him did all Kings offer their daughters in marriage, and among the rest Constantine, which he refused, and married Seline the daughter of Zit, and and had by her Abdalmulib, whose Light caused raine in drought. To him an Elephant prostrated himselfe, and said with mans voice, Saluation be on you, and on the Light that sheweth out of your Reines, Dignitie, Fame, Honor, and Victorie be on you, and that there should proceed from him a King, greater then all the Kings of the Earth: Another time, as he slept on the stone which was placed by Abraham in his Oratorie at Mecca, he dreamed of a chaine reaching East and West, and to Heauen, and to the Depth, which was presently conuerted into a flourishing hearbe. Noe and Abraham presented themselves interpreters of this Dreame. Abdalla his sonne, the father of Mahomet, had a Tutor giuen vnto him, to defend him from his enemies, who seemed a man, but was none. Hee was preserued from the lying in wait of the Lewes, by threescore and ten Angells, which seemed Men. Hee wedded Ermina, and therefore two hundred Women perished for his loue; some hanging, some burning themselves.

Abdemenef.

When the prescribed time was come, in the moneth Dulheia, on a Friday night, God bad Ariduan to open the gates of Paradise, that the innermost of his secret might bee manifested: for it pleaseth mee (saith hee) this night to transport the Light of my Prophet from the reines of Abdalla into the wombe of Ermina, and that it come into the world. This being done, as Abdalla, the Iudge and Lord of the Arabians, went into the house of Prayer, he perceiued a great light to lighten from his house vp toward Heauen, and presently dyed. On the twelfth day of Rab, on a Tuesday, Mahomet was borne, circumcised, and all frolick. And then all Idolls fell and became black: All Kingdomes were destroyed, and not one stood vp right. Lucifer was cast into the bottome of the Sea, and in fortie dayes could not get out, and then called his fellowes, and told them, that Mahomet was borne with the power of the sword, who would take away all their power. The same also God caused to be proclaimed in Heauen and Earth. His mother said, That shee was deliuered of him without paine, and Angelicall Birds came to nourish the child, and a man clothed in white presented him with three keyes, like to Pearles, which he tooke; the key of Victorie, the key of the Lawes, and the key of Prophecie. And after came three persons with shining faces, presenting him a Cauldron of Emeralds, with foure handles, which Mahomet accepted as a signe of his rule ouer all the world. The Birds, Clouds, Windes, Angels, contented for the nourishment of the child. But the case was determined by heauenly voice, affirming, That hee should not bee taken from the hands of men. An Ass, almost famished, worshipped him, and receiuing him on her back, became Herald to this new Prophet, with mans voice proclayming the worthinesse of her Carriage. Three men carried him vp into a Mountaine: of which, one of them opened him from the breast vnto the Nauell, and washed his entrailes with snow: the second cleaued his heart in the middest, and tooke out of it a black graine, saying, That it was the portion of the Deuill. The third made him whole againe. Seraphim nourished him three yeares, and Gabriel nine and twentie, who gaue vnto him, in the fortieth yeare of his age, the Law, and carried him to Heauen. This his iourney is related by Frier Richard, sometimes a student in the Vniuersitie of Baldach, Chapter 14. and in his life.

Gabriel, with threescore and ten paire of wings, came to Mahomet, in the chamber of Aissa, his best beloued wife, and said, That God would haue him to visit him where he is; and brought with him the beast Elmparac, or Alborach, of nature betweene a Mule and an Ass. This beast told Mahomet, That hee would not take him on his back, till hee had prayed to God for him. His steps were as farre as one could see, so that in the twinkling of an eye he had brought Mahomet to Ierusalem. Then Gabriel with his girdle tyed the beast to a Rock, and carried Mahomet on his shoulders into heauen; where hee knocked, and the Porter opened. Here Mahomet saw troupes of Angels, and prayed twice on his knees for them: and amongst the rest, old of Pearles, wherein was Abraham, and the huge huge Angell of Death, with his booke and pen in hand, writing the times and mens liues: (which fatall opinion maketh them hardie) The fourth was of Emerald, here was Ioseph and the Angell of Compassion, weeping for the sinnes of men. The fifth of Diamond, and in it Moses. The sixth of Rubie, and in it Iohn Baptist. The seuenth of Fire, and in it Iesus Christ. All these recommended themselves to his Prayers, old Father Adam, reioycing for such a Sonne, and commending him to his prayers. Then hee brought him to the second Heauen, which was a journey of five hundred yeares, and so forth on to the seventh Heauen: Here hee saw the Angelicall people, every of which was a thousand times greater then the World, and every of them had threescore and ten thousand heads, and every head threescore and ten thousand mouthes, and every mouth seüenteene hundred tongues, praising God in seven hundred thousand Languages. And he saw one Angell weeping, and he asked the cause, who answered, That he was Sinne. And Mahomet prayed for him. Then Gabriel commended him to another Angell, and he to another, and so forth in order, till he came before God and his Throne. Then God (whose face was covered with threescore and ten thousand clothes of light, and from whom Mahomet stood two stones cast below) touched him with his hand, the coldnesse whereof pierced to the marrow of his back-bone. And God said, I haue imposed on thee and on thy people Prayers. When he was returned as faire as the fourth Heauen, Moses counselled him to retire back, to obayne ease vnto the people, which could not beare so many prayers, which he did oftentimes, till there remayned but few. Thus returning to his Elmparac, hee rode back to his house at Mecca. All this was done in the tenth part of the night. But when he was requested to doe thus much in the peoples sight, he answered, Praised be God, I am a Man, and an Apostle.

The booke Afear (saith Ballonius) telleth further, That in this journey Mahomet heard a womans voice, crying, Mahomet, Mahomet, but he held his peace. Afterwards another called him, but he gaue no answer. Mahomet asked the Angell who they were? He answered, That the one was shee which published the Jewes Law, and if he had answered her, all his Disciples should haue bene Jewes: the other was shee which deliuered the Gospell, whom if hee had answered, all his followers had bene Christians.

The said Booke telleth, That Gods face was covered with threescore and ten thousand linnen clothes made of Light, and that God gaue him a fiew-fold priuiledge. First, That he should be the highest creature in heauen or earth: Secondly, the most excellent of the sonnes of Adam: Thirdly, An vniuersall Redeemer: Fourthly, Skillfull in all languages: Fifthly, That the spoiles of Warres should be given him. Gabriel after (saith that booke) carryed him to Hell, to see the secrets thereof, and the seuen gates thereof, &c. where (as in the place fittest for him) we will leaue him. The booke of the vertues of Mahomet saith, That in glorying of his strength he would boast, that he had knowne his eleuen wiues successfully in one houre.

One of their Chronicles telleth of his Martiall affaires. This Chronicle reckoneth from Adam to Noe one thousand two hundred two and fortie yeares: From thence to Abraham, one thousand and fourescore: Hence to Moses, five hundred and fifteene: After him to Dauid, five hundred threescore and nine: and from this time to Christ, one thousand three hundred and fiftie: from whence to Mahomet is numbred fixe hundred and twentie; in all five thousand three hundred threescore and sixteene, from Adam to Mahomet. All the Prophets were in number an hundred and twentie thousand, and the Messengers of God three hundred and fifteene: whereof Adam, Seth, Esdrik, Noe, Abraham, were Hebrewes; Huth, Schale, Ishmael, Schaib, Mahomet, were Arabians.

If this Historie of *Mahomet*s life be long and tedious, I thought good, out of an Arabian Chronicle, to adde this Epitome thereof. His Mother dyed in a journey to Mecca, when he was foure yeares old, and his Nurse restored him to his Grand-father Abu almutalif, with whom hee liued eight yeares. The Seraphim preferred him, but was neuer seene. After that, Gabriel was his Guardian, of whom he receiued the Law, which he kept close three yeares, communicating it only to some of his owne opinion, by whose helpe he became Priest and Prince of the Arabians and Saracens, and about eighteene moneths after was carried into Heauen: and being returned into the Earth, he tooke Eubocara, Ali, and Zaid to be his Companions in this enterprife. Hee went to Zaif, or Atharf, and preached publicly, and thence to Mecca, ten yeares going from place to place. And of his Conuerts, he chose some for guard of his Person, who

sware the obseruance of his Law, to the number of fortie, who now with Word, now with the Sword, set forward this Doctrine. After ten yeares, Mecca was peopled only with beleueers; and all Arabia was conuerted, without difficultie. Then hee sent to the neighbouring Kings to become of his Religion; to the King of Persia, to the Roman Emperour, to King Cinna, to the Lord of the two Seas, to the King of Ethiopia, &c. After he returned to Ietrib, and on Tuesday, the twelfth of Rab, in the eleventh yeare, dyed. His Sepulture was appointed by God in the house of Aifea his Wife, in the Chamber where he was wont to sleepe, where, at this day, is a Temple of Brick. His body was wrapped in three white clothes, without any pompe. His seale was a siluer Ring, with this inscription, Mahomet the messenger of God. He went twice on Pilgrimage, and nineteene times conducted an Armie.

The place of his buryall is at Medina, surnamed of him Talnabi*, that is, of the Prophet; not (as some write) at Mecca. Neither doth his Corps hang in the aire by force of Load-stones, drawing vp his yron Coffin or Chest, but lieth buried in the ground (if any where) as Ludouicus Versmannus, by his owne view, hath obserued. Of this place, and of Mecca, wee shall speake more, in relating the Rites of the Pilgrims that visit them.

Some relate otherwise of the death of Mahomet, as that hee dyed at fortie yeares of age, being poisoned by one of his Disciples, called Albunor, to make triall of his boasting prophecie, that he would rise againe within three dayes after his death. This Albunor after comming to see him, found his body torne in peeces, and deuoured of Dogges: whereupon gathering together the bones that remained, into a Coffin, hee caused them to be buried. Which in my minde is not so probable as the former report. The day of his death Scaliger accounteth the tenth yeare of the Hegira, on Monday the twelfth of Rabie 1. or rather the Euening before, that is, the sixteenth of Imne, in the yeare of our Lord 631. and was borne the 5. of May, An. Dom. 570. on the same day and moneth, 63. Arabike yeares before.

CHAP. IIII.

Of the Alcoran, or Alfurcan, containyng the Mahometane Law:
the summe and contents thereof.

THe Booke of Mahomet's Law is called by the name of Alcoran, which signifieth a collection of Precepts; and Alfurcan, (as it is expressed and expounded in a Booke, * called the Exposition or Doctrine of the Alcoran) because the sentences and figures thereof are seuered and distinguished, for Al is the Article, and furcan signifieth a distinction, or as some say, Redemption. Claude Duret citeth an opinion that of the Hebrew word Kara, which signifieth the Law or Scripture, commeth this word koran, which with the article Al, signifieth the Scripture, as with them it is esteemed: the like hath Soranzo. The Word of God (saith Mahomet in that Booke) came not to mee all at once, as the Law vnto Moses, the Psalmes to David, and the Gospell to Christ. The Sentences or Chapters thereof are called Azoaras, which is interpreted a Face, as we call them Capita, Heads. The stile<sup>b</sup> is not in Meter, as some haue imagined: for Iosephus Scaliger<sup>c</sup> (a great Critick, and reputed one of the greatest Linguists in the world) affirmeth, That that Language is not capable of metrickall measures by quantities of Syllables; as neither the Hebrew, Abyssine, or Syrian. Hee saith yet, That the Alcoran is composed in Rime, but such, as is not in any tunable proportion; but that word which maketh vp the Rime, being sometimes nearer, and sometimes farre beyond all harmonie, distant from that word whereto it answereth. At the end of such Rimes are set the figures of Flowers, or some such matter: which if it bee so, the Turkish nicetie of making no likenesse of any thing in their Carpets, or other Workes, is stricter then

For the wordes and <sup>a</sup> phrase; no man euer writ any thing in Arabian more rudely (saith an Arabian Christian in confutation hereof) and much better might Muzailia, Helenisi, and Alabazbi the Ethiopian, and Calliata Ellecadi, which vpon emulation composed also euery one an Alcoran, glorie of those their Workes, contayning more honestie and truth. Neither hath it pleased any noble or wise man, but the rude vulgar: of which sort, the wearie labourers gladly gaue eare to his promise of Paradise, the poore delighted to heare of Gardens in Persia, and Bankrupts and Felons easily listened to securitie and libertie. The methode <sup>a</sup> is so confused, that our Arabian Author (who liued before it was so generally embraced, and in freer times) saith, That he had heard euen good Saracens affirme with griefe, that it was so mixed and heaped together, that they could finde no Reason in it. Bad Rime, as you haue heard, and worse Reason.

Hierome Sanauro <sup>a</sup> hath the like saying, That no man can finde herein any order: Nor could so confused and foolish a Worke proceede from any naturall or supernaturall light. It is yet craftily <sup>c</sup> contriued, when he hath set downe some wicked Doctrines, presently to lace and fringe it with Precepts of Fasting, Prayer, or Good manners: alwaies taking away things hard to bee beleueed or practised: and where it deliuereth any truth, it is maimed with defect, eclipsed with obscuritie, and serueth for a stale to falshood. The Copies thereof <sup>d</sup> were diuers; and after Mahomet's death made (if it could be) worse; at least otherwise, then hee left them. For Hali had one Copie left him by Mahomet, which the Iewes corrupted, adding, racing, changing at their pleasure, and promised him their assistance, if he would professe himselfe a Prophet. But Ozimen commanded all the Bookes to bee brought and deliuered into the hands of Zeidi and Abdalla, to bring all into one Booke, and, where they dissentied, to reade after the Copie of Corair, and to burne all the rest.

Hierome Sanauro <sup>a</sup> hath the like saying, That no man can finde herein any order: Nor could so confused and foolish a Worke proceede from any naturall or supernaturall light. It is yet craftily <sup>c</sup> contriued, when he hath set downe some wicked Doctrines, presently to lace and fringe it with Precepts of Fasting, Prayer, or Good manners: alwaies taking away things hard to bee beleueed or practised: and where it deliuereth any truth, it is maimed with defect, eclipsed with obscuritie, and serueth for a stale to falshood. The Copies thereof <sup>d</sup> were diuers; and after Mahomet's death made (if it could be) worse; at least otherwise, then hee left them. For Hali had one Copie left him by Mahomet, which the Iewes corrupted, adding, racing, changing at their pleasure, and promised him their assistance, if he would professe himselfe a Prophet. But Ozimen commanded all the Bookes to bee brought and deliuered into the hands of Zeidi and Abdalla, to bring all into one Booke, and, where they dissentied, to reade after the Copie of Corair, and to burne all the rest.

They thus composed the Alcoran, whereof they left foure Copies, which after were lost. And yet Hali, Abit alib, and Ibenmuzzod then refused to deliuer vp their Bookes: Whereupon arose diuers Readings, and afterward diuers Schismes; which to compound, others often endeouored by like labours after, but could not thoroughly perfect the same. Neither doth that which we haue translated, agree with those things which Frier Richard and others cite out of it, in their confutations thereof.

in it.

f Io. Ludouic.
Viii.

The <sup>c</sup> truth thereof is such in his deuilings of new, and seeking and altering the old, that it is not probable in Vines opinion, that euer he read the old and new Testament: For (saith <sup>f</sup> he) though I thinke of him exceeding badly, yet thinke I him not so mad to change and wrest the Scripture, there especially, where it made nothing against him: but he had partly heard of such things, partly was so perswaded by his fellowes, Apostata-Iewes and Christians. This riming, harsh, confused, packing, worke, disagreeing each Copie from other, and all from truth and honestie, hath been <sup>g</sup> translated into Latine <sup>h</sup> once by an English-man, Robertus Retimensis; and after by Ioannes Segobienensis, a Spaniard, at the Councell of Constance, & after out of Arabian into Italian, published by Andrea Arinabene. The first, and last of these, that is, Retimensis, and the Italian translations are here by vs followed. For the Arabike I vnderstand not: nor can warrant this when so great a man as Scaliger findeth great fault with it: Hee that vnder-tooke to mend the Latine stile, marred the sense; and the Italian beguileth the world in professing to haue translated out of the Arabike. Thus Scaliger, who mentioned another translation then in hand, which we are almost out of hope to see. In the meane while, such as we haue, we giue to you.

uideth it into foure Bookes,
and 201. chap.

It contayneth Chapters, or Azara's 124. euery of them beginning, In the name of the mercifull and pittifull God. The first <sup>i</sup> of these are the wordes of Mahomet, and is called the Mother of the Booke, and is as it were their Creede: the rest are all deliuered as the wordes of God; hee being induced as speaker. The first is in this sense. In the name of the mercifull and pittifull God. Thankes bee vnto God, the Lord of the World, mercifull, pittifull, Iudge at the day of iudgement. Wee pray vnto thee: wee trust in thee. Leade vs into the right way, the way of them whom thou hast chosen, not of them with whom thou art angrie, and of the Infidels.

OF God he writeth further, that he is One, necessariē to all, incorporeall, which neither hath begotten, nor is begotten, nor hath any like him: the Creator, long-suffering, searcher of the heart, true. That he will confound enchantments, that without his gift, none can beleue (this his Alcoran) that he hath no sonne, for he needeth nothing, and he which setteth a second in the place of God shall goe into hell, Ac. 31. and he hath no partaker; 32. yet in Azoor. 67. hee induceth God, speaking thus: To Christ the Sonne of Marie, we haue giuen the Gospell, that by him men may obtaine the loue and fauour of God: and that the beleeuers amongst them (Christians) shall receiue a great reward: as also in Ac. 2. he saith, Euery one whosoever liueth rightly, be he Iew or Christian, or if he leaueth his owne Law, and embrace another, if hee worship God, and doe good, shall vndoubtedly obtaine Diuine fauour. Ac. 2. The Creator said, I am the only Creator, alwaies the same, pittifull, mercifull, besides whom there is none other; whose miracles and great workes are vnto the wise the frame of heauen and earth, the intercourse of night and day, the ships in the Sea fit for the vse of men, raine for the refreshing of the earth, the composition of all creatures, the windes, the clouds, &c. 15. Inuoke and worship one God alone. 43. All the miracles of God cannot bee written, if all the trees in the world were pens, and the Sea seuen times greater, and were inke; with whom it is a small thing to raise the dead.

Of the birth of Christ he writeth thus, Azo. 29. We sent our Spirit to Marie (the best of all women, and the wombe vntouched, Azoor. 31.) in likenesse of a man, professing himselfe a diuine Messenger concerning a Sonne, &c. And when shee in travell plained, Christ came from vnder her, and said, Fear not: and when some childe with her about the child, the child it selfe made answer, I am the Seruant and Prophet of God. He saith, the Iewes did not slay Christ, but one like him, Azo. 11. and vpbraideth them, for not receiuing him, Azo. 2. and chap. 4. To Christ, the Sonne of Marie, properly communicating our owne soule, we haue giuen him strength and power more then other Prophets: yet chap. 14. hee excuseth that worship which is done him and his mother.

Ac. 4. We giuing our soule to Christ the Sonne of Marie, preferred him before all others, that had bene exalted by me, to speake with God, to power and vertue. He inserteth the prayer of the Virgins Mother, when shee felt her selfe with childe, by Isaiah: and maketh Zacharie to be the Virgins Tutor. 5. Who (he saith) for his vnbeliefe was dumbe three dayes. The Angels saluted Marie, saying, O thou the purest of all women and men, deuoted to God, Ioy vnto thee of that great Messenger, with the Word of God; whose name is Iesus Christ, an excellent man, at the command of the Creator: he shall come with diuine power, with knowledge of all learning, with the Booke of the Law and Gospell; shall giue Commandements to the Israelites: shall cure life; cure diseases; shew what is to be eaten, and to be done; shall confirme the old Testament; shall make some things lawfull, which before were vnlawfull, &c. He acknowledgeth that his Mother knew not man. 11. They say (the Iewes) that they killed Christ, the Sonne of Marie, the Messenger of God, but it was not true, but they crucified in his stead another like him; for the incomprehensible God caused him to goe vnto him. Iesus is the Spirit, and Word, and Messenger of God; sent from heauen.

Concerning his Law and Alcoran, he handleth it in the second Chapter or Azo. 14. which beginneth thus: In the name of the mercifull and pittifull God. This booke without any falsehood or error, shewing the Truth (to them which loue, feare, and worship God, and are studious of prayers and almes) and the obseruation of the lawes giuen of God from heauen to thee and other thy Pdecessors, and the hope of the world to come, hath manifested the true Sect. For this bringeth the followers thereof to the highest, inticheth them with the highest good, as to the vnbeleeuers and errorous, it menaceth truly the greatest euill to come. This he after applyeth to Paradise and Hell, which is due to the Enemies of Gabriel which intimated this Booke to his heart by the Creator, and to all the Enemies of God, and Michael, and the Archangels. This his Alcoran hee calleth the establishing of the Law of the Israelites: and

and Alc. 21. he arrogateth to his booke wisdom and eloquence: and 47. hee saith it was composed of the incomprehensible and wise God, every where a greeting to it selfe, and calleth it (63) the booke of Abraham: and (69) if it should bee placed on a Mountaine, that mountaine for divine feare would bee dissolved. Those which will not be converted, take and slay, by all meanes intrapping them: and fight against them till they be your tributaries and subiects. The fifteenth part of all the prey is due to God, and his Prophet, and to your Kindred and Orphans, and the poore. Those that are taken in Warre kill or make slaves; but pardon them if they will turne to your law, and God also will pardon them. Such good Warriors shall have full pardon. The Jewes and Christians (contrarie to that he had said before) let God confound. He hath sent his messenger with the right way and good law, that he may manifest and raise above all lawes. Of the twelue moneths foure are to be consecrated to fight against the enemies. Those that refuse this war, fare loose their soules, and they which flee in the day of battell (Alc. 6.) doe it by the Devils instigation, thus punishing them for their former sinnes. They which are well (Alc. 10.) and remaine at home are not of like merit, as they which goe to warre. The fire of hell is hotter then the danger of warre. And although thou (Prophet) shouldest pardon the resisters of God and his messenger seuentie times, yet God will neuer pardon them. The sick and weake, and such as haue not necessities, are excused from this necessitie of war: but to the good warriors God giueth Paradise, in reward of their soules and goods, whether they kill or be killed, Alc. 18. 19. And in 57. Kill the vnbeleeuers whom you conquer, till you haue made great slaughter. God could take vengeance on them, but he chooseth rather to doe it by you: he shall lay deafnesse and blindnesse on the faint-hearted. Yet in 91. and 98. as contrarie to himselfe he affirmeth, that he is sent only to teach, not to compell and force men to beleue: except we expound it rather, that Jewes, Christians, and all vnbeleeuers, are compelled to be tributaries, and their slaves; not forced to change Religion, but instructed only; which agreeth with their practise. From this doctrine, and that of destiny in the 50. Alc. hath risen their forwardnesse to the warre, and the greatnesse of their conquests. Agreeable to this doctrine is their manner of teaching it: the Reader or Preacher (as saith Frier Richard, student amongst them in the Vniuersitie of Baldach) holdeth a bare sword in his hand, or setteth it vp in an eminent place, to the terrour of the gaine-sayers.

But disputation and reasoning about his law he utterly disliketh, Alc. 22. To such as will dispute with thee, answer that God knoweth all thy doings, which in the day shall determine all controversies. And 50. Nothing but euill cleaueth to the heart of such as vniuersally dispute of diuine Precepts: but commend thou thy selfe vnto God, that knoweth all things. And chap. 4. 15. Hee is commanded to goe away from such. This booke is given to take away discord from men: miracles hee disclaimeth as sufficient proofe; for though it should make plaine the mountaines, and make the dead to speake, yet they would bee incredulous: But it is thy duty only to shew them the Precepts, Alc. 23. And Alc. 10. Yee which are good, beleue in God, in his Messenger, and in the booke sent from heauen. They which first beleue, and after denie, and become incredulous, shall haue no pardon nor mercie of God, but shall goe into the fire. And (11.) We will bring infinite euill vpon him, that will not obey God and his Messenger, and will be Disputing. To them which demand that the booke may come vpon them from heauen, thou shalt say that some asked a greater thing of Mosus, and he would shew God vnto their eyes, and were therefore smitten with lightning from heauen. (12.) To the Jewes and Christians God hath giuen disagreements, till God shall determine the same at the day of Iudgement. Make not your selues, Companions of them which deride our Law. No man receiueth the perfection of the Law, but he which beleueth the Testament, the Gospell, and this Booke sent of God. 14. They which erre will say let God shew vs miracles. These hurt none but their owne soules for if they should see all miracles done, they would dispute with thee, saying, that they could not be done but by incantments. Thou shalt not come to them with manifest miracles; for they would deride them as odious things. 15. Dispute not with them which will not heare; and if they demand miracles, say, God only doth shew

I know not the secrets of God, and follow nothing but that which God and the Angel hath commanded: and if Angels should speake to such, they would not beleue: 16. God himselfe and his blessed Spirit haue compounded this most true booke: 26. 44. They which say his Law is new or fained, goe to the Deuill. 47. Hee induceth some gainaiers, saying, we will not leaue worshipping our Images for this Iester and Rimer. Yet is he alone come with the truth, confirming all the other Messengers. 55. He saith I (God) writ this booke with my owne hand. 56. The vnbeleueers say I am a Magician, and haue fained it: but then I pray God that I may haue no part in him when hee shall be our Iudge. Say not there are three Gods, but one God alone without a Son, to whom all things are subiect. Christ cannot denie but that he is subiect to God, as well as the Angels. 12. We sent Christ, to whom we gaue the Gospell, which is the light and confirmation of the Testament, & the right way to him which feareth God, by the fulfilling of your law. All that say that Christ is God, are vnbeleueers and liars (Christ himselfe hauing said, Yee children of Israell beleue in your God and my Lord) of whom he which will be partaker, shall bee cast into the fire eternall. Christ is but the messenger of God, before whom were many other messengers: and his mother was true, and they did eate. Good people exalt not your selues in your law, further then the truth. 3. The soule of Christ was cleane and blessed, he cured the leprouous, raised the dead, taught wisdom, the Testament, and the Gospell. The vnbeleueing Israelites beleued that he was a Magician. And 34. We haue giuen a good place and abounding with water to the son of Maria; and to her, for hauing done such miracles in the world.

Of the Creation he affirmeth (Az. 2.) that when God had made the world, hee disposed the seuen heauens; he told the Angels he would make one like vnto himselfe in the earth: they answered, we in all things are subiect to your Maiestie, and giue praise vnto you: but he will be wicked and a shedder of blood. Then God testifying, that he knew a thing not knowne to the Angels, taught Adam the names of things by himselfe, not knowne to the Angels, and therefore commanded the Angels to doe reuerence before Adam, which wicked Belzebub refused; they obeyed. And Az. 25. We made man of clay, and I breathed into him a portion of mine owne soule, after that I had created the Deuill of pestiferous fire: and because Belzebub refused to humble himselfe to this man (made of black mire) he was damned, and when he desired respice till the resurrection, it was denied: and therefore he said he would teach all euill things, that they shall not giue thee thanks, &c. Of the Angels he affirmeth (45.) that some of them haue two wings, some three, some foure: and (52.) the heauen would fall vpon men, were it not for the Angels that call vpon God. There they shall possesse rings of gold, chaines, iewels, clothed with cloth of gold; their beds shall be of gold, and this for ever.

Of Paradise he dreameth in this sort. Az. 65. He which feareth God shall receiue the two Paradises full of all good, pleasant with streaming fountaines. There they shall see silken and purple Carpets, and shall be accompanied with many Maidens, beautifull as the Hyacinth and pearles, neuer deflowred of men or Devils, neuer menstruous, sitting in pleasant shades with their eyes fixed on their husbands: their eyes large, with the white of them exceeding white, and the black very black, lying on the shining grasse. Faire yong men shall serue them with Vials and other Vessels, full of the most excellent liquor, which shall neither cause head-ach, nor drunkenness, and shall bring them the choicest fruits, and flesh of fowles. They shall there heare no filthy or displeasing word: and (Az. 86.) In Paradise shall bee administred to them in well-wrought vessels of glasse and siluer, drinke, as the sauourie ginger, out of the fountaine Zelzebub: they shall haue garments of silke and gold, chaines of siluer, blessed wine, Maidens likewise with pretie breasts: there tall trees of colour betweene yellow and greene. They shall haue in Paradise all pleasures, and shall enioy women with eyes faire, and as great as egges: sweet smelling Riuer of milke, and honye, and fruits of all sorts. Of this Paradise, Anicenna (a Mahumetan) saith, that it concerneth the body; but wise Diuines more respect the minde; the felicitie whereof, in coniunction with truth, they more preferre before the other of the body.

Of Hell hee fableth that it hath seuen gates; that it shall make the wicked like to

a Belzebub, said he, was made of fire, and therefore better then he which was made of earth. Az. 17.

fleas, that they shall be fed with the tree Execum, which shall burne in their bellies like fire, that they shall drinke fire; and being holden in chaines of seuentie cubits shall be kept sure; the fire shall cast forth embers like Towers or Camels. They which committed shall be punished with the fire of hell: they which feare, shall goe into Paradise: and as it were in a middle space betwixt the one and the other, there shall stand some other with hope and expectation of Paradise. We haue set Angels ouer hell, and haue appointed their numbers. (84.) 98. There shall be fountaines of scalding waters, and they shall eate vpon a reede, but shall not satisfie their hunger: they shall bee bound in chaines. 121.

He sometime excuseth his owne basenesse, as Ax. 36. The vnbeleeuers (saith he) murmur that he is followed only of Weauers, and the raskall-rout. And 53. That the Alcoran was not committed to a man of great possessions: and they say, that it is a magick, and that I haue fained it. And in 64. The Moone was diuided, and they say it is sorcerie. (The tale is told by Frier Richard thus: Mahomet pointed to the Moone with his thumbe, and middle finger, and it was diuided, the two peeces falling on the Hills of Mecha, which entring into Mahomet's coat was made whole againe.) He sometime extolleth himselfe, blasphemously inducing Christ, thus saying to the Israelites: O yee Israelites, I being sent a Messenger vnto you from God, affirme by the Testament which I haue in my hand, that a Messenger shall come after me, whose name is Mahomet, of whom they shall say that he is a Magician. 71. His beastly prerogative he boasteth, (43.) saying, he is the scale and last of the Prophets. To thee, O Prophet, we make it lawfull to lie with all women which are giuen thee, or which thou desirest, and thy Aunts, thy Kindred, and all good women which freely desire thy company, thou be willing: and this is permitted to thee alone. Diuorfe these, couple thy selfe to those at thy pleasure. And being by some other of his wiues found in bed with Mari the wife of a Iacobite Christian, he sware that he would neuer after vse her company: but after being impotent in his lusts, he ordaines a law to himselfe. Ax. 76. Why dost thou, O Prophet, make that lawfull, for the loue of thy women, which God hath made vnlawfull? God full of pittie, and giuer of pardon, hath commanded thee to blot out, or cancell thine oathes.

Of his journey to heauen, to receiue the Law, he speaketh. Ax. 63. and 82. mingling iniunctions of deuotion. 83. Thou, O Prophet, rising in the night, spend halfe the night, or a litle more or lesse, in watching, and continually and deuoutly reade ouer the Alcoran: be thou iust, patient, and refuse not to wash thy garments, O thou man clothed in woollen. 43. Let none enter into the house of the Prophet before he call; but let him stand without the gate: let none doe dishonestie within his house, let none hurt the Prophet in any thing, or haue his wife after him.

d Such tales as these of Abraham, Salomon, &c. you shall finde both in the Iewish and Popish Legeds as if the Iew, Papist, and Mahumetan, had contended for the whetstone: which any one that readeth shall finde.

Some c Prophets hee mentioneth, not named in Scripture; and of those there named hee telleth many fables. Ismael was a true Prophet, and found a good man before God. Ioseph nine yeares imprisoned for the Queene. Abraham overthrew his Fathers Idols, and should haue bene burned for the same; but the fire lost his force. The Mountaines and Birds that praise God, were subiect to Dauid. Salomon learned Magick of Arot and Maror, Diuels so called: hee knew the Language of Birds; and when he was in the midst of his Armie, consisting of Deuils, Men, and Birds; the Lapwing brought him newes of the Queene of Saba's comming, to whom by this Lapwing hee sent a Letter, &c. Of this Armie the Ants or Pismires being fraide; one Ant perswaded her fellows to get them into their holes, lest they should bee troden on. Moses married Pharaoh's Daughter. (37.) One Afcemel made the golden Calfe in the Desert against Aarons will. Pharaoh requested Hemen to build a Tower, whereon to climbe to heauen, to the God of Moses. (50.) In the time of Nae they worshipped Idols, whom he nameth Huden; Schwan; Iaguta; Ianna; Nacem.

The Prophet Hush was sent to the Nation Haath, to teach them the worship of one God: and Schale to Themuth; and Schaibe to Median; and Abraham and Lot to the Sodomites; on whom, because they were incredulous, it rained yellow and sharpe stones. (Ax. 21.) Moses was sent to Pharaoh, &c. His scope of these Narrations is, that he is sent like wise a Prophet, and therefore iudgement will pursue them which refuse him, as it did those incredulous Nations. These sauiour of a Iewish helpe. He telleth also of Alexander & Mag. that he had all knowledge: hee found the Sunne, where it lay resting in a yellow fountayne; and the mountaines in, which it riseth. And finding men without vse of speech, he diuided them from other men, &c. Az. 28.

He proueth substantially that there shall be a resurrection, by the historie of the seven Sleepers, which slept in a Cauer 360. yeares. (28. Az.) and (49.) He saith, that at the time of death, God taketh away the soule at an houre knowne, restoring it to some, to some, neuer: at the first sound of the trumpet all shall die, except those which shall be protected by the will of God: at the second sound all things shall reuiue, and bee iudged: and (66.) The earth shall tremble, the mountaines shall bee brought to dust, and the whole companie shall be diuided into three parts: some before, others on the right hand, both which sorts shall be blessed: but those on the left hand, in their left hands shall receive the scroll or sentence of their condemnation. And 79. In the last iudgement the earth shall be ouerthrowne, the heauen shall be powred forth. 8. Angels shall beare vp the Throne of God. And (80.) The heauens shall vanish as sinoake, and the earth shall be plucked as wooll. And (111.) There shall bee set vp the ballance of iudgement: they to whom shall befall a light weight, shall liue, but they which haue a heauie weight shall be cast into fire. The booke of bad workes shall be kept in the bottom of the earth; the booke of good workes in a high place.

In diuers places of the Alcoran, the better to colour his filthinesse, he hath disperfed good sentences, like Roses scattered on a dung-hill, and flowers in a puddle: concerning Almes, Prayer, Tithing, Iustice, &c. Others he hath of another sort establishing his owne Tyrannie and Religion. Az. 26. Swines flesh, Bloud, that which dieth alone, and that which hath the neck cut off, not in Gods name, is vnlawfull. Be chaste euery where, but with your owne wiues, or such as are subiect to you, and doe serue you. Every Adulterer shall haue an hundred stripes in the presence of many. He which accuseth a woman of adulterie, not prouing it by foure witnesses, shall haue eightie. The ialous husband accusing his wife, must sweare foure times that hee chargeth her truly; and a fifth time curse himselfe, if it be otherwise. The woman must doe the like to cleare her selfe. (43.) After a woman be diuorced from one, any other may marrie her. (19.) Trust not a sonne or a brother, except he be of your owne Law. 72. On Friday when they are called to prayer, they must lay all businesse apart: when prayers be ended, they may returne to their commodities. Redeeme captiues; and thy sinnes by good workes. About Circumcision I finde no iniunction in the Alcoran. In the 3. 8. and 9. Az. Hee permitteth all licentiousnesse with all women which they haue of their owne: but prescribeth washings after Venerie, and after naturall easements. Loue not your enemies: the women of another faith proue first: and if they fauour the vnbelievers, diuorce them. (70.) It is no sinne to reuenge iniuries. 52. The women must couer their faces. 43.

The going on Pilgrimage, and the perpetuall abode at the Temple of Haran (that is, vnlawfull, because nothing but their holies are there vnlawfull) were pure of equall merit. They which loue it not, or doe it iniurie, shall sustaine grievous euils. Abraham founded this Temple, and blessed it, and cleansed it, for them which abode there, and for the Pilgrims. He x preached one God without partaker, and the pilgrimage to this Temple, that on the dayes appointed they might, in naming God, sacrifice beasts, wherewith to feast themselues and the poore, and might fulfill their voües, and goe in Procession round about the old Temple, a worke which God will greatly reward. Az. 32. and 19. In the times of fasting and pilgrimage hunting by Land is vnlawfull, except that so gotten be bestowed on the poore at Mecca: taking fish by Sea as they goe or returne, is lawfull. Az. 13. The vnbelieuers are not worthe to visit the Temple Haran. And these good Pilgrims are not equall to the good warriors. 38. He entered into the Temple Haran with his head shauen.

Az. 2. Wee enioyne vnto you (as to your Predecessors) fasting in the time thereto appointed, and in a certaine number of dayes, that is, in the moneth Romadan, in which, this Booke (which discerneth between good and euill) was sent you from hea-

uen. Every one must obserue it, but the sick and traueiler, and let them doe the same in the remainder of the time. The rich vse to satisfie their fasting with almes; let them doe both the one and the other. He permitteth you the vse of your wiues in the night, because it is hard and impossible to abstayne. But let none vse their companie in the Temples. Fast all the day, and when night is come; eate and drinke as much as you please, till the morning. By the Moone is knowne the time of Pilgrimages, and of fastings, whereby is knowne that you loue and feare God. Spend your money in the loue of God in Pilgrimage, not despairing. Hee that is impotent, and that is not accompanied of his wife in the pilgrimage, must fast three dayes in the voyage, and euen after his returne. To the sick, fasting with almes is sufficient. They which purpose this pilgrimage, let them not giue their mindes to any euill. Let them not be ashamed to aske necessaries. 2. Hold it for iust and good to enter the house at the doore, not on the side, or back-side thereof. 35. Salute those which yee meete, when yee enter into the house.

Ridiculous is the confirmation of this holy Law, by such varietie of Oathes, as I am almost afraide to mention, in regard of our Gull-gallants of these times, who would sometimes bee at a set in their braue and brauing phrases, if they should not haue varietie of Oathes and Curses, to daube vp with such interiections all imperfections of speech and make smoother way for the current of their gallantrie. But yet euen for their sakes, let vs mention a few, that they may see Mahomet had as braue a humour this way as they. He induceth God swearing by lesse then himselfe, as by the order of Angels, by the Alcoran, by the blowing Windes, by the waterie Clouds, by the sailing Ships, by the Mount Sinai, the Heauen, the Sea, the euening Starre, the West, his Pen and Lines, the guiltie Soule, the Devils, by the Morning, ten Nights, the Passouer, by the Figges and Oliues, by the Dawning, and Twilight, and a World more of the like: only he saith (Azoara 100.) that he may not sweare by the earth, nor by the Sonne like to the Father.

Az. 8. They which eate the inheritance of Orphans, euilasting fire shall eat them. Be faithfull in keeping and deliuering their goods, for God taketh knowledge of all accounts. Let one Sonne haue as much as two Daughters. In bargayning vie nothing, slaying your owne soule. The couetous shall haue endlesse punishment: hee that killeth vnwillingly, shall giue to the Kindred of the partie slaine, another man; or if he cannot doe that, let him fast two moneths together: hee which killeth wilfully shall be cast into the fire.

Salute him which saluteth thee, for salutation is much pleasing to God. 56. The Deuils hearing the Alcoran, shall be conuerted, and flie from their Companions.

Sentences.

Az. 27. Worship one God alone. Honour thy Father and Mother, and doe them good. Giue them no bad word when they are old. Be subiect with all humilitie, and pray God to pardon them. Giue to the poore and to your kindred, but not superfluously: for they that doe superfluously are of Kinne to the Deuill. Slay not your children for no cause. Be yee not Fornicators; for that is wickednesse and a bad way. Be reuenged on Murderers. Say nothing till yee know it; for you must giue account of your saying. 26. In disputing or reasoning vse only good wordes. Answer in honest sort to him which asketh thee. 27. Be iust in weight and measure. 37. The Deuill standeth ouer the makers of songs and lies, that is, the Poets, if they amend not, doing good. 68. If you cannot giue, be daily in prayers. Pay your tithes, following God and the Prophet. They which doe not good but for vaine glorie and ostentation, shall be damned. 118. The Histories which are in the old Testament, are so cited by him, as if he neuer had read them, so many dreames and lies are inserted.

Prayer.

Az. 12. Before praier wash the face, the hands, the armes vp to the elbow, the feet vp to the ankles; and after carnall companie wash in the Bath; and if water cannot be had, with dust of cleane earth. God desireth cleannesse. 9. In praier let them be sober, that they may know what they say. 2. God will not aske why men pray not toward the East, for the East and West is his; but will demand of the workes which they haue done, of their Almes, Pilgrimages, and Prayers. He comandeth that they be humble in prayer, and that in prayer they turne towards Mecca. Every one which shall pray, asking that which is good, which way soever hee shall turne him, shall bee heard of God: although the true manner of praying be toward the Center of the Temple of Mecca. They which are good, make their prayers to helpe them by their patience and abstinence. God dwelleth in such men. Pray according to the visuall custome in all places, the foot-man on foot, the horse-man on his horse.

Al. 3. He that giueth his owne for Gods sake, is like a graine that hath seven eares, Almes: every of which containeth an hundred graines. Good men loose not your Almes by vaine glorie. 4. Giue almes of the good gaines of your monie, and of that which the earth produceth; but God respecteth not gifts of that which is vniustly gotten. Satan perswadeth you to giue nothing for feare of pouertie. To giue almes publickly is good, but to giue priuately is better: and this blotteth out finnes. Giue specially to those which stay in one place, and are ashamed to aske. 6. God will giue Paradise to them which in time of famine and scarfitie giue liberally, and which receiue iniuries, and repent of their finnes.

Al. 2. They which are intreated to beleue the diuine Precepts, say, they will follow their Ancestors in their Sect. What would yee follow your Fathers if they were blinde or deafe? Will yee be like them in being mute, blinde, and foolish? Tradition.

Al. 2. O good men, eate that good which he hath giuen you, and giue him thanks; Meates. about all other things calling vpon him. Abstaine from that which dieth of it selfe, from Swines flesh, from Bloud, and from euery other creature that is killed, and not in the name of the Creator. But in case of necessitie it is not sinne; for God is mercifull, and will forgive you this. 12. Eate not of that which is drowned, burned in the fire, and touched of the Wolfe. 16. Eate nothing which hath not before bene blessed. To the Iewes we made many things vnlawfull, because of their wickednesse. 2. He which shall contradict this Booke, shall continually be consumed in vnquenchable fire, and none of his workes shall helpe him.

Al. 2. Every one which draweth nigh to death, let him leaue of his monie to his familie and kindred to distribute in almes; and they which shall change that vse, shall be iudged of the Creator; &c. Death.

Al. 3. To them that doubt of Wine, of chesse, of scales, and of tables, thou shalt say that such sports, and such drinckes are a great sinne, and although they be pleasant or profitable, yet are they hurtfull finnes: if they say what shall wee then doe? thou shalt say, The good things of God. Perswade them to seeke the Orphanes, and succour them, as their Brethren, or else God will make them so poore, that they shall not be able to helpe either themselves or others. 13. Wine, chesse, and tables, are not lawfull, but the Devils inuentions, to make debate amongst men, and to keepe them from doing good. Let none goe on hunting in the Pilgrimage moneth. Drinckes and Games.

Al. 3. Take not a wife of another Law, nor giue your daughters to men of another Law, except they before conuert to your Law. Let no man touch a woman in her discale, before shee be well cleansed. Vse your wiues, and the women which are subiect to you, where and how you please. Women which are diuorced, may not marrie till after foure moneths, hauing had three times their menstruous purgation. Let them not denie their husbands their companie at their pleasure. They are the heads of the women. After a third diuorce from one man, they may not marrie the same man againe, except they haue in the meane time bene married to another, and be of him diuorced. Let the women nurse their children two yeares, receiuing necessities of the fathers. After buriall of a husband, let them stay vnmarried foure moneths, and ten daies; and not goe out of the house in a yeare after. Take yee two, three, foure wiues, and finally as many as in your minde you are content to maintayne and keepe in peace. It is vnlawfull to marrie with the Mother, Daughter, Sister, Aunt, Neece, Nurse, or the mother of daughter of the nurse; and take not a whore to wife. 9. Let the wiues keepe their husbands secrets, or else let them be chastised, and kept in house and bed, till they be better. 10. Let the husband seeke to liue peaceably with his wife. 31. Cast not thine eyes on other mens wiues, though they be faire. A woman conuicted of adulterie by testimony of foure women, must bee kept in her house till shee die and let none come at her her. Az. 8. If you loue not your wiues you may change them : but take away nothing of that which is giuen them.

Az. 3. Swear not in all your affaires by God and his names. They which forswear themselves shall haue no good thing in the world to come. And 35. Swear not rashly, for God seeth euery thing.

Forcing to beleene.

Az. 4. Offer violence to no man in respect of the Law, for the way of doing good and euill is open. 4. God gaue first the Testament, then the Gospell, and lastly the true Booke, the Alfurcan of your Law, in confirmation of those former.

Az. 4. They which liue of Vsurie shall not rise againe otherwise then the Devils: they embrace that which God hath said is vnlawfull: but they say Vsurie is as merchandize. Yee which are good feare God, and forsake Vsurie, lest the anger of God, and of the Prophet, assaile you. Take only the principall; and if hee cannot pay you, stay till he can, and giue him almes; for this shall be better for you.

Repentance.

Az. 4. He which repenteth him, and leaueth his sinne, obtayneth pardon, and the cancelling of that which is past; but returning againe thereto, he shall suffer eternal fire. In the 5. Vnto bad men is denyed humane and diuine mercie, except they repent. God careth little for the conuersion of them, which, after that of Infidels they are made beleeuers, become worse. Such shall suffer without any remission intolerable punishment. 10. God pardoneth lesse faults, but not criminall.

Friendship.

Az. 5. Let no man reckon him a good friend, which is an vnbeleeuers, except hee be for feare. If betwixt you there grow discord, laying aside all stomack, doe the will of God, and become Brethren together, imitating God, who hath deliuered you from the fire, and from dangers. 6. God would not that any should doe euill to those of his owne Nation, and those which consent to your Law, but rather their profit and commoditie.

Az. 6. Thinke not that euer Paradise shall be open vnto you, if you bee not firmitiue and couragious in battaile: and before you enter into battaile, prepare your selves for death: and after the death of the Prophet Mahomet, defend the orders by him giuen with Armes. No man can die, but when God will, that is, when his time is come. Those which flee out of the warre, are prouoked of the Deuill; but God pardoneth them which repent. They which die in the way of God, are not truly called dead: They liue with God. Let none feare them which are gouerned of the Deuill. 7. Be patient, and you shall haue eternall life. 10. Accompanie not with vnbeleeuers, neither in friendship, nor other businesse. They which goe on war-fare for God and the Prophet, shall receiue abundance in the Earth, and after death the mercie of God. They which refuse (except they be sick or children) shall bee cast into Hell. Neglect not prayers in your expeditions. Some may pray, whiles others stand in Armes. Pray not for them which hurt their owne soules. 18. Looke to your selues that there be no discord amongst you.

* Magdeburgenses in Centuria 7. haue also gathered some heads of this headlesse Monster, the same is done by Cantacuzenas, & in summa secte Sarac. &c. but not thus fully.

His last Azara is this: In the name of the mercifull and pittifull God; sanctify thy selfe, and pray continually, and humbly vnto him which is Lord of all Nations, Lord of all God of all, that he will defend and deliuer thee from the Deuill, which entreteth the hearts of men, and from deuillish and peruerse men. (From Mahomet himselfe and from his deuillish and peruerse Law. A M E N.)

Thus haue I endeououred to bring some order out of confusion, and haue framed these heads out of that Alcoran-Chaos*, where is scarce either head or taile: this take they haue and beleue (for what will not? what shall not they beleue, which refuse to beleue the Truth?) that hee which readeth this Booke a thousand times in his Life, shall haue a woman in Paradise, whose eye-browes shall be as large as the Raine-bow. Annot. Anonymi in Alcoran.

CHAP. V.

Other Muhameticall speculations, and explanations of their Law, collected out of their owne Commentaries of that Argument.

Such writings as haue come to our hands touching Mahomet's doctrine and Religion, that seemeth most fully to lay them open, which is called by a some, Scala, a booke containing the exposition of the Alcoran, in forme of a Dialogue, translated into Latine by Hermannus Dalmata, and made the twelfth Chapter of the first booke of the Alcoran in Italian. I haue therefore presumed on the Readers patience, to those former collections out of the Alcoran it selfe to adde these ensuing, as a further explanation of their opinions. The Messenger of God (so beginneth that booke) was fitting amongst his fellowes (the prayer and saluation of God be vpon him) in his Citie Ierab; and the Angell Gabriel descending on him, said, God salureth thee, O Mahomet, &c. There come foure wise-men, Masters in Israel, to proue thee; the chiefe of whom is Abdia-ben-Salon. Mahomet therefore sent his cousin Hali to salute them; and they being come to Mahomet, after mutuall salutations, Abdia telleth him, that he and his fellowes were sent by the people of the Lewes, to learne the vnderstanding of some obscurer places of their Law. Mahomet asketh, if he come to enquire, or to tempt. Abdia saith, to enquire. Then Mahomet giuing him full leaue, he beginneth; hauing before gathered out of the whole bodie of their Law an hundred most exquisite questions. The principall dregges you shall heere haue.

Abdia. Tell vs (O Mahomet) whether thou be a Prophet or a Messenger? Mahomet. God hath appointed me both a Prophet and a Messenger. Ab. Doeft thou preach the Law of God, or thine owne Law? Mah. The Law of God: this Law is Faith, and this Faith is, that there are not Gods, but the God, without partaker. Ab. How many lawes of God are there? Mah. One, the law, and faith of the Prophets, which went before vs, was one; the rites were different. Ab. Shall we enter Paradise for faith or workes? Mah. Both are necessarie; but if a Gentile, Jew, or Christian, become a Saracen, and preuent his good workes, Faith only shall suffice: But if Gentile, Jew, or Christian, doe good workes, not in the loue of God, the fire shall consume both him and his worke. Ab. How doth the mercie of God preuent his anger? Mah. When before other creatures Adam rose vp, he kneeced and said, God be thanked; and the Angels hearing it, said, The Praise of God be vpon thee, Adam, who answered, Amen! Then said the Lord, I haue receiued your prayer. Ab. What be the foure things which God wrought with his owne hands? Mah. He made Paradise, planted the tree of the Trumpet, formed Adam, and did write the Tables of Moses. Ab. Who told thee this? Mah. Gabriel, from the Lord of the world. Ab. In what forme? Mah. Of a man standing vpright, neuer sleeping, nor eating, nor drinking, but the praise of God. Ab. Tell me in order what is one, what is two, what three, foure, fise, sixe, &c. to an hundred. Mah. One is God without Sonne, partaker or fellow, almightie Lord of life and death. Two, Adam and Eue. Three, Michael, Gabriel, Saraphiel, Archangels Secretaries of God. Foure, The Law of Moses, the Psalmes of Dauid, the Gospell, and Alfurcan (so called of the distinction of the Sentences). Fise, The prayers which God gaue me and my people, and to none of the other Prophets. Sixe, The dayes of Creation. Seuen, Heauens. Eight, Angels which sustaine the Throne of God. Nine, Are the miracles of Moses. Ten, Are the fasting-dayes of the Pilgrimes: three, when they goe, seuen in their returne. Eleuen, Are the Starres whereof Ioseph dreamed. Twelue monthes in the yeare. Thirteene, is the Sunne and Moone, with the eleuen Starres. Fourteene candles hang about the throne of God, of the length of fise hundred yeares. Fifteene, The fifteenth day of Ramadam, in which the Alcoran came sliding from heauen. Sixteene, Are the legions of the Cherubims. Seventeene, Are the names of God betweene the bottom of the earth and hell, which stay those flames, which else would consume the world. Eighteene, Interpositions there be betweene the the Throne of God, and the aire; for else the brightnesse of God would blinde the world. Nineteene, Be the armes or branches of Zachia. a riuer in hell, which shall make a great noise in the day of Iudgement. Twentie, The day of the month Ramadam, when the Psalmes descended on Dauid. The one and twentieth of Ramadam, Salomon was borne. The two and twentieth, Dauid was pardoned the sinne against Vriab. The three and twentieth of Ramadam, Christ the Sonne of Mary was borne, the prayers of God be vpon him. The foure and twentieth, God spake to Moses. The fife and twentieth, the Sea was diuided. The fixe and twentieth, He received the Tables. The seuen and twentieth, Ionas was swallowed of the Whale. The eight and twentieth, Jacob recouered his sight, when Iudas brought Iosephs coat. The nine and twentieth, Was Enoch translated. The thirtieth, Moses went into Mount Sinai. Ab. Make short worke, for thou hast done all this exactly. Mab. Fortie are the dayes of Moses his fasting. Fiftie thousand yeares shall the day of Iudgement continue. Sixtie are the veines, which euery of the heauens haue in the earth, without which varietie there would be no knowledge amongst men. Seuentie men Moses tooke to himselfe. Eightie stripes are due to a drunken man. Ninetie, The Angell said to Dauid, This my fellow hath ninetie sheepe, and I but one, which he hath stolen from me. An hundred stripes are due to the Adulterer.

Ab. Well, shew vs how the earth was made, and when? Mab. God made man of mire: the mire, of froth: this was made of the tempests; these, of the sea: The sea, of darknesse; the darknesse, of light; this, of the word; the word, of the thought; the thought, of Iacynth; the Iacynth, of the commandment: Let it be, and it was. A. How many Angels are set ouer men? M. Two, one on the right hand, which writeth his good deeds; another on the left, which registreth his bad. These sit on mens shoulders. Their pen is their tongue, their inke is their spittle, their heart is the booke. Ab. What did God make after? Mab. The bookes wherein are written all things, past, present, and to come, in heauen and earth; and the pen made of the brightest light, fife hundred year: long, and eighthe broad, hauing eightie teeth, wherein are written all things in the world, till the day of Iudgement. The booke is made of the greatest Emerald; the words, of Pearles; the couer, of pitie. God ouer-looketh the same an hundred and sixtie times in a day and night. The heauen is made of smoake, of the vapour of the sea: the greenenesse of the sea proceedeth from the mount Kaf, which is made of the Emeralds of Paradise, and compasseth the world, bearing vp the heauens. The gates of heauen are of gold, the lockes of light, the keys of pietie. Aboue the heuens are the sea of life, aboue that, the cloudie sea; then the ayrie sea, the stonie sea, the darke sea, the sea of solace, the Moone, the Sunne, the name of God, Supplication, Gabriel, the parchment rased, the parchment full written, all these in order one ouer another. Then, aboue all, these, the threescore and ten spaces of light: then threescore and ten thousand hills, with threescore and ten thousand spaces betweene, and threescore and ten thousand troupes of Angels on them, in euery troupe fife thousand Angels alway praising the Lord of the world: aboue these the limits or bounds of Angelicall dignitie: and aboue the same the banner of glorie, and then spaces of peades, and in their orders one aboue another, the spaces of Grace, of Power, of Diuinitie, of Dispensation, the Foot stoole, the Throne, the house of the Vniuerse.

Ab. Are the Sunne and Moone faithfull or not? Mab. They are faithfull, and obey every command of God. Ab. Why then are they not of equall light? Mab. God created them equall but by this it came to passe, that the vicissitude or intercoure of day and night was vncertaine, till Gabriel flying by the Moone, darkened her with the touch of his wing. Ab. How many orders are there of the Starres? Mab. Three, the first of those which hang by chaines from the Throne of God, giuing light to the seuenth Throne: the second chase away the diuels, when they would enter into heauen: the third in the sight of the Angels. There are seuen seas betweene vs and heauen. There are three windes: the first barren; the second tempestuous, which shall blow the fire in the day of Iudgement: the third ministrereth to the earth and sea. Ab. Where is the Sunne? Mab. In a hot fountaine: this, in a Serpent, which is a great space in the mount Kaf; and this Kaf is in the hand of the Angell, which holdeth the world world till the day of Iudgement. Abd. What is the manner of them, which beare vp the Seate of God? Mab. Their heads are vnder the Seat of God, their feet vnder the seuen Thrones, their neckes are so large, that a bird in a thousand yeares continuall flight, could not reach from the one eare to the other. They haue hornes, and their meate and drinke is the prayse and glorie of God. Abd. How farre is it to heauen? Mabom. Five hundred yeares journey to the lowest, and so from each to other. Abd. What birdes are betweene vs and heauen? Mabom. Some which touch neither heauen nor earth, hauing manes like horses, haire like women, wings like birdes, and lay their egges and hatch them on their tayles till the day of Iudgement.

Ab. What was the forbidden tree? Mab. Of wheat, which had seuen eares, whereof Adam plucked one, wherein were five graines; of which, two he eat, two he gaue to Eue, and one he carried away. This graine was bigger then an egge, and being bruised, brought forth all kinds of seed. Ab. Where was Adam receiued after his expulsion from Paradise? Mab. Adam in India, Eue in Nubia. Adam was couered with three leaues of Paradise; Eue, with her haire: They met together in Arafe. Further, as concerning Eue, she was made of a rib of the left side, for otherwise she had beene as strong as the man.

Ab. Who dwelt in the earth before? Mab. First the Diuels, seuen thousand yeares after them the Angels: lastly Adam, a thousand yeares after the Angels. Ab. Who began the Pilgrimage. Mab. Adam. Gabriel shaued his head, and he circumcised himselfe; and after him Abraham. Ab. To what Land spake God at any time? Mab. To Mount Sinai, that it should lift vp Moses to heauen: Abitabil and Moses are the two men, whose sepulchres are not knowne. Moses by chance found a sepulchre; which while he measured with his bodie, the Angell of Death drew from him his soule out of his nostrils, by the smell of an apple of Paradise.

Ab. Where is the middle of the earth? Mab. In Ierusalem. Ab. Who made the first ship? Mab. Noe: he receiued the keyes thereof of Gabriel, and going forth of Arabia, compassed Mecca seuen times, and likewise Ierusalem. In the meane while Mecca was receiued vp into heauen, and the mount Abikobez preserved Ierusalem in her belly. Ab. What shall become of the children of the Infidels? Mab. They shall come in at the day of Iudgement, and God shall say vnto them, would yee doe that thing which shall be commanded you? And he shall command to flow forth one of the rivers of hell, and bid them leape into the same. They which obey, shall goe into Paradise. This shall be the trial of the children of the faithfull also, which are borne deafe, blinde, &c. Abd. What resteth vnder these seuen earthes? Mabom. An Oxe, whose feet are on a white stone, his head in the East, his taile in the West; hee hath fortie hornes, and as many teeth; it is a thousand yeares journey from one horne to another. Vnder that stone is Zohor, a mountaine of hell, of a thousand yeares journey. All the Infidels shall ascend vpon the same, and from the top shall fall into hell. Vnder that Mount is the Land Werelea; vnder that, the sea Alkasem: the Land Aliolen, the sea Zere: the land Neama, the sea Zegir: the land Theris, the land Agiba, white as milke, sweet as muske, soft as saffron, bright as the Moone: the sea Alknair; the fish Albebbur, with his head in the East, his taile in the West: all these in order one after another. And beneath all these in like infernall order the Winde, the Mountaine, the Thunder, the Lightning, the bloudie Sea, Hell closed, the fiery Sea, the darke Sea, the sea Pa, the cloudie sea, Prayses, Glorifications, the Throne, the Booke, the Pen, the greater name of God.

Ab. What hath come out of Paradise into the World? Mab. Mecca, Iesrab Ierusalem: as on the contrarie, out of Hell; Vastat in Egypt, Antiochia in Syria, Ebheran in Armenia, and Elmeden of Chaldaea. Ab. What say you of Paradise? Mab. The ground of Paradise is of gold, enameled with Emeralds, and Hiacinths, planted with every fruitfull tree, watered with streames of milke, hony, and wine: the day is of a thousand yeares continuance, and the yeare of fortie thousand yeases. The people shall haue whatsoeuer can bee desired, they shall be cloathed in all colours, except

Adam, in resemblance like Christ, neuer encreasing or diminishing. As soone as they are entered, shall be set before them the liues of the Fish Albebbut, and whatsoeuer dainties they can desire. They shall not need going to stoole any more then the child in the wombe, but they shall sweate out all superfluities, of sentlike muske. They shall eat but for delight, not for hunger. Vnlawfull meates, as Swines flesh, they shall refraine. And if you list to know why this beaſt is vnclane, vnderstand that Iesus on a time called forth Iaphet to tell his Disciples the Historie of the Arke; Which told them, that by the weight of the ordure, the Arke cleaned on the one side, whereupon Noe, consulting with God, was bidden bring the Elephat thither, out of whose dung, mixed with mans, came forth a Hog, which wrooted in that mire with his snout, and by the stincke thereof was produced out of his nose a Mouſe, which gnawed the boords of the Arke: Noe fearing this danger, was bidden to strike the Lion on the forehead: and by the Lions breath was a Cat engendered, mortall enemy to the Mouſe. But to returne from this stincking tale, to refresh our selues with the like sweets of this Paradise. Hee addeth, that there they haue the wiues that heere they had, and other concubines, whom, how, when, whereſoeuer they will.

Abd. But why is wine lawfull there, and heere vnlawfull? Mab. The Angels Arrot and Marot, were sometime sent to instruct and gouerne the world, forbidding men wine, iniustice, and murder. But a woman hauing whereof to accuse her husband, intired them to dinner, and made them drunke. They inflamed with a double heate of wine and lust, could not obtaine that their desire of their faire Hostesse, except one would teach her the word of ascending to heauen, and the other of descending. Thus she mounted vp to heauen. And vpon enquire of the matter, shee was made the Morning-starre, and they put to their choice, whether they would be punished in this world, or in the world to come: they accepting their punishment in this, are hanged by chaines, with their heads in a pit of Babel, till the day of Iudgement.

Hell, saith Mahomet there, hath the floore of Brimstone, sinoakie, Pitchie, with stincking flames, with deepe pittes of scalding pitch, and sulphurous flames, wherein the damned are punished daily: the trees beare most loathsome fruits, which they eat.

The day of Iudgement shall bee in this sort. In that day God will command the Angell of Death to kill euery Creature; which being done, he shall aske him if nothing be aliue: Adreiel the Angell of Death shall answer, Nothing but my selfe. Then go thy wayes betwixt Paradise and Hell; and last of all kill thy selfe. Thus hee, foulded in his wings, prostrate on the earth, shall strangle himselfe with such a bellowing noife, as would terrifie the very Angels, if they were aliue.

Thus the world shall be emptie fortie yeares. Then shall God hold the Heauen and Earth in his fist, and say, Where are now the mightie men, the Kings and Princes of the World? Tell me (if yee be true) whose is the Kingdome, and Empire, and Power? Repeating these words threetimes, he shall raise vp Seraphiel, and say, Take this Trumpet, and goe to Ierusalem, and sound. This Trumpet is of fife hundred yeares iourney. At that sound all Soules shal come forth, and disperse themselves vnto their owne bodies, and their bones shall be gathered together. Fortie yeares after he shall sound againe, and then the bones shall resume flesh and sinewes. After fortie yeares the third sound shall warne the Soules to re-possesse their bodies: and a fire from the West shall driue euery creature to Ierusalem. When they haue here swumme fortie yeares in their owne sweate, they shall, with much vexation, come to Adam, and say, Father Adam, Father Adam, Why hast thou begotten vs to these miseries and torments? Why sufferest thou vs to hang betweene hope and feare? Pray to God, that he will finish his determination of vs betweene Paradise and Hell: Adam shal excuse his vnworthines for his disobedience, and send them to Noe, Noe will post them to Abraham, Abraham to Moses: He shall send them to Iesus Christ: To him they shall come and say, The Spirit, Word, and Power of God, let thy pitie moue thee to make intercession for vs. Hee shall answer them, That which you aske, you haue lost. I was indeed sent vnto you in the power of God, and Word of Truth, but ye haue erred, and haue made me God; more then then ever I preached to you: and haue therefore lost my benefit. But goe to the last of the Prophets, meaning him with whom thou now talkest. Abdia. Then shall they turne to him, and say; O faithfull Messenger, and friend of God, we haue sinned, heare vs holy Prophet, our only hope, &c. Then shall Gabriel present himselfe to helpe his friend, and they shall goe to the Throne of God. And God shall say, I know why you are come, Forre be it that I should not heare the prayer of my faithfull one. Then shall a Bridge be made ouer Hell, and on the toppe of the Bridge shall bee set a ballance, wherein euery mans workes shall be weighed, and those which are saued, shall passe ouer the Bridge, the other shall fall into Hell. Abd. How many bands of men shall there be in that day. Mabom. An hundred and twentie; of which three only shall be found faithfull; and euery Band or Troupe of men shall be in length the journey of a thousand yeares, in breadth fise hundred. Abd. What shall become of Death? Mab. He shall be transformed into a Ramme, and they shall bring him betwene Paradise and Hell. Then shall arise much dissentions between these two peoples, through feare of the one, and hope of the other. But the people of Paradise shall preuaile, and shall fly Death betwene Paradise and Hell. Abd. Thou, O Mabomet, hast ouercome, and I beleue, that there is but one God Alwightie, and thou art his Messenger and Prophet.

In this long and tedious Summarie, of that longer and more tedious Dialogue, compared with the former Iewish opinions, touching their Behemoth, Leuiathan, Ziz, Jerusalem, Swines flesh, the Angell of Death, and other their superstitious opinions, it may appeare, that the Iewes were forward Mint-masters in this new-coyned Religion of Mabomet.

In the beginning of this Dialogue are mentioned their fise Prayers and their Ramadan, or Ramazan: Of which, that Arabian Noble-man, in confutation of the Alcoran, writeth thus: "He which hath fulfilled these fise prayers, shall be prayesd in this world, and the next. They are as follow: Two kneeling in the morning, after-noonne foure; at Vespers, or a little before Sunne-set, foure; after Sunne-set, foure; at their beginning of supper, two; and after supper, when it is darke, two; in all eigh-teen kneeling in a day.

Their Lent<sup>d</sup>, or Fast of the Moneth Ramazan, is thus: In the day time they must fast from Meate, Drinke, and Venerie, till the Sunne be downe: then is Riot permitted them, till a white threed may be discerned from a blacke. But if any be sicke, or in journeying, he may pay at another time the same number of dayes, Sampsates Isphacanes, a Persian, in a letter written to one Meletius, which had con-verted to Christianitie, and fled to Constantinople, to reduce him to his former vomit, allegeth this saying of God to Mabomet: I haue made all things for thee, and thee for me; obiecteth to Christians the worship of three Persons, the Father, Mother, and Sonne, the worship of many gods. And how (saith he) can God haue a Sonne with- out a woman? And how can they agree together? How can God be made man? And why could he not haue saued man by a word. but as if he had beene hindered through weaknesse, did therefore become man? And if hee were God, how could he suffer? Yea, the name of Mabomet, saith he, was expresse both in the old Testament, and the Gospell, Christ himselfe commending it, which the Christians haue rased out: yea, from euerlasting it was written on the right side of the Throne of God. And the Mu- sulmans deriue their faith from Abraham. This I haue inserted, to shew the vaine conceits they haue of our Religion, and their blinde confidence in their owne, with their carnall dreames and diuile mysteries, and diuillish slanders of our Scriptures, which they know not. they scandall also from the worship of Images and Saints.

Frier Richard<sup>e</sup> reciteth among Mabomets opinions, That of threescore and thir- teen parts of the Saracens, one onely shall be saued; and, that the Diuels shall once be saued by the Alcoran; and that the Diuels call themselves Saracens; fit compani- ons with them in their holy things.

Some<sup>f</sup> make it a Canon of Mabomet, That they should looke toward the South when they pray, that when they pray they should say, God is one God, without equal, and Mabomet his Prophet: which, Eod. Barbema saith, are the Characters of the pro- fession session of a Mahumetan, and that, by the pronouncing of those words, he was tried whether he was an Infidell, or no. These words, saith the aboue-said Arabian (as they affirme) before the beginning of the world were written in the throne of God.

lib. 3. cap. 9.

Belionius in his Observations telleth out of their Bookes, That there is a Tree in Paradise which shadoweth it all over, and spreadeth her boughes over the wals, whose leaves are of pure gold and siluer, each of them after the Name of God, having there in writtten the name of Mahomet. And that if a Christian, at vnawares, should pronounce the said Prayer, La ilah, &c. God is one God, and Mahomet his Prophet, he must either die or turne Turke. Such reputation haue they of this forme, which they calla Prayer, with as good reason as the Aue Marie among the Romists, wherein yet they pray not for any thing. Belionius also saith, That they hold the Heauen to be made of Smoake, and the Firmament stablished on the borne of a Buffall, by whose stirring Earthquakes are caused; That there are seuen Paradises, with Houses, Gardens, Fountaines, and whatsoever sense accounteth delectable; where they shall enioy all delights without any sorrow, having Carpets, Beds, Boyes, Horses, Saddles, Garments, for cost and workmanship most curious, and readie for attendance. Those Boyes richly adorned, when they haue satisfied their hunger and thirst, shall present euery Starcen a huge Pome-citron in a golden Charger, and as soone as they shall smell thereof, there shall thence proceed a comely Virgin in gallant attire, which shal embrace him, and he her; and so shal they continue fittie yeares. Afte which space ended, God shal shew them his face, wherat they shal fal down, not able to endure the brightnes, but he shal say, Arise my seruants, and enioy my glorie; for hereafter ye shal neuer die: nor be grieved. Then shal they see God, and each lead his Virgin into his Chamber, where al pleasures shal attend them. If one of those Virgins should come forth at midnight, she would lighten the world no lesse then the Sunne; and if she should spit into the Sea, al the water thereof would become sweet. Gabriel keepeth the keyes of Paradise, which are in number threescore and ten thousand, each seuen thousand miles long. But he was not able to open Paradise without inuocation of the Name of God, and Mahomet his friend. There is a Table of Adamant seuen hundred thousand daies journey long and broad, with seats of gold and siluer about it, where they shal be feasted.

There is extant a Constitution of Methodius, Patriarke of Constantinople, touching the diuersities of Penances (according to the diuersitie of the offence) to be performed by such as haue reuolted from the Faith to Mahumitisme. Likewise there is a fragment of Nicetas, wherein are expressed the abiuurations and renunciations of Mahomet and his Law by new Conuerter, both before Baptisme, when they were admitted into the number of the Catechumeni, and at Baptisme, as was then vsed in the Church, some of which I heere mention, as fitting to our purpose. After the Anathema pronounced against Mahomet, Ali his sonne in law, Apompiciertus, Baieret, Ammar, Talcen, Apupachren, Sadisen, and the rest of his conforers and successors; also against Gadise, Aise, and other his wiues, with Phatuma his daughter: he Anathematizeth the Core, that is, *Mahomet*s Scripture, and all his learning, lawes, Apocryphal narrations, traditions and blasphemies. The fift Article is against *Mahomet*s Paradise, there thus expressed, That in it are foure Riuer, one of cleare water, a second of sweet milke, a third of pleasant wine, a fourth of hony: and that the Saracens at the day of Iudgement (which shall be five hundred thousand yeares after his time) shall liue carnally with their wiues vnder the shadowes of certaine trees called Sidra and Tesleh, and shal eat what fruits and birds they wil, and shal drinke off the Fountaines Caphura and Zinciber, and wine out of the Spring Theon. Their age shal be the same with the Heauens: their members foure cubits: they shal haue their fill of lust in the presence of God, who is not ashamed. Sixtly, He Anathematizeth *Mahomet*s Angels, Arak, Maron, Tzapba and Marona, with his Prophets, Chud, Zalech, Soaip, Edres, Dnacipbel and Lechina. Seuenthy, His doctrine of the Sunne and Moone, and his challenge to be the Key-bearer of Paradise: also his house of Mecca, in the middest whereof, they say, is a stone representing Venus, on which Abraham lay with Hagar, and tied thereto his Camell, when hee should haue sacrificed Isaac: where the Pilgrimes holding holding their eare with one hand, point to the stone with the other, and so turne round till they fall downe with giddinitie. He renounceth likewise their casting seven stones against the Christians, and the tale of Mahomets Camell, and them which worship the Morning-STARRE, or Lucifer and Venus, which the Arabians call Chobar, that is, Great. And thus he proceedeth in two and twentie Articles, abandoning his former Sect: as in which he desireth Baptisme.

Of like subiect are the Catecheses Mystagogicae, or instructions of Peter Guerya de Loma, concerning conuerting and keeping from Mahometisme, in which are rehearsed and refuted a great part of their superstitions, dedicated to King Philip the second: But King Philip the third hath otherwise conuerted the Mores of Spaine, for whom he wrote his booke, by an vtter subuersion and turning them quite out of his Dominions. He therein telleth of the Diuels appearing to Mahomet in forme of a Vulture, with a beake and feathers of gold, professing himselfe to be Gabriel, sent of God to reach him his Law: that Mahomet would not permit Iewes to turne to his Law, without baptizing them first vnto Christianitie: that the Saracens worship the New-Moone: that the women spend all their time and care to adorne themselves for their husbands lust, and because they respect fannes in their wiues, these therefore with idlenes sleepe, and diet according; doe fat themselves like Swine: that a Mahumetan may attaine to that perfection, that he may satisfie for sinne past, and after liue without sinne, especially by Fastings and Pilgrimages: that the blessed Virgin shall (as they dreame) in the other life be married to that cursed monster Mahomet: that women shall rise againe in the male sex, and shall also haue women for their lust, which shall be produced out of certaine trees: with diuers other things scarcely objected to them by others. Thomas à Ies another Spaniard, hath writtten prolixly of this Argument, but I may not here now follow him.

See of this in the next chapter, and in the second chapter.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Pilgrimage to Mecca.

WE haue heard of the antiquity of this Pilgrimage in the former Chapter, derived from Adam, who was shauen & circumcised for that purpose: and the Alcoran nameth Abraham the founder of the Temple, &c. Pity it were, that the last of the Prophets should not honor that which was first instituted by the first of men. If we will rather beleue that Arabian before mentioned, we shall finde another originall, namely, that whereas two Nations of the Indians, called Zechian and Albarachuma, had vsed to go about their Idols naked and shauen, with great howlings, kissing the corners, and casting stones vpon an heap, which was heaped vp in honor of their gods, and that twice every yeare, in the Spring, and in Autumne; the Arabians had learned the same of the Indians, and practised the same at Mecca, in honor of Kennu (casting stones backe betwene their legs, the parts of Kennu) in the time of Mahomet. Neither did Mahomet abrogate this, as he did other Idolatrous Rites; only for modesties sake they were enioyned to gird a peece of linen about their Reines, Petrus Alphonsus, an ancient Author, who of a Jew had become a Christian, thus relateth this Historie. The Ammonites and Moabites erected two Idols, one of white stone called Merauris, in honor of Mars: the other of blacke, called Chamar, in honour of Saturne. Twice a yeare these men ascended to worship them; when the Sunne entred into Aries, in honor of Mars, and then at their departure they cast stones (as before is said) when the Sun entred into Libra, in honor of Saturne, at which time they sacrificed naked, with their heads shauen. The Arabians also worshipped them: Mahomet did not abolish them, but placed the Image of Saturne in a corner, with his back part forwards; and butted the Image of Mars in the goand; and laid a stone quer it. These stones be permitted them to kisse, and with shauen crowns and naked backs to cast stones backwards betwene their legs, which they do, is done to scatte away the Diuell. This is suffered to be done at Mecca in honor of Kennu. But we haue already heard that Kennu was the ancient Arabian and Sarcenical Deitie, to whom they performed such Rites of old.

Hak. lib. 1. cap. 2.*

b *Verriani,

Mecca, or (as they call it) Macca, signifying an Habitation, containeth in it aboute thousand houses, fairely built, like those of Italy: Other walls it hath not, then such a Nature hath environed it with, namely, with high and barren Mountains round about. Some<sup>a</sup> report, That betwene the Mountaines and the Citie are pleasant Gardens, a bundance of Figges, Grapes, Apples, Melons, and that there is store also of Fleth and Water. But it seemeth, that this is of later industrie, not of Natures indulgence, if it be true. For Lod. Barthelemi<sup>b</sup>, or Verriani, being there in the yeare 1503. saith, That the place was accursed of God; as not bringing forth Hearbs, Trees, Fruits, or any thing, and besides, having great scarcitie of water, and is served with these things from other places. It is governed by a King (tributarie, then to the Soldan, now to the Turkey) called the Seriffo, lineally descended from their great Seducer, by his daughter Fara (the onely issue of this libidinous poligamous Prophet) married to Hali. All of the kindred are called Emyri, that is, Lords, cloathed with (or at least weating Turbans of) greene, which colour the Mahumetans will not suffer other men to weare.

The Number of Pilgrimes which resort hither, is incredible. From Cairo cometh a Carouan of deuotion, some to Mammon, some to Mahomet, either for trade of Merchandize, or for Superstition, and another yearely from Damascus: besides that which come from the Indies, Ethiopia, Arabia, Persia, &c. Lod. Barthelemi saith, That (at his being at Mecca) of the Carouan of Damasco, wherein he went, were three and thirtie thousand Camels, and about fortie thousand persons: of that of Cairo were threescore and foure thousand Camels, and now in these times about fortie thousand Camels, Mules, and Dromedaries, and fiftie thousand persons, besides the Arabian Carouan, and of other Nations.

This Mart of Mecca is much impaired, since the Portugales haue intercepted the Indian commodities, which by a Carouan, from thence, were wont to be brought hither.

Let me desire the Reader to haue patience, and goe along, on this Pilgrimage, with one of these Carouans, thorow these Arabian Desarts to Mecca and Medina: and because that of Cairo is the chiefe, we will bestow our selues in it, and obserue what Rites they obserue before they set forth; what by the way, and at the intended place of their deuotion. Touching the necessitie whereof, they thinke, that they will goe not once in their liues, shall, after death, goe to the Diuell. Yea, some, for deuotion, plucke out their eyes after so holy a sight.

to Mecca. Hak.

The moneth Ramazan (as you haue heard) is their Lent; falling sometime high, sometime low, being that whole moneth, during which time the Pilgrimes and Merchants resort to Cairo from Asia, Greece, Barbarie, &c. After their<sup>a</sup> Lended; they obserue their Easter, or Feast, called Barran, three dayes. Twentie dayes after this Feast, the Carouan is readie to depart. Against this time, they assemblable themselves in a place, two leagues from Cairo (called Birca) attending the coming of the Capitaine. This Capitaine of the Carouan, whom they call Amarillo Haggi, is renewed euery year; and to him the Grand Signior, euery voyage, giueth eighteene Purser (each containing six hundred twentie hue duckats of gold) for the behoofe of the Carouan, and also to doe almes vnto needfull Pilgrimes. He hath foure Chauff to serue him, and foure hundred Souldiers, two hundred Spachi, mounted on Dromedaries, and as many Janizaries, riding on Camels. The Chauff and Spachi, the Capitaine maintaineth at his owne charges: The Janizaries haue their prouision from Cairo. He hath eight Pilots for guides; which Office is hereditarie.

They carrie six pieces of Ordinance, to terrifie the Arabians, and to triumph in Mecca. The merchandize that goeth by Land, payeth no custome; that which goeth by sea, payeth ten in the hundred. At the Feast, before the Carouan setteth forth, the Capitaine, with his Retinue and Officers, resort vnto the Castle of Cairo, before the Basha, which giueth vnto euery man a Garment, and that of the Capitaine wrought with gold, the others according to their degree. Moreover, he deliuereth vnto him the Chusan Tassab, or Garment of the Prophet; a Vesture of Silke, wrought with these letters of gold, La Allah illa Mahomet Resulata; that is, There are no gods but God, and Mahomet is the Messenger of God. After this, he deliuereth to him

Gat,

Gate, wrought curiously with gold; and a covering of greene velvet, made in manner of a Pyramis, about nine palmes high, wrought with fine golde, to cover the Tombe of the Prophet Mahomet, and many other coverings besides of gold and silke, to adorne it. The two former are for the house of Abraham in Mecca.

Then the Captaine hauing taken his leaue, departeth accompanied with all the people of Cairo, in manner of a Procession, with singing, shouting, and a thousand Ceremonies besides; and passing the Gate Bab Nasser, layeth vp, in a Mosquita, the said Vestures very safely. This Ceremonie is performed with such publike resort, that it is not lawfull for any man to forbid his wife the going to this Feast: for shee may, vpon such a cause, separate her selfe from her husband, and lye with another man. The Camels which carrie the Vestures, being adorned with Cloath of gold, and many little Bells, the multitude stroweth flowers and sweet water on them; others with fine cloth and towels touch the same, reseruing these for Reliques. Twentie daies after this Feast, the Captaine, taking the Vestures out of that Mosquita, repaireth to Birca, where his Tent abideth some ten dayes. In this time, they which meane to follow the Carouan, resort thither, and amongst them, many women, attired with Trifles, Tassels and Knots, accompanied with their friends, mounted on Camels. The night before their departure, they make great feasting and triumph, with discharging their Ordinance, Fire-works, &c. shouting, till, at the breake of day, vpon the sound of a Trumpet, they march forward on their way.

From Cairo to Mecca is fortie dayes journey, traueilling from two a clocke in the morning till the Sunne-rising: and then hauing rested till noone, they set forward, so continuing till night, obseruing this order, till the end of their Voyage, without change; except at some places, where, in respect of water, they rest sometimes a day and a halfe, to refresh themselves. The Carouan is diuided into three parts; the fore-ward, the maine battaile, and the re-re-ward. The fore-ward containeth about the third part of the people; and amongst these, the eight Pilots, a Chauffi, and foure knaues, with Bulls sinewes, which punish offendours on the soles of their feet. In the night time they haue foure or foue men goe before with Peeeces of drie wood, which giue light: they follow the Starre, as the Mariners. Within a quarter of a mile followeth the maine Battaille, with their Ordinance, Gunners, and fifteene Archers, Spahis. The chiefe Physitian, with his Oyntments and Medicines for the sicke; and Camels for them to ride on. Next goeth the fairest Camell that may be found in the Turkes Dominion, decked with cloath of golde and silke, and carrieth a little chest, made of pure Legname, in forme of the Israelitish Arke, containing in it the Alcoran, all written with great letters of Gold, bound betweene two Tables of masse Gold. This Chest is covered with Silke, during the Voyage; but at their entring into Mecca and Medina, it is covered with cloath of Gold, adorned with Jewels. This Camell is compassed about with Arabian Singers and Musicians, singing alway, and playing vpon Instruments. After this follow fifteene other most faire Camels, every one carrying one of the abouesaid Vestures, being covered from top to toe with Silke. Behind these, goe the twentie Camels, which carrie the Captaines money and prouision. After followeth the Standard of the great Signior, accompanied with Musicians and soldiers, and behind these, lesse then a mile, followeth the re-reward, the greatest part Pilgrimes; the Merchants for securitie, going before: for in this Voyage it is needfull and vsuall, that the Captains bestow Presents, Garments, and Turbants vpon the chiefe Arabians, to giue him free passage, receiuing sometimes, by pilferings, some damage notwithstanding. They passe by certaine weake Castles in the way, Agerut, Nachel, Acba, Birchem, between which two last is the Riuer of Iethro, and the Ponds of Midian, where Moses sate downe. At Iebhir, the first Towne subiect to the Seignior of Mecca, they are receiued with much ioy, and well refreshed with the plentie which that place yeeldeth. They finde other filthie Commodities also more then plentie, which fact (they hold) purgeth them from a multitude of finnes, and encreaseth their deuotion to prosecute the Voyage. The next day they goe towards Bedri-hoorn, in which place groweth shrubbes, whereout issueth Baulme. Hereby they lodge one night, in memorie of a victorie heere obtained against the Chirissuans, at the earnest prayers of their Prophet, dreaming of Drummes, heere still sounded by Angels, as they passe. The next morning, by Sunne-rising, they arrive at Bedrihoon, where every one washed himselfe from top to toe, covering their privities with a cloth, and their shoulders with another white one; and they which can goe in this habite to Mecca, merit more; they which cannot, make a vow to offer a Ramme at the Monsaine of Pardons. After this washing, it is not lawfull for any man or woman to kill a Flea or Lowse with their hands or nayles, till they have accomplished their Vowes at that Mountaine.

c. L. Bar. with the Carouan of Damasco, trauelled two and twentie hours of foure and twentie.

This night they come within two miles of Mecca. The next morning they march on, and the Seriffo meeting them, resigneth his Gouvernement to the Capitaine, during his abode there: and the Capitaine giueth him a garment of cloath of gold, with other Jewels. After this, having eaten together vpon Carpets and Hides, they take with them the Gate and Garment abouesaid, and goe, attended but with few, to the Mosquita, and there cause the old to be pulled downe, and put the new couerture on the house of Abraham: and the old Vesture is the Eunuches which serue in the said Mosquita, which sell it deere to the Pilgrimes, every little piece being accounted a most holy Relique. And well may it be so, for (can you doubt of it?) putting the same vnder the head of a man at his death, all his sinnes must, by vertue hereof, be pardoned. They take away the old dore, which is the Seriffoes fee, and set in place the new. Then after some Orisons, the Capitaine returneth to his pavilion, the Seriffo remaineth in the Citie.

f. Description of the Mosqui-
ta at Mecca,

That you may be the better acquainted with this Mosquita, and house of Abraham, you are to know, f that in the middest of the Citie is the great Mosquita, built (they say) in the time when their Prophet liued. It is foure-square, every square halfe a mile, being in all the circuit two miles, in manner of a Cloyster: The Galleries round about are in manner of foure streets; these streets being separated from each other with Pillars, of Marble some, and some of Lime and Stone. In the middest of all, separate from the rest, is the house of Abraham. This Mosquita hath fourescore and nineteene Gates and five Steeples, from whence the Talismani call the people to their deuotion. And the Pilgrimes, which are not prouided of Tents, resort hither, men and women lying together; their House of Prayer becoming a den of Theemes, Baribemas &c. That this Temple is round, like the Coliseo at Rome. That at every entrance is a descent of ten or twelue steps, on both sides whereof stand Jewellers, which sell Gem onely. Within it is vaulted, gilded, and odoriferous, beyond what can be spoken: for there are foure or five hundred men which sell powders to preserve dead corpes, and other Sweetes. It seemeth, that since his time the Temple and House of Abraham are altered. This s House is foure-square, made of speckled stone, twentie paces high, and fortie in circuit. And vpon one side of this House, within the wall, there is a stone of a spanne long, and halfe a spanne broad, which stone (they say) fell downe from Heauen; a voice from Heauen, at the same fall, being heard, That wheresoeuer the stone fell, there should be built the House of God, wherein he will heare the prayer of sinners. Then was the Stone as white as snow, but now, through the kisses of sinners, it is become so blacke as it is. The entrance into this House is small and high. There are without this House one and thirtie pillars of brasie vpon square stones, sustaining a threed of Copper, reaching from one to another on which are fastened many burning Lampes. The founder of these was Solyman. Being entred into this house through that difficult passage, there stand two pillars of Marble at the entrance: in the middest are three of Aloes-wood, couered with tyles of India, of a thousand colours, which serue to vnderprop the Terrazza, or rooffe. It is so darke that they can hardly see within for want of light; nor is it without an euill smell. Without the gate five paces, is the Pond Zunzun; that blessed Pond which the Angell shewed to Agar for her sonne Ismael.

g The house
described,

Of their Feast Baraim is said already: About fixe dayes after they be come hither to Mecca, they celebrate another Feast called Bina Baraim, that is, the great Feast, which is also called, The Feast of the Ramme. In those dayes space they prepare themselves hereunto with due ceremonies. First, departing from the Carouan, guided ded with such as are skilfull in the way, they goe twentie or thirtie in a Companie, walking thorow a street, which ascendeth by little and little, till they come vnto a certaine gate, whereon is written in Marble, Babel Salama; that is, the gate of Health. And from this place is described the great Mosquita, and twice saluted, saying, Peace to thee, Messenger of God. Then proceeding on their way, they finde an Arch on their right hand, whereon they ascend fise steppes, vpon which is a great void place made of stone: after descending fise other steps, and proceeding the space of a flight-shoot, they finde another Arch, like vnto the first; and this way, from the one Arch to the other, they goe and come seuen times, saying alwayes some of their prayers, which they say, the afflicted Hagar said, whiles she sought and found not water for her sonne. After this Ceremonie, they enter into the Mosquita; and drawing neere vnto the house of Abraham, they goe round about it other seuen times, alwayes saying, This is the house of God, and of his seruant Abraham. This done, they goe and kisse that blacke stone abouesaid; and then goe they to the Pond Zunzun, and in their apparell, as they be, wash themselves from head to foot, saying, Tobah Allah, Tobah Allah, Pardon Lord, Pardon Lord; drinking also of that muddie vsauourie water: and thus returne they, cleansing from all their finnes. Every Pilgrime performeth these Ceremonies once at the least; the deuouter fort often.

An hundred yeares since these Ceremonies were somewhat different, after Barthelmeus <sup>b</sup> Relation. On the three and twentieth of May, the people (before day) compassed that house of Abraham seuen times, alway touching and kissing euery corner. Ten or twelue paces from this house was another, in manuer of a Chappell, with three or foure gates, and in the midst thereof a pit of brackish water, threescore and ten yards deepe. Thereat stand fixe or eight men, appointed to draw water for the people; who after their seuen-fold Ceremonie come to the brinke, and say, All this be for the honor of God, and the pitious God pardon me my finnes. Then doe those other powre vpon them three buckets full of water, from the top of their heads to their feet, be their garments neuer so costly.

The Carouan <sup>i</sup> hauing abode at Mecca fise dayes, the night before the euening of their Feast, the Captaine with all his Companie, setteth forwards, towards the Mountaine of Pardons, called Label Arafata, distant from Mecca fiseene miles. This Mountaine, or small Hill rather, is in compasse two miles, enuironed round about with the goodliest Plaine that a mans eye hath seene, and that Plaine compassed with high Mountaines. Vpon the side towards Mecca there are many pipes of cleare fresh water, wherewith the people refresh themselves and their Cattell. Adam and Eue, when they were banished Paradise, after they had bene separated fortie yeares, one in Nubia, and the other in India (as you heard before) met at this pleasant place, and here inhabited and built a little house, which they call at this day Beit-Adam, the house of Adam.

Hither come also the same day the other Carouans of Arabia and Damasco, and all the inhabitants for ten dayes journey round about, so that at one time heere is to bee seene about two hundred thousand persons, and three hundred thousand cattell. Now all this company meeting together, the night before the Feast, the three Hostes cast themselves into a triangle, setting the Mountaine in the midst, and fill Heauen and Earth with shouting, singing, hallowing, gun-shot and fire-workes all that night. The next day being their Feast, in silence they attend their sacrifices and prayers only. And in the euening, they which haue horses, mount thereon, and approach as nigh vnto the Mountaine as they can: others make the best shift they can on foote; giuing euery vnto the Captaine of Cairo the chiefe place, the second to the Captaine of Damasco, and the third to the Captaine of Arabia. And being all approached, there cometh one of the Santones mounted on a Camell well furnished, who at the other side of the Mountaine ascendeth fise steppes into a pulpit, made for that purpose, and there maketh a Sermon to the people. The Contents whereof, are the benefits which God hath bestowed on them, deliurance from Idolatrie, giuing them the house of Abraham, and the Mountaine of Pardons: adding that the mercifull God commanded the Secretarie Abraham, to build him an house in Mecca, wherein his suc-

cessours might be heard, at which time all the mountaines in the world came together thither with sufficiency of stones for the building thereof, except that little low hill, which for pouertie could not goe to discharge this debt: for the which it became sorrowfull; and wept thirtie yeares, at the end whereof God in compassion said vnto it, weepe no more my daughter, comfort thy selfe: I will cause all those that go to the house, of my seruant Abraham, that they shall not be absolved from their sinnes, vntill they first come to doe thee reuerence, to keepe in this place their holiest feast, and this I haue commanded to my people by the mouth of my friend and Prophet Mahomet. This said, he exhorte them to the loue of God, to prayer, and almes. The Sermon ended, at the Sun-setting they make three prayers: first for the Seriffo, second for the grand Signior, the third for the People: to which prayers all with one voice, cry Amin la Alla, Amin la Alla; Be it so Lord, Barthema addeth to the Sermon the Saluor Santones, exhortation to weepe for their sinnes, and knocke their breasts with inuocation of Abraham and Isaac, to pray for the people of the Prophet; and reported further, that there were killed on the first day more then thirtie thousand Rammes or Sheepe toward the West, and giuen to the poore: of which there were thirtie or some thousand. Thus hauing had the Santones blessing and saluted the Mountaine of pardons, they returne the way they came, in the midst of which way, is a place called Mina: and a little from thence foure great pillars, two on each side of the way. If any passe not thorow the midst of these, hee loseth all the merit of his Pilgrimage. And from the Mount of pardons, till they bee passed these pillars, none dare looke backward, for feare lest his sinnes, which hee hath left in the mountaine, returne to him againe.

Being past these Pillars, euery one lighteth downe, seeking in this sandie fie'd fiftie or threescore little stones, which they binde in an handkerchiefe and carrie to the place of Mina, where they stay fide dayes, because at that time there is a Faire free and franke of all custome. And in this place are other three Pillars not together, but in diuers places, Monuments of those three Apparitions, which the Diuell made to Abraham, and to Ismael his sonne: for they now a dayes make no mention of Isaac, as if he had neuer bene borne. They say that when as Abraham at Gods command went to offer his sonne Ismael, the diuell dehorted him from the same: but seeing his labour lost, he went to Ismael and bid him pitie himselfe. But Ismael tooke vp stones and threw at him, saying, I defend me with God from the Diuell the offender. These words the Pilgrimes repeate in their visitation of these pillars, hurling away the stones they had gathered. From hence halfe a mile is a mountaine, whither Abraham went to sacrifice his sonne. In the same is a great den, whither the pilgrimes resort to make their prayers, and there is a great stone separated in the midst by the knife of Ismael (they say) at the time of this sacrifice. Barthema reporteth that heere at Mecca he saw two Vnicornes: which I mention, because since that time I haue not found any Author, which hath testified the like sight. They were sent to the Seriffo for a present to the Ethiopian King.

The Carouan departing for Medina, as soone as they come in sight thereof (they call the place the Mountaine of health) they alight, and going vp the hill, shout with loude voyces and say, Prayer and health be vnto thee, O Prophet of God, Prayer and health be vpon thee O beloued of God. They proceed on their iourney; and lodge that night within three miles of Medina, and the next morning are receiued with solemnitie of the Gouverneur. Medina, <sup>1</sup> is a Citie two miles in circuite, with faire houses of Lime and Stone, and a square Mosquita in the midst, lesse, but more sumptuous then that of Mecca. This Medina, calle'd Tal Nabi, that is, of the Prophet, in Barthemas time contained about three hundred houses, and was very barren, one garden of Dates excepted: but now they haue store of Fruits. This Temple is square, an hundred paces in length, fourescore in breadth. It hath in it an Ile made Arch-wise, supported with foure hundred Pillars, and supporting (as he saith) three thousand lampes. In one part of this Mosquita was a Librarie of fortie fide Mahumeticall bookes. Also within the same (in a corner thereof) is a <sup>m</sup> Tombe built vpon foure pillars, with a Vault, exceeding in height the Mosquita; being couered with Leade, and the top all inamell inameld with gold, and an halfe Moone vpon the top, wrought within very Artificially with gold. Below there are round about great iron staires ascending vp to the middest of the pillars, and in the middest lyeth buried the body of Mahomet (not in an yron Chest attracted by Adamant at Mecca, as some affirme.) Or to say the truth, neither here nor at Mecca can they shew this Seducers body. For the Captaine of that Carouan of Damasco, in which Baribema went on this Pilgrimage, offered to the chiefe Priest of that Mosquita, three thousand Saraffi of gold, to shew him the body of the Nabi or Prophet; that (saith hee) being the only cause of my coming. The Priest answered proudly: How can those eyes, wherewith thou hast committed so much euill in the world, see him by whom God hath created Heauen and Earth? The Captaine replied, True Sir, but doe me that fauour, to let mee see his body and I will presently pluck out mine eyes. The Priest answered, O Sir I will tell you the truth. It is true, that our Prophet would die here to giue vs good example: for hee might haue dyed at Mecca, but such was his humilitie for our instruction: and presently after hee was dead, hee was carryed by the Angels into heauen. And where (saith the Captaine) is Iesus Christ the Sonne of Marie? The Priest answered, At the feet of Mahomet.

In the night time by some fire-works in the steeple, they would haue gulled the credulous people with opinion of miracle, vsing out-cryes in the night, saying Mahomet would rise againe: and when the Mamalukes could see no such light shine forth of *Mahomet*s Tombe, as they rumoured, they said it was because they were slaues and weake in the faith, and could not see heavenly sights.

To returne to the discouerie of this supposed Sepulchre: Ouer the body they haue built a Tombe of speckled stone, a brace and halfe high, and ouer the same another of Legmane four-square in manner of a Pyramid. Round about the Sepulchre there hangeth a curtaine of silke: which hideth the Sepulture from their sight, that stand without. Beyond this in the same Mosquita are other two Sepulchers of Fatima and Hali. The attendants on these Sepulchers are fiftie Eunuches, white and raunie, of which, three only of the eldest and best esteemed white Eunuches, may enter within the tomb: which they doe twice a day to light the Lamps, and for other seruices. The other attend on the Mosquita and those two other Sepulchers. Where euery one may goe and touch at his pleasure, and take of the earth for deuotion, as many doe. The Captaine with great pompe presenteth that Pyramidlike Vestment (whereof you haue heard) for the Tombe, the Eunuches taking away the old, and laying on the new: and after this, other vestures for the ornament of the Mosquita. And the people without deliuer vnto the Eunuches, each man somewhat to touch the Tombe therewith: which they keepe as a relique with great deuotion.

Here is a stately Hospitall built by Cassachi, or Rosa, the Wife of great Soliman, richly rented, and nourishing many poore people. A mile from the Citie are certaine houses, in one of which they say Mahomet dwelt, hauing on euery side many Date-trees, amongst which there are two growing out of one stock exceeding high, which their Prophet forsooth grafted with his owne hands. The fruit thereof is alway sent to Constantinople for a present to the Grand-Signior, and is said to bee the blessed fruit of the Prophet. Also there is a little Mosquita wherein three places are counted holy. The first they affirme their Prophet made his first prayer in, after he knew God. The second is that, whither hee went when he would see the house of Abraham. Where when he fate downe to that intent, the mountaynes opened from the top to the bottome, to shew him the house, and after closed againe as before. The third is the middest of the Mosquita where is a Tombe made of Lime and stone foure square, and full of sand, wherein they say was buried that blessed Camell which Mahomet was alway wont to ride vpon. Euen still (as one Master Simons a marchant and beholder thereof reported to mee) they haue a superstitious custome at Cairo, of carrying the legge of *Mahomet*s Camell (as they affirme) in a Coch, the women in zeale of their blinde deuotion hurling their shabbes to receiue thence some holy and blessed touch, for their Mahumetical edification; as the Papists ascribe no small holinesse to the touch

stition, as my friend master Barkley, an eye-witnesse, hath told me. Maruell much we may that the Souldiers which crucified Christ and parted his garments by lot, and Judas which kissed him, and the Deuill also which carried his body out of the wilderness and set it on a pinnacle of the Temple, did not from such holy touches acquire much ho-linesse. But here a good intent was wanting, which though the Mahumetans haue, yet a Camels legge is not so holy as our Ladies Image; Grant it: but they pretend Transition and deuotion no lesse then these: and otherwise, there is as little warrant* for this house and Image of our Ladie that they are true, as of the other, Blessed Virgin, whom all generations call blessed, and iustly admire for that holinesse, which with thankfulness to God and Charitie to man, wee are to imitate; that these stones and blocks should thus vsurpe thy name, and (in a worse sacrilege) diuine worship, yea more then those holies of diuine institution, which were so farre from conueying a holinesse by touching, that being themselves touched by any vnclane thing, they receiued thence infection of vnclannesse. And if Christ himselfe should thus bee honoured, where in all the Christian world are such vowes, pilgrimages, and deuotions in his name, as here to the supposed Ladie of Loretto? as if they would rather be Mariani then Christiani in their Religion. But who brought vs now to Loretto? Nay, who can but in reading the one thinke of the other, both being frequented so generally in pilgrimages, offerings, and I know not what superstitions? Only in this is Loretto worke, that it abused more holy names of God and his Saints, to like vnholies. But of this subject the Reuerend and learned Deane D. Sutcliffe hath largely and learnedly written, both in confutation of that impious pamphlet of Giffords Caluino-Turcismus, and plainly pa-raleling the Mahumetans and Turkes in very many points of their Religions. To him I referre the industrious Reader. Yea the very Narration of the Saracenicall and Turkish Rites by vs in this Booke, shall be sufficient to them, which know the Popish, in many things to discerne and acknowledge the Kindred, and like hellish descent of both; like Sampsons Foxes, hauing their taitles knit together with fire-brands, which both fill and emptie the world with their flames, howsoever their heads looke contri-rie, one toward Christ, the other toward Mahomet. That which I speake of Popish
I vnderstand of that which our Aduersaries maintayne by authoritie (not from Scriptures or the ancient Councils and Fathers, but) from the Popes pretended Supremacie and visibie Monarchie as Head and Vice-God in the Church; the Alcoran whereof is his Decretals, Extravagants, Consistorie constitutions, and such Canons as <sup>b</sup> their holy Ghost sent from Rome in a boxe, lately thundered at Trent besides and against the Canonicall Scripture, which holy men of God writ as they were moued by the holy Ghost.
But let vs back to Medina. On the other side of the Citie are Tombs of the holy Mahumetans, Abubachar, Ottoman, Omar, which Bartemay faith were buried in the same Temple with Mahomet, and all vnder the earth. A dayes iourney from Medina is a steepe mountaine, hauing no passage but one narrow path, which was made by Hali: who fleeing from the pursuing Christians, and hauing no way of escape, drew out his sword, and diuided this mountaine, and so saued his life. The Capitaine at his returne to Cairo, is with a sumptuous feast receiued of the Bascha, and presented with a garment of cloth of gold: he againe presenteth the Alcoran, out of the chest to the Bascha to kisse, and then it is laid vp againe. By this time your pilgrimage hath more then wearied you.

CHAP. VII.

Of the Successors of MAHOMET, of their different Sects, and of the dispersing of that Religion through the World.

MAHOMET having with Word and Sword published his Alcoran (as you have heard) his followers after his death succeeding in his place, exceeded him in tyrannie. Eubocar, surnamed Abdalla, vnder-tooke the defence of that faithlesse Faith and Kingdome, and that (as his Predecessor had done) partly by subtletie, partly by force. For when as Mahomet's Disciples had buried their new Religion with their old Master, except a few of his kindred, hee applied his wits to recall them; and whereas Hali, Mahomet's nearest kinsman and sonne in law disagreed from him, and was perswaded by the Iewes to professe himselfe a Prophet, with promise of their best aide and assistance: Eubocar (or Ehuber) reconciled him, and (as their Arabian Chronicle witnesseth) converted many Infidels, and sueth the gaine-sayers. He reigned one year, and three moneths, and thirteene dayes. The next successor Aomar (saith the same Author; Leo termeth him Homar) ordained their prayers in the moneth Ramazan, and that the Alcoran should be read through, which he caused to be written out, and vnited in one Booke: he conquered Egypt by Hanir his Captayne; after that Damasco, Ierusalem, Gaza, and a great part of Syria were subdued. Hee reigned ten yeares, and five moneths. Odmen or Ozimen succeeded, and reigned twelue yeares: and after him Hali; and next to him his sonne Albatem; and then Moani the great Conqueror, &c. These foure Eubocar, Aomar, Ozimen, and Hali, are the foure great Doctors of the Mahometan Law: and Mahomet before his death prophesied that they should succede him, and of their worthinesse.

But as Mahomet had pretended the name of Gabriel to the dreames of Sergius, and other Apostata's of the Christians and Iewes, disagreeing both with the truth and themselves: so it was not long, that this untempered mortar would hold together these buildings. For the Alcoran being (according to diuers Copies thereof,) read diuersly, was cause of different Sects among them. Ozimen, to prevent the danger hereof, commanded that all the copies of their law should be brought and deliuered into the hands of Zaidi and Abdalla; who conferring their Copies, should make one Booke, and, where they dissented, should reade according to the Copie of Cerai. Thus these two, according to the Kings Edict, to stablish an vniformitie in the reading of the Alcoran, hauing out of all those Copies framed one to bee authentically, burned all others. Yet were they deceived of their hopes, partly because Hali, Abitalib, and Ibenmuzad, would not bring in their Bookes, of which that of Hali was the same which Mahomet had left, and was after by the Iewes altered, putting out and in at their pleasure: and partly, because that Booke, which they had thus culled out of the rest to remaine Canonicall, was lost, and of the foure Copies which they had written thereof, by fire and negligence all perished. Eletragig would haue vsed the like policie after; but this many-headed Serpent, which could not in the shell bee killed, much lesse in his riper growth could be reformed.

Those foure Doctors aforesaid, emulous of each other, intending their owne private ends, sowed the seeds then, which fructifie in their venomous multiplication till this day. Hali or Ali was Author of the sect Imamia, which was embraced of the Persians, Indians, and of many Arabians, and the Gelbines of Africa. Ozimen or Odmen began the sect Banefia or Xefia, and hath in diuers Countries his followers. Homar founded the Anefia, followed of the Turkes, Syrians, and in Zahara in Africke. Eubocar (otherwise called Ehuber, or Abubequer) taught the sect Melchia, generally possessing Arabia and Africa. These are holden as Saints in the Saracene Kalendar, as Scaliger testifieth, who had one in Semiarabike and Persian, wherein ouer against the 27. of December was written, the death of Phetema (shee was the daughter of Mubamend) God haue mercie on her. Against the 10. of Ianuarie, the death of Abu Boker; God haue mercie

mercie on him: and so of the rest. Against the 16. of Nouember, the beginning of the fast Caphat: so they call the Christians: and on the 25. of December, the birth of Iesus. On the 17. of Ianuarie, the birth of Moses: Which I mention to shew what honor they ascribe to them, or rather that dishonour which in this confusion of light with darknesse, the Prince of darkenesse in the forme of an Angell of light, doth vnto them.

From these foure in processe of time arose other * threescore and eight sects of name, besides other peddling factions of smaller reckoning. Amongst the rest the Morabites haue bee famous; liuing for the most part as Heremites, and professing a morall Philosophie; with principles different from the Alcoran. One of these not many years since, shewing the name of Mahomet in his brest (there imprinted with Aqua fortis, or some such like matter) raised vp a great number of Arabians in Africke, and laid siege to Tripolis: where being betrayed by one of his Captaines, his skinn was sent for a present to the Grand Signior. These Morabites affirme, that when Habs fought, he killed a hundred thousand Christians with one stroke of his sword, which was a hundred cubits in length.

The Cobitini are a sect ridiculous. One of them shewed himselfe riding in the Countie of Algier, on a Reede, rained and bridled as a horse; much honored, for that on this Horse this Assie (had as he said) rid a hundred leagues in one night. R. Moses Aegyptius writeth of two sects of Moorres, the one called Seperatists, the other Intelligents, or Vnderstanders, both followed in their opinions by many Iewes. These last were of opinion that nothing in the world cometh to passe by chance or accident, neither in generall nor particular, but all are disposed by the will and intent of God, as well the fall of a leafe, as the death of a man, the least motion and stirring of any man or other creature; which (seeme they neuer so casuall) can neither come to passe sooner, later, or otherwise; for God doth thus moue and effect them, to whose absolute will they referre all things in a fatall necessitie. The Seperatists in a contrarie extreme, allow to man and beast a freedome, and that God rewardeth all creatures according to their merits or demerits: his prouidence extending it selfe to the fall of the leaues, to the way of the Ants: and if one be borne defectiue, it is better for him, then if hee had beene perfect, and so if any aduersitie befall him; for his reward shall bee the greater in the world to come: yea the beast which is slaughtered, and the Ants, Flea, or Loue shall not loose his reward from the Creator: the Mouse also which hath not sinned, and is killed of the Cat shall there be recompensed, (Now beasts pray for their soules, and Fleas and Lice pray vpon their bodies which hatched this beastly lousie Diuinitie.) The Intelligent beleueeth that it is conuenient that men be punished in this life, and for euer in hell, because the Creator would: the Seperatist thinketh that vniust; and that whatsoever is punished in this life, shall bee rewarded in the next, because such is the Creators wisedom. Thus is the infinite and vnmeasurable will and wisdom of the Creator, measured and defined according to the will and wisdom of wilfull wicked men. Neither may we beleue the Rabbine, who reciting fve differing opinions concerning the Prouidence of God: First, of the Epicures, which exclude it wholly: Secondly, of Aristotle, that it descendeth not beneath the Moone: Thirdly, of the Intelligents: Fourthly, of the Seperatists: Fifthly, his owne, which he attributeth to the law of Moses, that euery man hath free-will, and all good befalls him in reward, all euill for punishment, and what measure any man meriteth shall bee measured to him againe: but for other creatures, beasts, plants, and their operations, as of a Spider catching a Flye and the like<sup>b</sup>, he attributeth with Aristotle vnto chance, and not to diuine Prouidence, which he appropriateth in things below vnto man: these opinions hee ascribeth; that of Aristotle to Iob, that of the Seperatists to Bildad, that of Sophar to the Intelligent, that of Elphaz is the same with his owne: and then let him with Elphaz sacrifice to expiate it. But what doe the Iewes in our way? These waies and sects of the Moorres haue brought them hither: but let vs looke further. I. Leo lib. 3. writeth, that one Elefacin had written at large of the Mahumetan sects: of which hee reckoneth threescore and twelue principall (which agreeth with our former number) euery one accounting his owne to bee good and true, in which a man may attaine saluation. And yet Leo there addeth, that in this age there are not found about two. <sup>c</sup> One is that of Lehari;

Lesbani; which in all Turke, Arabia, and Africa is embraced: the other Imamia; current in Persia and Corosan (of which in his proper place more.) So that by Leo's judgement all which follow the rule Lesbani or Hushani, are Catholike Mahumetans; although of these the same Author affirmes, that in Cairo and all Egypt are foure religions different from each other, in Spirituall or Ecclesiasticall ceremonies, and also concerning their Ciuill and Canon Law; all founded on the Mahumetan Scripture in times past, by foure learned men, diuersly construing the generall rules to such particulars as seemed to them fitter for their followers; who disagreeing in opinion, agree in affection, and conuerse together without hatred or vpbraiding each other. As for those other sects, it seemeth that they are for the most part long since vanished: and those differences which remaine, consist rather in diuersitie of rule, and order of profession, then in differing Sects and Heresies of Religion: except in some few which yet remaine, of which Leo thus reporteth: Fourescore yeares after Mahumet, one El-Isfahani Abilbasen gaue certaine rules to his Disciples, contrarie to the Alcoran principles: but writ nothing. About a hundred yeares after Elbari Ibn Esed of Bagaded writ a Booke vnto his Disciples, condemned by the Calipha and Canonists. But about fourescore yeares after that, another great Clarke reuolued the same doctrine, and had many followers; yet he and they were therefore condemned to death. But obtaining to haue triall of his opinions by disputation, hee overthrew his Aduersaries, the Mahometane Lawyers: and the Califa fauoured the said Sect, and erected Monasteries for them. Their Sect continued till Mahesab, of the Nation of the Turkes, persecuted the same. But twentie yeares after it was againe reuiued, and one Elgazzali (a learned man) writ seven bookes, reconciling these Sectaries and the Lawyers together: which reconciliation continued till the coming of the Tartars: and Asia and Africa was full of these reformers of their law. In old time none but learned men might be admitted Professors hereof: but within these last hundred yeares euery ignorant Idiot professeth it, saying that learning is not necessarie, but the body Spinn doth reueale to them, which haue cleane hearts, the knowledge of the truth. These contrarie to the Alcoran sing loue-songs and dances, with some phantasticall extasies; affirming themselves to be raptified of diuine loue. These are great gluttons: they may not marry, but are reputed Sodomites.

The same our Author writeth of some which teach, that by good workes, fasting, and abstinence, a man may attaine a Nature Angelicall, hauing his minde so purified that he cannot sinne, although he would. But he must first passe through fiftie degrees of Discipline: And although he sinne before hee bee past these fiftie degrees, yet God doth not impute it to him. These obserue strange and ineffimable Fasts at the first: after, they lye in all pleasures of the world. Their rule was written in foure Volumes by a learned and eloquent man, Efsebrani: and by Ibnul-farid another Author, in exact and most learned Verse. That the Spheres, Elements, Planets, and Starres, are one God, and that no Faith nor Law can be erroneous, because that all men (in their minds) bound to worship that which is to bee worshipped. And they beleue that the knowledge of God is contayned in one man, who is called Elcorb, elected and paraker of God, and in knowledge as God. There are other fortie men amongst them, called Elasra, that is Dunces, because of their lesse knowledge. When the Elcorb or Elasra dyeth, his Successor is chosen out of these: and into that vacant place of the fortie, they choose one out of another number of seuentie. They haue a third inferiour number of a hundred threescore and foue (their Title I remember not) out of which they choose, when any of the threescore and ten die. Their Law or Rule enioyneth them to wander through the World in manner of Fooles, or of great Sinners, or of the worst amongst men. And vnder this cloke many are most wicked men, going naked without hiding their shame, and haue to deale with women in the open and common manner like beasts. Of this base sort are many in Tunis, and farre more in Egypt, and most of all in Cairo. I my selfe (saith our Author) in Cairo in the street called Ban El-charam, saw one of them with mine eyes take a beautifull Dame coming out of the Bath, and laied her downe in the middelt of the street, and carnally know her; and presently when hee had left the woman, all the people ranne to touch her clothes, because because a holy man had touched them. And they said, that this Saint seemed to doe a sinne, but that he did it not. Her husband knowing of it, reckoned it a rare fauour and blessing of God, and made solemne feasting, and gaue almes for that cause. But the Iudges which would haue punished him for the same, were like to be slaine of the rude multitude: who haue them in great reputation of sanctitie, and euery day giue them gifts and presents.

There are another sort, that may be termed Caballists: which fast strangely, nor doe they eate the flesh of any Creature, but haue certaine meates ordayned and appointed for euery houre of the day and night, and certaine particular prayers, according to the dayes and moneths numbring their said prayers: and vnto carrie vpon them some square things, painted with Characters and numbers. They affirme that the good Spirits appeare, and acquaint them with the affaires of the world. An excellent Doctor, named Boni, framed their rule and prayers, and how to make their squares: and it seemeth to me (who haue seene the worke) to be more Magically then Cabalisticall. One booke sheweth their prayers and fastings: the second, their square: the third, the vertue of the fourescore and nineteene names of God, which I saw in the hand of a Venetian Jew at Rome. There is another rule in these sects, called Sunach, of certaine Heremites which liue in woods, and solitarie places, feeding on nothing but herbs and wilde fruits, and none can particularly know their life, because of this solitarie life. Thus farre Leo.

d In Itinerario.

Beniamin Tudensis telleth of a Nation neare to Mount Libanus, which he callith Hbasissim, which varied from the ordinarie sort of Ismaelites, and followed a peculiar Prophet of their owne, whose word they obeyed, whether for life or for death. They called him Hbasich al Hbasissim: his abode was at Karmos. They were a terror to all about them: sawing asunder euen the Kings if they tooke any. They warred with the Franks (the Christians which then held Ierusalem) and the King of Tripolis. Their Dominion extended eight dayes iourney. Zachuth mentioneth one Baba which about the 630. yeare of the Hegira, fained himselfe a Prophet sent of God, vnder which colour hee gathered together a great Armie, wherewith he filled all Asia with slaughter and spoile, slaying Christians and Ismaelites without difference: till Giasbeddin King of Gunia, ouerthrew and destroied him and his Host.

Besides the former, they haue other Heremites of another sort: one is mentioned by Leo, f who had fife hundred horse, a hundred thousand sheepe, two hundred beeues, and of offerings and almes betwixt foure and fife thousand Ducates, his fame great in Asia and Asrike, his Disciples many, and fife hundred people dwelling with him at his charges; to whom he enioyneth not penance, nor any thing: but giueth them certaine names of God, and biddeth them with the same to pray vnto him many times a day. When they haue learned this, they returne home: hee hath a hundred Tents for strangers, his Carrell, and Familie: he hath foure Wives, besides Sons, and (by them) many Children sumptuously apparelled. His fame is such that the King of Teleusin is afraide of him: and hee payeth nothing to any: such veneration haue they towards him, reputing him a Saint. Leo saith hee spake with him, and that this Heremite shewed him Magick bookes: and hee thought that this his estimation did come by false working of the true sciences, so the Heremite termed Magick.

But these Heremites we cannot so well reckon a Sect, as a religious Order, of which sort there are diuers in these Mahumetane Nations, as in our ensuing discourse shall appeare. To returne therefore to the consideration of the meanes vied to prevent the variety of Sects among them: The Caliphs sought to remedie these inconueniences by their best policie. f Maani about the yeare of our Lord 770. assembled a generall Councell of their learned men to consult about an Vniformitie: but they disagreeing among themselves, hee chose six men of the most learned, and sheweth them in a house together with their Scriptures, commanding them that out of those Copies disagreeing (as you haue heard) they should choose that should seeme best. Thus reduced the Doctrine of Mahomet into fixe bookes; forbidding any on paine of death to speake or write otherwise of their Law. But because the Arabians of subtilty and piercing piercing wit, which studied Philosophie in the Vniuersities of Bagder, Marocco, Cordoua, and other places, could not but spie and discern the mad folly of the law, so palpable to any reasonable iudgement: it <sup>m</sup> was therefore ordayned, that the Philosophie Lecture should bee taken away, and in place thereof they should read the Alcoran; prouiding, for all these Students of their Law, their expenses out of the publike charge, and inhibiting all further studie in Philosophie: insomuch that they now (saith our Authour, who himselfe was a student in that Vniuersitie) repute him not a good Saracen, who is addicted to that studie. This Frier Richard mentioneth another Prophet, named Solem, had in estimation with these Babylonians, which was after slaine by the Tartars. Hee and Cardinall Cusanus affirme, that the Saracens of the East differ in their Alcoran from those of the West, making the first five chapters but one; and that they differ in the exposition thereof, and in the same Schooles or Vniuersities, one Sect condemneth another.

m Fr. Richard,
cap. 13.

But in these times the Mahumetane Professors are chiefly distinguished by the several Nations; of which are soute principall: the Arabians, Persians, Turkes, and Tartars: to which wee may adde the Mogore, as a fift: whom the Iesuites (in their Epistles) report to haue from his former Mahumetisme, and to incline to Gentilisme. Of all these, the Arabians are most zealous in their superstition; the Persians most agree to Reason and Nature; the Tartars are more Heathenish and simple; the Turkes are the freest and most Martiall. The Arabians account it their peculiar glorie, that Mahumet was of that Nation; and that Mecca and Medina are there seated: and therefore haue laboured in the dayes of their former puissance, by the sword, force, by their traffique and preaching, to spread their Mahumetisme through the World. Their first Seducers had possessed Syria and Palestina: Homar had added Egypt, and in a short time their Successors had preuailed in Asia, Afrike, and Europe, as we haue before shewed.

They haue beene such in Armes; and in diligence of Preaching they haue beene forward, and so continue. Seuen hundred yeares since, Perimal reigning in Malabar, they there sowed their Tares: and the more easily to take those Ethnikes in their net, they tooke their Daughters in marriage; a matter of much consequence, in regard of their wealth, and practised of them to this day. They were Authors of great grieuance to them by their trades; and traffique for spicerie: and were suffered to inhabit, and plant Colonies amongst them. By their meanes, Calicut, of a small thing, became a great and rich Citie. And Perimal himselfe was peruered by them to their faith: who zealously inclined to their perswasions, resolved to end his dayes at Mecca, and put himselfe on the voyage with some ships of Pepper, and other things of price, but perished by tempest in the way. From Malabar they passed to the Maldiuaz, and Zelan, Soinatra, Iaua, Molucca, the Philippinaes, and in the Continent to Cambaia, Bengala, Siam, Malucca, Ior, Pam, and the huge Kingdome of China, preaching and planting their superstitions; as in the particular Histories of these Nations shall further appeare. They are in this respect so zealous, that euen the Arabian Marriners will stay behinde in the Countries of the Ethnikes there to diuulge this their Sect: and in the yeere 1555. one of them pierced as farre as Iapon, there to haue laied this Leauen: but the Portugalls in these Easterne parts, treading in the same steps, by their traffique and preachings haue much hindered their proceedings. The Tartars, Persians, and Turkes, require longer and seuerall discourses in their due place; and first wee will speake of them which are first in this ranke, the greatest of all Mahumetane States, the Turkes.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the Turkish Nation : their Originall, and Proceedings.

Lthoug some may thinke that I haue beene so tedious in the relation of the Mahumetan opinions and superstitions, that, to speake any thing more, would seeme but as powring water into a full Sea: Yet, because there is in this World nothing certayne, but vncertaintie, it being diuine prerogative to bee yesterday, to day, the same for euer, and that this Saracenicall Religion hath sustayned her chances and changes according to the diuersitie of times and places, where it is and hath been professed: so doe I hold it fit, as wee haue seene the foundation, to behold also the frames and fabriques thereon builded, and from that Fountaine (or sinck-hole rather) of superstition, to leade you along the gutters and streames thence deriued. And because the Turkes are preeminent in all those thinges which this profession accounteth eminent, it is meetest to giue them the first place here, which elsewhere take it: and after we haue set downe a brieue Historie of that Nation, and the proceedings of their state, to describe their theorie and opinions, and then their practise and rites of Religion. But before we come to the discouerie of their Religion, it is not amisse to search the beginning and increase of this Nation.

The name of Turkes signifieth (saith Chiracius) Sheephards, or Heard-men; and such it seemeth was their ancient profession, as of the rest of the Scythians vnto this day. Nicephorus * (and before him Smocatta, from whom Nicephorus borroweth it) speaketh of the Turkes, and placeth them about Baetria: their chiefe Citie he calleth Taugast, which is supposed to bee the worke of Alexander. Their Religion hee saith at that time was to worship the Fire, Aire, Water, and Earth, which they adore, and sing Hymnes to. They acknowledge God the maker of Heauen and Earth, to whom they sacrifice, Horse, Kine, and Sheepe: they haue Priests which diuine of things to come. The Prince of Taugast, they called the sonne of God: They worship Images. The Prince spendeth the night with seuen hundred women. The Tartars haue now possessed the same Countrey; but long before, the same rites, as you may reade in our Historie of them. To deriue them (as some doe) from Troians and Iewes is somewhat farre<sup>b</sup> fetched: nor is there much likelihood that they should receiue their name of Turca: a Persian Citie: the name is ancient, and applied by<sup>d</sup> Mela and Plini to a Nation of the Scythians, and their originall is accounted Scythian by the<sup>e</sup> most and best Authors. Beniamin Tudelensis calleth them alway by the name Togams. There are which bring a long Genealogie from Noahs Arke, vnto the Ottoman Familie: herein disagreeing, while some will haue Magog, others Tubal the Authour of their Nation. Leunclavius f reciteth and resureth the same. Hee writeth the name Iurki, alleaging Herodotus for his Author: and citeth many Authors to proue that they descended of the Unni or Vngri, which were called Turkes, of which there were two sorts, one westerly in Pannonia, an other easterly neare Persia, called by the Persians Magores, he concludeth that the Unni or Iurchi came from Iuchra or Iuchria (where the name Iuchri might easily bee deflected to Iurchi) beyond Tanais; and first after they had forsaken their owne Countrey, settled themselves neare Maxotis, from whence they passed to Chazaria, and some went westward to Pannonia, some eastward to Armenia, and thence into Persia.

Many probable Arguments might be brought, to proue that they descended of the Scythians, whose wandering shepheardly-life, both the name and their practise (in old times, and in some places still) expresseth. The first Expedition and militarie employment which I haue read of the Turkes, (except what the feare of them compelled the Persians vnto, as in their Historie we shall after see) was g vnder Varamus a rebellious Persian, aboue a thousand yeares since, when Cesroes was King of Persia, and Mauritius the Roman Emperour: at what time many of them were slaine, and many taken, which confessed, that famine had forced them to those warres, for which cause they marked themselves with a black Crosse; a ceremonie which they said they had learned of the Christians, thinking thereby to expell hunger. This hungrie Nation hath since bene a greedie and insatiate deudurer of Nations. Another Expedition of theirs (which some reckon the first) was in the yeare 775. or after an other account, 844. at which time, passing through the Georgian Countrie, then called Iberia, they first seized on a part of the greater Armenia, which their posteritie holdeth at this day, called of them Turcomania. In this wide and spacious Countrie they romed vp and downe, without certaine habitation, a long time with their families and herds of cattell, like the ancient Scythian Nomades, and the Tartars, and the same Turcoman Nation at this day. Their language also, as Meziserus in his Turkish Grammar sheweth, hath great affinity, with the Tartarian, as also with the Persian (neare whom, and sometimes, as now will appeare, amongst them, they liued.) But from the Arabike it differeth altogether. Yet in their boies they most vse the Arabike by reason of the Alcoran written in that language: like wise they vse the Arabike letters and prickes.

When as the Saracens Empire grew now vnweldie, through her owne greatnesse, and the Soldans, which were wont to conquer for the Chaliph, beganne now to share with him in his large Dominion: Mahomet (then Sultan or Soldan of Persia) was for this cause hardly beset with the Chaliph of Babylon; assayed also on the other side by the Indians. Hee sought to strengthen himselfe against these enemies with the new friendship of these Turkes, of whom hee obtayned for his aide three thousand hardie Souldiers, vnder the conduct of Tangra Muelet, the sonne of Mikel, a valiant Capitaine, and chiefe of the Selzucian Tribe or Familie, whom the Greeks commonly call Tangrolipix, and some Selduc, or Sader. By the helpe of this Tangrolipix, Mahomet the Persian Sultan ouercame Pisafirus the Chaliph. The Turkes, after this warre, desiring leave to passe ouer the Riuer Araxis to their Countrie-men, were both denied, and threatened, if they againe should seeke to depart. Whereupon they with-drew themselves into the Desart of Caraxonia; liuing there, and thence making roads into the Countreies adioyning. Mahomet sent against them twentie thousand men, which by a sodaine surprize in the night, Tangrolipix defeated, and furnished himselfe with their spoiles. And now durst Tangrolipix shew his face in the field; where his Armie was increased by the resort of lawlesse persons, seeking after spoile. Mahomet on the other side, impatient of his losse, put out the eyes of the Captaines, which had the leading of the Armie, and threatened to artire the Souldiers, that had fled, in womens apparell; and raising an other great Armie, set forward against Tangrolipix, who was now fiftie thousand strong, and was presently made stronger by those threatened Souldiers, who fled from their Lord vnto him. They met at Ispahan (a Citie of Persia) and there Mahomet falling with his horse, brake his neck: vpon which mischance both armies comming to agreement, by common consent, proclaimed Tangrolipix Sultan in his stead; and so made him King of Persia, and the Dominion thetunto pertayning, which was done Anno 1030.

Tangrolipix opened the passages of Araxis to the rest of his Countrie-men; whom he exalted to the highest places of command, so bridling the Persians, and he and his receiuing in their new Conquests the yoke of the Mahometan Religion. Ambition inciting him to further exploits, he warred also vpon Pisafirus the Chaliph: and after diuers ouerthrowes, slue him, and seised on his state. He sent Cutlu-Muses his Kinsman against the Arabians, by whom he was discomfited: whereat aggrieved, hee went against them himselfe, but with like successe. Hee sent Asan his brothers sonne to invade Media, who in that enterprize was slaine: he sent againe Habraime Alim his brother with an Armie of an hundred thousand men, who tooke prisoner Liparites Gouernour of Iberia, (who came to aide the Emperours Lieutenant in Media) whom Tangrolipix frankly set free, and sent his Embassadour to the Emperour, proudly demanding him to become his subiect.

Such haps, and such hopes had Tangrolipix, the first Turke that euer was honoured with a Diademe. His sonne, and successeur Azan tooke Diogenis the Emperour of Constantinople prisoner in the field: But Cutlu-Muses with his Cosin Melich (who in his Fathers dayes had fled into Arabia) rebelling, and taking armes against him; as Azan was readie to ioyne battell with them, the Caliph (who retayned the highest place still in their superstition, although dispoyled of his Temporalties) setting afide all his Pontificall formalitie, whereby he was bound not to goe out of his owne house, thrust himselfe betwene these Armies: and with the reverence of his place and person, together with his perswasions, moued them to desist, and to stand to his arbitrement: which was, that Alexander the Suleian should still enjoy his Dominions entirely. And that Curtis Musfer, and his sonnes aided by him, should invade the Constantinopolitan Empire, and should be absolute and only Lords of whatsoever they could gaine thereof. There was neuer any thing to that impetrie more commodious, nor to our Religion more dangerous. For by this meanes Curtis Musfer with his sonnes in a short time conquered all Media, with a great part of Armenia, Cappadocia, Pontus, and Bithynia; which their designs were much furthered by treasons and dissensions in the Greeke Empire. Alexander the Sultan also gave to his Kinsmen Ducas and Melich, the gouernement of Aleppo, and Damasco, with the adioyning parts of Syria, by the meanes to inroach vpon the Egyptian Caliph, which accordingly they in a short time did.

k The memorable Expedition of the Christian Princes into the holy Land. Historia belli sacri G. Tyr. and many others write at large of these Warres.

But these their haughtie attempts were stayed, and being now in the flower, were cut shorter by that fortunate Expedition of the Christian Princes of the West, agreed vpon at the Councell of Claremont, and performed by Gualter Sansauer; Peter the Heremite, first and principall mouer hereof; Godfrey Duke of Lorraine, with his two brethren Eustace and Baldwin, of the honorable house of Buillon; Henry named the Great, brother to Philip the French King; Raymond and Robert Earles of Flanders; Robert of Normandie sonne to William the Conquerour; Stephen de Ulois Earle of Chartiers; Ademar the Popes Legate; Robert Prince of Tarentum, and others, conducting, as the most received opinion is, three hundred thousand Soldiers, in defence of the Christian Faith against the Turkes and Saracens, which both ouerthrew the Turkes in the lesser Asia, and recovered also the holy Land. The Principallitie, or (as some stile it) the Kingdome of Antioch was giuen by common consent to Bohemund Prince of Tarentum; the Kingdome of Ierusalem, to Robert: who (hearing of his Fathers death) refused it in hope of England; and Godfrey of Buillon was saluted King.

The Turkes and Saracens seeking to recouer that which they had lost, lost all themselves; a hundred thousand of them being slaine in one battell: the like successe had the Turkes after against Comrade the Emperour, at Meander: leauing for trophies and triumphall arches to the Christians, huge heapes, or hills rather, of their bones. Hereunto helped the dissensions among the Turkes, and diuisions of their state among diuers brethren. The Egyptians also paid tribute to the Christians: which Dargan the Sultan detayning, he was by Almericus the King of Ierusalem ouerthrowne in battell. Noradin the Turke, King of Damasco, sent thither also Saracoon to aide Samar the Sultan (before expelled) to recouer his state from this Dargan: but hee hauing won certaine towncs kept them to himselfe, so that Samar betooke him to the patronage of Almericus, who ouerthrew Saracoon in battell, and after besieged and tooke Alexandria, and Pelusium, seeking also to conquer Egypt to himselfe; but indeede (as the euent proued) so subuerted his owne state. For Samar sought helpe of Saracoon, and for feare of both their forces, Almericus left Egypt. Saracoon, moued with ambition, treacherously slue the Sultan, and by the Caliph was appointed Sultan, the first of the Turkes that euer enioyed the same, to whom Saladine his Nephew succeeded. He (not respecting the maiestie of the Caliph, as the Sultans before had done) struck out his braines with his horse-mans mace, and rooted out all his posteritie; the better to assure himselfe and his Turkish successors in the possession of that kingdome, vnder whom it continued to the time of the Mamelukes. Noradin also the Turke being dead, the Nobilitie disdainig the gouernment of Melechfala his son (yet but a youth) betrayed that state vnto Saladine. And thus did he hem in the Kingdome of Ierusalem on both sides, and not long after, Aleppo was betrayed vnchristianly into his hands by a Traitor, who gouerned the same for the Christians: Neither was it long, before hee had (through discord and treason amongst the Christians) obtained Ierusalem it selfe, Anno 1187. and after Ascalon, and Antioch also: Neither could the Christians of the West euer recouer the possession of that Kingdome; the cause continuing the same, which before had lost it, viz. diffention and treacherie as the examples of Richard and Edward (first of those names) Kings of this Land doe shew.

About 1202. yeares after Christ, the Tartars (of whom in their due place) hauing conquered East, West, North, and South, among others ouerthrew that Togrian kingdome of the Turkes in Persia, 170. yeares before founded by Tangrolisix. The Turkes which remained (driven to seeke shelter from this violent storme) fled out of Persia into Asia the lesse: where Cutlu Muses his successors (their Countrey-men) inioyed some part of the Countrey. And there many of them arriuing vnder the conduct of Aladin the sonne of Kei Hufrew descended also of the Selzuccian Familie in Persia, taking the oportunitie offered by the discord of the Latines with the Greekes, and the Greekes among themselves, seized vpon Cilicia, with the Countreys thereabout; and there first at Sebastia, and afterward at Iconium, erected their new Kingdome, bearing the name of the Aladin * Kings or Sultans.

The Tartars vnder the conduct of Haalon, sent by Mango the Great Cham, hauing conquered and starued the Chaliph of Babylon (as is said before) ouerthrew the Turkish Kingdome of Damasco, and rased * Aleppo; the other arme of this faire and faire spreading Tree being surprized by the Mamaluke slaues, who after Haalons departure recovered Syria and Palæstina, and were againe with great slaughter disposed of the same by Cassanes <sup>a</sup> a Tartarian Prince, who repaired Ierusalem and gaue it to the Christians of Armenia, and other the Easterne Countreys. But Cassanes retyring into Persia to pacifie new broiles, the Sultan recovered the same; the Christians of the West neglecting the iust defence thereof, specially through the pride and conuention of Boniface the Pope (contrarie to his name) filling a great part of Europe with fiction and quarrells.

The Turkes in Asia paid tribute to the Tartar Cham, till (succession in the bloud of Aladin failing) this Kingdome was diuersly rent, euery one catching so much as his might could bestow on his ambition. The greatest of these sharers was <sup>c</sup> one Caraman Alufinus, who tooke vnto himselfe the Citie Iconium, with all the Countrey of Cilicia, and some part of the frontiers of Lycaonia, Pamphylia, Caria, and the greater Phrygia, as farre as Philadelphia; all which was after of him called Caramania. Next neighbor & sharer to him was Sarnuchan: of whom Ionis Maritima is called Sarnuchanidis. The greatest part of Lydia, with some part of the greater Mysia, Troas, & Phrygia fell to Carsius, caled of him Carastilis: some part of Pontus & the countrey of Paphlagonia fell to the sons of Omer, which countrey is called Bolli. These all were of the Selzuccian familie. But the foundation of far higher fortunes were then laid much lower by diuine providence, exalting Ottoman of the Oguzian tribe or familie, who then held one only poore Lordship, called Suguta in Bythinia, not farre from Olympus, giuen before to his father Eriborral in meed of good seruice: which hee increasing by winning somewhat from the weaker Christians his neighbors, afterwards erected into a Kingdome which hath deuoured so great a part of the world, as is this day subiect to the Turkish greatness. When as the Tartars chased (as is said) the Turkes out of their Persian kingdome, which Tangrolisix had there established, one Solyman a Turke (of the Oguzian Tribe) reigned in Machan <sup>d</sup> ouer a small Realme, which for feare of those Tartars hee also forooke, and with a thousand of his people, fled, and seated himselfe in a part of Armenia about Erzerum; and after, vpon some better hopes, resolved to returne againe into Persia; but in seeking to passe the Riuer Euphrates, was drowned, and his followers dispersed following their ancient trade of wandering heards men. He left behinde him foure Sonnes Sencur-Teken, Iundogdis, Ertogrul the father of Ottoman, and Dunder. The two eldest returned into Persia. The two yongest stayed, and with them 400. families, with their tents and carts, their moueable houses. And insinuating into the Sultan Aladins good liking, by syle and desert, this Ertogrul was rewarded, as we haue heard, being made Lord of Suguta, and Warden of those Marches: and liued there in securitie, till he was of great yeares, and had seene much alteration in that state. He died Anno 1289. hauing liued ninetie three yeares. And him succeeded by common consent, as Lord ouer the Oguzian Turkes, his sonne Ottoman, saluted therefore by the name of Osman Beg, or Lord Osman. He first got into his subiection a great part of the

Castles and Forts of the greater Phrygia; equally protecting his subjects both Christians and Turkes: he conquered Nice, the name whereof is reuerend for the first Generall Councell of Christendome; and Aladin the second, Sultan of Iconium gave vnto him a faire ensigne, a Sword and Robe, with ample Charters, that whatsoever hee tooke from the Christians, should bee his owne: and that publike prayers should bee said in their Temples for his health, which was of him humbly accepted, and such prayers made by one Dursu, whom hee had appointed Bishop and Iudge of Carachisar, Anno 1300. Neapolis was made his seat Royall. He fished so well in the troubled streame of the Greeke Empire, that hee subdued the most part of Phrygia, Mysia, and Bythynia: and Prusa after a long siege was yielded vnto his Sonne Orchanes, and made the Royall seat of the Ottoman-Kings, where Ottoman himselfe was buried 1328. His Sonne Orchanes succeeded: Aladin his Brother contenting himselfe with a priuate life, who after built two Mahumetan Churches, and another at Prusa. Orchanes also erected in Nice a sumptuous Temple, appointing a Preacher to preach to the people euery Friday, and two faire Abbies: in the one of which, he with his owne hands serued the strangers and poore the first dinner. Hee was the first that builded Abbies among the Turkes, followed herein by most of his Successors. He got Nicomedia, and the Townes adioyning. Hee also wanne all Charasia, and at his returne built a Church and Abbey at Prusa, placing therein Religious men, sought out with all diligence. His sonne Solyman first of the Turkes that possessed any foot in Europe, crossed the Hellespont, and wanne the Castle Zemeenic, and after that Madina, receptacles for the Turkes, which came ouer in multitudes; he transporting Christians into Asia, to dwell in their roome. And after, he wanne Gallipoli, spoiling the Countrey, and winning from the Greekes who were negligent in preventing or remedying this danger. But Solyman dying with a fall, his old father Orchanes liued not two moneths after; a Prince very zealous in his superstition, who besides building diuine Church's, Abbies, Colledges, and Cells, allowed Pensions to all such as could in the Church say the booke of Mahomet's law by heart, and competent maintenance to the Iudges that they should not sell iustice.

Amurath which succeeded, exceeded him in this blinde zeale. He kept in awe the Turkish Princes in Asia, and wane many Townes and Castles in Thracia: and amongst others, Adrianople the seat Royall of the Turkish Kingdome, vntill Constantinople was after subdued. This was done 1362. He ordayned, that euery fift Captiue of the Christians about fifteene yeares old, should be taken vp for the Turkish King, which were distributed among the Turkish husband-men in Asia, to learne the Turkish Language, Religion, and Manners; and after two or three yeares, choice was made of the better sort, to attend vpon the Princes person, and for his warres called lanizans, that is, new Souldiers: which Order after grew to great account, and is yet a principall pillar of the Turkish greatnesse. Hee overthrew Aladin the Caramanian King, which made the other Princes of the Selzuccian Familie to submit themselves vnto him, and busying himselfe in his new Conquests in Europe, after a great victorie obtrayned against Lazarus, Dyffot of Seruia, as hee viewed the slaine carcases, was slaine of a wounded and halfe-dead Souldier; who, coming staggering as it were to begg his life, stabbed this great Couquerour, with a dagger, hidden vnder his garments.

Balazet his sonne and successour oppresseth most of the Mahumetan Princes in Asia, inuadeth Valachia, besiegeth Constantinople eight yeeres, overthroweth the King of Hungarie in battell, subdoeth the Caramanian Kingdome, and amidst his aspiring fortunes, is by Tamerlane deprived of his Kingdome and libertie, shut vp and carried about in an yron Cage; against the barres whereof he beat out his braines, Anno 1399. Mahomet his sonne (after much warre with his brethren) wholly possesseth the Ottoman Kingdome both in Europe and Asia, almost quite overthrowne before by Tamerlane. Hee tooke the Caramanian King, and his sonne Mustapha prisoners: who became his Vassals, as did also the Valachian Prince; he died 1422. Amurath his successor winneth Theffalonica, the greatest part of Aetolia, inferreth the Princes of Aethiopia, Phocis, and Beoetia, to become his Tributaries, oppresseth the Mahumetan Princes of Asia, subdueth Seruia, spoileth Hungarie. He after rettyred himselfe to a Monast-

call life in a Monasterie, which yet the affaires of State forced him to leaue againe.
 He inuading Epirus, at the siege of Croia died 1450.

Mahomet was there saluted Sultan in the field, a man equally vnequall and trouble some to the Christian and Mahumetan Princes. Hee wanne Constantinople the twentieth of May 1453. the taking whereof, is by Leonardus Chienfis,<sup>b</sup> declared in a Treatise composed of that vnhappie Argument, and likewise by Cardinall Isidorus Rubennus. He wanne Trabezond, the Imperiall seat of another Christian Empire, Anno 1460. Hence he was called Emperor (a name not given to the Turkish Kings.) He burnt Athens, Anno 1452. He obtained Epirus and Myfia, Anno 1436. and did much harme against the Soldan and Mamelukes. He conquered Eubcea and Illyricum, in the year 1474. ouerthrew the Persians; and in the last act of his bloudie life he tooke (by Achmetes his Captaine) Otranto or Hydruntum in Italy, with no small terror to all Italy. He was fir-named Great, and is said to haue conquered two hundred Cities, twelue Kingdomes, and two Empires: which he left to Baiazet his sonne, Anno 1481. His brother Zemes was forced to flee into Italy, where a great summe of money<sup>c</sup> was yearly allowed the Pope to keepe him for his owne securitie, and for loue of his brother, whom Alexander the Bishop is reported<sup>f</sup> to poyson, as some thinke, by composition with the grand Seignior. Hee had some warres against the Mamelukes, some against the Christians, more ynnaturall against his brother, but most vnaturall and monstrous against his sonne Selym. His conquests were in Cilicia, Caramania, and Peloponnesus.

Selym, not content to haue thrust his father out of the Throne, aspired to a further effect of aspiring ambition, depriving him of life, from whom himselfe had receiued it. To this end he corrupted a Jew, Baiazets Physitian (whom Knolles calleth Haman; but Menaninus an eye-witnesse, nameth him Pharabi) who with the powder of beaten Diamonds poysoned him; and for reward, when he claimed Selyms promise, had his head stricken off in the Tyrants presence. So much did he hate the traytour, whose treason he so much loued. The bodie of Baiazet was embalmed, and interred at Constantinople, in a beautifull Sepulchre neere to the Meschit which himselfe had built, and Priests were appointed, which should euery day pray for his soule. Two of his Pages did Selym put to death, for wearing black and mourning apparell for their Masters death: and three others (whereof Menaninus was one) hardly, by entreatie of Selyms daughters, and some Bassaes, escaped.

This Viper, that spared not his father, proceeded with bloudie hands to make an end of the rest of his Ottoman-kindred, beginning with five sonnes of his brethren, and adding the remnant, as hee could bring them into his power. And hauing thus founded his throne in bloudie cruelties of his owne at home, no maruell if abroad his proceedings were no lesse cruell and bloudie towards his enemies. Of whom the first which offered himselfe (after his domestical warres appeased) was Ismael the<sup>h</sup> Sophie; who with thirtie thousand Persian horsemen gaue battaile to Selym (notwithstanding his three hundred thousand Turkes) where was fought in Armenia, neere Coy, a terrible and mortall battaile betwixt them: the Turkes at last (very hardly) preuailling, by helpe of their great Ordinance: but so little cause had they to reioyce of their victory, that this is reckoned among the dismall and distastrous dayes, tearmed by the Turkes, The only day of Doome. The next<sup>i</sup> year he entred againe into the Persian Confinnes, and there tooke Ciamassum, ouerthrew Aladentes the Mountaine King, who reigned in Taurus and Antitaurus, and slew him. But his most fortunate attempts were against Campson Gaurus, the Egyptian Soldan, and his forces of Mamelukes, whom by his multitudes (notwithstanding their fame and valour, not inferiour to any souldiers of the World) he ouercame; the Soldan himselfe being left dead in the place, August. 7. 1516.

Neither had Tommubeins, his successor, any better successe, but succeeded as well in his fortune, as to his Scepter, who by reason of his owne, and power of his enemy, lost both his life and Kingdome; all Egypt and Syria thereby accrewing to the Ottomans. Selym from thenceforth purposing to turne his forces from the Sunne-rising against the Christians in the West, came to his owne Sunne-set, the period of his raigne and and life: a miserable disease (as an angrie Pursuivant) exacting and redemanding his bloudie cruell spirit, an implacable officer of that most implacable Tyrant to Tyrants, and Prince of Princes, Death, who at last conquered this Conquerour: or rather (if his <sup>k</sup> Epitaph written on his Tombe say true) conueyed him hence to seeke new Conquests. His disease was a Canker in the backe (eating out a passage for his Viperous foule) which made him rotte while he liued, and become a stinking burthen to himselfe and others. He died in September, 1520. hauing before bequeathed bloudshed and desolation to the Christians, and ordained Solyman, his sonne and heire, executor of that his hellish Testament: And further, to excite him thereunto, had left him the lively counterfeite of himselfe, with sundrie bloudie Precepts annexed: His title therein written, was, Sultan Selym Othoman, King of Kings, Lord of all Lords, Prince of all Princes, Sonne and Nephew of God. We may adde, Heire apparant to the Diuell, that breathed his last in blood, resembling him that was a Murderer from the beginning.

Solyman, fir-named the Magnificent, succeeded his father Selym in place, and surmounted him exceedingly in exploits. Belgrade, (which ominous name did preface happinesse vnto him in his Warres and Proceedings) was the beginning of his Conquests, wonne by the Turkes, August 29, 1521. <sup>a</sup> Rhodes receueth him on Christmas day, 1522, but withall exileth both Cheere, Christmas, and Christians. He inuadeth <sup>b</sup> Hungarie, and in the field discomfitteth and killeth Lewes, and slayeth or captureth two hundred thousand Hungarians in that Expedition, 1526. He entreth Hungarie the second time, 1529. and (after some butcheries therein) marcheth to Vienna in Austria, where he left fourescore thousand of his Turkes, and then with shame and anger returned. In the yeare 1532. he returneth with an Armie of fife hundred thousand men; to whom Charles the fift opposed himselfe, and the Christian forces, in greater numbers then hath in many ages beene seene, mustering in his Armie at Vienna two hundred and threescore thousand men, whereof fourescore and ten thousand foot-men. and thirtie thousand horse-men were old souldiers, to whom Solyman did not, or durst not, bid bataille. Poore Hungarie rue it meane while, whether he getteth or loseth in Austria, being made his through-fare as he went and came.

After this he trieth his successe against the Persian, where he taketh Tauris and Babylon, with the Countries of Assyria and Media, Anno 1534. each of which had sometimes beene Ladie of the World. At incredible costs he prepared a Fleet in the Red sea, 1537. and taking Aden and Zibyth, two pettie Kingdomes in Arabia, by his forces <sup>c</sup> besieged Dium, a Castle of the Portugals in the East Indies, but without his wished successe. For the Portugals still retaine their Indian Seas and Traffique, and not onely freed that their Castle from Turkish bondage, but had meanes to fortifie it better, by the Ordinance which the Turkes, in their hastie flight, had left behind. A more dangerous plot did Solyman, meane while, contriue against Christendome, preparing his forces to inuade Italy, and to that end was come to Aulona, an Hauen in Macedonia, with two hundred thousand Souldiers, where Barbarossa and Lutzius Bassa, his great Admirall, met him with his Fleet, to transport his Armie. But Solyman first employed these Sea-Forces on the coast of Italy, and tooke Castnum, his horsemen (which he had sent ouer in great Palendars) carried away the People, Cattell and Substance, betwixt Brundisium and Tarentum, fortie miles space; all the Countrey of Otranto terrified with feare of a greater tempest. But the Venetians turned it from the rest of Italie vpon themselves (notwithstanding their league) by vnseasonable exacting of that

Sea.

Sea-courtesie, the vailing of the bonnets or top-sailes of some Turkish Gallies vnto them, as Lords of that Sea: for which neglect some of them were sunke. <sup>d</sup> Andreo d'Orro, also, the Emperours Admirall, had surpris'd some of the Turkes stragling Fleet, and after held cruell fight with twelue great Gallies full of Janizaries and choisemen, whom he overthrew and tooke. But the Janizaries that were left, cast their scimitars over-board, lest such choice weapons should come to the Christians hands. Solyman conuerting his Forces against the Venetians, for the indignities mentioned, had almost fallen into the hands of the Mountaine-Theeues, which lived in the Acroceraunian Hills: who in a strange resolution had conspired to kill him in his Tent; and had almost (to the wonder of the world) in a night, by vnknowne wayes, suddenly effected it, had not the cooking of a bough discovered their Capitaine, who in a tree was taking view of the Galee, how to bring to passe his desperat designs. This their Capitaine, (by name Damianus) was, after confession hereof, torne in pieces; and those wilde Mountaine-men (living on robbetrie, without Law or Religion) were, like wilde beasts, hunted to destruction.

The Turkes invaded Corfu, whence they carried sixteene thousand of the Islanders captives. They likewise, in their returne, committed great spoyle in Zante, and Cythera, sacked Egina, Paros, and other Islands in the Archipelago; bringing Naxos vnder Tribute: Barbarossa sacked Borrotus, a Venetian Citie: The like did Ustirif to Obratium, and the Castle of Nadin. Nauplium also, and Epidaurus were besieged. But Ferdinand (who had instituted himselfe King of Hungarie, after Lewis his death) receiued a greater disgrace in Hungarie by the Turkish forces, then befell the Venetians in all their losses; Cazzianer (the Generall of the Christians) shamefully fleeing, and betraying his associates to the Turkish crueltie. The next yeare, 1538. Barbarossa chaſeth the Christian Fleet, in which the Emperours, Venetians, and the Popes forces were ioyned.

In the yeare 1541. Solyman againe invadeth Hungarie, professing himselfe Protector of the young King, which Iohn, late King of Hungarie (who had held long warres with Ferdinand about that Title) had left behind him his heire and successor. But vnder colour of protection, he maketh himselfe Lord of Buda, the chiefe Citie, turning the Cathedral Church into a Meschit; and maketh Hungarie a Turkish Prouince, bestowing Transylvania, and what he pleased, on the Orphan. Two yeares after he reuentereth Hungarie, and taketh Strigonium: turning the Christian Temples into Mahometan; sacrificing there for his victorie, as he had done at Buda. He entred also into Alba Regalis; (where the Hungarian Kings lye entombed) another chiefe Citie of that Kingdome, and slew the Magistrates. I speake not all this while of the spacious Countrey in Africa, which, from the Riuer Mulvia, he added to his Dominions: the Kingdomes of Algier, Tremisen, Tunes, Tripoli, &c. being annexed to his Turkish Souerignitie. Howbeit, Tunes, by aide of Charles the Emperour, somewhat recovered herselfe, but breathed out againe her last gaspe of libertie, in the dayes of Selym his sonne. And thus was Solyman victorious and happie; otherwhere victorious and vn-happie, when he was forced to darreine battaile against his owne bowels, and hauing murdered Mustapha his eldest sonne (the hopefullest branch in Turkish estimation that ever grew out of the Ottoman stocke) he warred against Basater, another of his sonnes; whom, with foure of his children, he procured to be done to death in Persia. And after much domestically trouble, in his seuenth Expedition into Hungarie (his fleet in the Siege of Malta being before, with great disgrace, repulsed) he died at the siege of Zizeth, the fourth of September 1566.

Selym, the onely sonne which the bloudie father had left alive, succeeded in the Throne, not in the prowesse and valour of his father. Neither hath any Turkish Sultán, since his dayes, led their Forces in person, but committed it to their Deputies and Generals; except once, when Mahomet the third had almost lost his Armie and himselfe. Yet did this Selym, by his Bassaes, make himselfe Lord of Cyprus, and also of the Kingdome of Tunes. But this sweet meat was souerely sawced by his exceeding losse in the Sea-fight betwixt Haly Bassa, Admirall of the Turkes, <sup>h</sup> and Don Iohn of Austria, Generall of the Fleet, set forth by the Pope, Spaniard, and Venetian, 1571. wherein

wherein an hundred threescore and one Gallies were taken, fortie sunke or burnt, and of Gallions, and other small Vessels, were taken about threescore. The Turkish Admirall was then slaine. Wittily did a Turke descant vpon this losse of the Turkes, and their gaine of Cyprus, comparing this to the shauing of a mans beard, which would grow againe: that, to the losse of an arme, which, once cut off, cannot be renewed. Lastly, Tunes came in, and Selym went out of this Turkish Soueraigntie, both in manner together, 1574.

Amurath, his heire, began his Empire with the slaughter of his five brethren. The mother of Selyman (one of that number) slew her selfe with a dagger, for anguish of that losse. He in viewing a new Gallie, by the breach of a Peece, hardly escaped death, thirtie of his company being slaine. And because the Plague was exceeding horrible by deuotion sought to appease diuine anger: and therefore prohibited all vile of Sodomie, Blasphemie, and Polygamie, and himselfe put out five hundred women out of his Serails. In a priuate habit he visited the Markets, and hanged vp the hoorders of crime. He by the Tartars inuaded Polonia: And, Henry of France secretly leauing that Kingdome of Polonia, he wrote vnto them to chuse Stephen Bassor for their King; in which letters he called himselfe, God of the Earth, Governour of the whole World, Messenger of God, and faithfull seruant of the great Prophet: which wrought so much with the Nobilitie, that either they would not, or durst not doe otherwise, howsoeuer Maximilian had bene before by many of them chosen.

Tamur, the Persian (at the same time dying) bequeathed his Crowne to Ismael his sonne, whom Aider, his brother, seeketh to deprive, but is therefore himselfe deposed of that ambitious head, which he sought to adorne with the Crowne; and Ismael adding the slaughter of eight his yonger brethren, ascendeth the Throne; which, together with his life, he lost, by like vnaturall treacherie of Periaconsona his sister, the foure and twentieth of November, 1577.

Mahomet his brother succeeded in this troublesome State, which Amurath the Turke (in these troubled waters) thought fit time for himselfe to fish for. Hereunto also helped the hatred and ciuill broyles in Persia, for the head of Periaconsona, presented to Mahomet, with the haire disheuelled on a Lance, and for other vncomely bloudie spectacles; Sabamal, and Lenent Ogl (two Georgian Lords) seeking also innovations. Amurath therefore, in the year 1578. sent Mustapha Bassa, which had lately conquered Cyprus, with an Arme of an eleuen hundred thousand, into Persia, who, in the first battaile he had with them, slew five thousand, and tooke three thousand Persians: and to strike that Nation with terrour, commanded a bulwarke to be framed of those heads: but by an exceeding tempest, which lasted foure dayes together (whereby the Heauens seemed to meke themselves in teares for the Persians losse, and with Lightnings to shew that indignation against the Turkes, which in their thundering Dialect they aloud yitered) there grew such horror to their minds from abroad, and such sickness to their bodies, from those putrified carcases beneath, that Mustapha was forced to remoue, missing fortie thousand of his first musters. After he had fortified the Armenian Castle of Tessis, his Arme being driuen to shifts for lack of victuals, ten thousand of his foragers were slaine by the Persians, who were recompenced with like slaughter by Mustapha, that came vpon them whiles they were busied about the spoyle, and spoyled the spoylers. In passing ouer the Riuer Canac, hee lost fourescore thousand Turkes, which the Riuer seemed to take for Custome (as it had many of the Persians in the late conflict) whereof his violent current was a greedy and cruell exactor. Mustapha erected a Fortresse in Eres, and tooke Sumachia, chief Citie of Siruan (Verbent offering her selfe to the Turke) and then returning into Atolia. But Emir Hamse Mirse, the Persian Prince, recovered, after his departure, both Eres and Sumachia, slew and captiued the Tartars, thirtie thousand of whom were newly come to the Turkes side. He rased Sumachia euen with the ground. The next year Mustapha fortified Chars in three and twentie dayes, wherein they were hindered with Snowes on the five and twentieth of August, although it standeth in some foure Degrees. Anno 1580. Siruan Bassa was chosen Generall for the Persian Warre, who, as he departed from Tessis, lost seuen thousand of his people, besides such as the

Georgians and Persians, together with the spoyle, carried away. This was earnest, the rest was but sportfull shewes of warre, in traying his souldiers; after which he returned. In 1583, Ferat Bassa was sent General: but little was done, till Osman Bassa, a new General, 1585, tooke Tauris, the ancient Ecbatana. (as Minadoris of opinion.) But the Persian Prince, carried with indignation, reuenged this losse on the Turkes with his owne hands, slaying Caramis Bassa, General in the place of Osman, then sick, and gaue his head (as opuma spolia) to one of his followers; and afterwards an Sancazan slew twentie thousand Turkes. Osman died of sicknesse; and the Persian Prince (the Morning-starre of that Easterne State) was soone after murdered. In that small yeare 1588, Ferat tooke Genge: fifteen thousand houses, seuen Temples, and five and twentie great Innes were burned in Constantinople, the tumultuous Ianizaries not suffering the fire to be quenched. An Impost was leuied of the subiects, to satisfie the pay due to the souldiours for the Persian warre, which raised these stirres. Yea, the Priests dissuaded the people from those new payments, and perswaded them to maintaine their ancient Liberties. Shut vp their Meschits, intermitted their Orisons; and the Great Turke was forced to call in his Mandats, and deliuer the authors of that counsell (whereof the Beglerbeg of Græcia was one) to the Ianizaries furie, who made Tennis-balls of their heads. In 1592. Wihitz, chiefe Citie of Croatia, was yeilded to the Turke. The next yeare Siseg was besieged, but relieved by the Christians, who slew eighteen thousand Turkes, and tooke their Tents; yet was it soone after taken by the renewed forces of the Turkes. Swan tooke Vesprimium in Hungarie and Palotta, but their losse was farre greater then their gaines; which continuing, and a broyle of the Ianizaries added thereto, brought Amurath into melancholie and sicknesse, whereof he died, the eighteenth of January, 1595. Transyluania, Valachia, and Moldauia, having before revolted from him to Sigismund, who was entituled their Prince. This Amurath in a letter to Queene Elizabeth, entituleth himselfe, By the mercie of God free from all sinne, with all heights of grace made possessor of great blessednesse above the 72. Lawes of the world.

Mahomet his sonne succeeded; who inuiting his nineteene brethren to a Feast, sent them to learne his fathers death in the other world, accompanied thither with ten of Amuraths women, from whom issue was feared, which with drowning them hee prevented. Much adoe he had with his Ianizaries at home, much losse in his Dominions abroad, for which cause he sent for Ferat Bassa out of Hungarie, and strangled him, and sent Swan, his emulous corruall, in his roome, whom the Transylvanian Prince overthrew in battaile, and after chased him ouer a Bridge, which he made a mile in length for his Armie to passe ouer Danubius, with great losse of his people. His Bodge the fire and water diuided betwixt them; and the conceit of this ill successe (as was thought) procured his death soone after. In the yeare 1597. Mahomet in his owne person enterprised these warres, and not farre from Agria, on the sixteenth of October, fought a cruell battaile with the Christians, wherein (had not Couetousnesse, rightly called the root of all euill, hindered) had bene atchieued the most glorious victorie against those Barbarians, that euer Christendome was blessed with. Mahomet himselfe for feare, seeing his Ordinance (an hundred fourescore and ten great Peeces) taken, and his men slaine in multitudes, fled with Ibrahim Bassa towards Agria, shedding reares by the way, which hee wiped off his bloudie face with a peece of greene Silke, supposed to be a peece of *Mahomet*s garment, carried with him as a holy Relique. But whiles the Christians were now halfe Conquerours, by greedie turning to the spoile, their victorie was wholly lost, and twentie thousand of them slaine, who had slaine threescore thousand Turkes. Master Barton the English Embassadour, was present in the fight and Master Thomas Glouer also, who in a large iournall of this Expedition, testifieth that the Great Turke was in great feare; but being animated by some about him, he tooke his bow and arrowes and slew three Christians therewith. Those former reports he mentioneth not. Not long after, the Bassa of Suda was taken, and the Bassa of Bosna, with some thousands of Turkes slaine, Anno 1599. Yet did not all his losses in the West by the Christians vex the Great Sultan so much, as a rebellion<sup>m</sup> raised in the East, which many yeares continued. Cusabin Bassa of Caramania mantra rose in armes against his Master, and having now done great matters, his soldiers before false to their Prince, became now also false to him: he fleeing, was after taken and tortured to death. His rebellion out-lived him, and was maintained by one, called the Scrinano, who overthrew Mehomet Bassa in the field, and the second time, in the year 1601. overthrew him with his Armie of fiftie thousand, and foraged all the Countrey almost as farre as Aleppo, proclaiming himselfe the defender of the Mahumetan faith, and soone after gaue the Bassa a third ouerthrow. The Turkes Embassadour, sent into Persia to demand the Sophies sonne in hostage, for assurance of the peace betweene those two Monarchs, was for his proud message put to the Bassa, do, & grievously threatened, sent backe to the Grand Signior. The Scrinano's proceedings were much furthered by the dissensions betweene the Janizaries of Aleppo and Damasco: but death stayed him, not his rebellion, which a yonger brother of his prosecuted, against whom Hassan Bassa was sent, but lost himselfe and his Armie. The Rebels besieged Angole, and forced them to giue two hundred thousand duckats to buy their peace. Meane while the Janizaries, after their insolent manner, in a mutinie forced Mahomet to commit the Capi-Aga, one of his greatest Officers, and some others, to whom the successe of these Rebels was imputed, to their cruell execution. The Rebels sacked Burze, one of the chiefe Cities, the Turkes Store-house for his warres, and Treasurie for his reuenues; and the great Shah of Persia had taken Cauerberie also from the Turkes. The Gouvernour of Babylon inclined now also to the Rebels. Mahomet, not able with force to preuaile, by faire meanes sought to winne them, and gaue them their demands, making Zellalie one of their Chieftaines, Bassa of Bosnia. Whereupon his men of warre entered into a resolution, to deprive him of the State, and to inuest therewith Mahomet his eldest sonne: about which an Astrologian being consulted, promised all happie successe: (vnhappy foole, that knew not his owne approaching ruine, which Mahomet executed on him, together with yong Mahomet the Prince, and fiftie other conspirators.)

He set forth a Fleet of Gallies against the King of Fesse; which, having encountered with a tempest, was forced with great losse to retire to their former Port. The chiefe Rebelle making shew he would come into Europe, as Zellalie had done, Mahomet sent certaine Gallies to receiue him, but he receiued them, and possessing himselfe of the Gallies, slew the men, and mocked the Sultan. Hassan a great Bassa, ioyned himselfe also vnto them, about such time as Tauris<sup>n</sup> was againe recovered by the Persian. All these disasters draue Mahomet to his deuotions for refuge, accounting these crosses to be inflicted for his finnes, and therefore appointed publike Prayers in all the Mosques of his dominion, and sent two Priests bare-headed and bare-footed to Mecca, on pilgrimage to pray for him. But that Mahomet either had no eares to heare this, or else was so farre entreated, as to be better acquainted with this great Sultan in the place of his eternall residence, whither (about the year 1593.) Mahomet the Turke<sup>o</sup> was by death soone after sent. His sonne Achmat succeeded; for his eldest was strangled in his sight. He was buried in a faire Chappell, by himselfe, for that purpose built about fiftie foote square, with foure Turrets or Steeples: in the middest is his Sepulchre, in a great Coffin of white Marble: his Turbant at his head, two exceeding great candles of white Waxe, standing (but neuer burning) the one at his head, the other at his feet. The floore is covered with Mattes, and faire Carpets on them. Round about are like Tombes for his wiues and children, but not so great and faire. Diuers such Chappels there are neere to the Temple of Sophia, as of his father Amurath, with his siue and fortie children, entombed about him, and of the other great Sultans, two Selym, Selyman, Baiazet, Mahomet, each hauing a faire Hospitall for the reliefe of the poore adioyning. Some of the great Bassaes imitate the same. No other Turkes are buried in the Cities, but in the fields, with stones laid ouer, or set vpright, fashioned with some resemblance of the head, which beareth ensigne of his dignitie, and whether it be a man or woman, with letters engrauen further to testifie the same.

Achmat set a sure guard about his brother, and to prevent the insolencie of the Janizaries and souldiers, distributed amongst them two millions and a halfe, and being fifteene yeares old, was crowned Emperour. He is said in behauiour and resemblance blance much to resemble Mahomet the Great, first Conquerour of Constantinople. At the same time the warres in Transylvania had procured such famine, that rootes, herbes, leaues of trees were their food: yea, a mother is said to haue brought backe into her wombe (by vnaturall meanes satisfying Nature) her fixe children: two men to eate their mother: others to cut downe malefactors from the gallowes, and eate them. Horses, Dogges, Cats, and such like were rarities to the poore, and dainties beyond their reach. And if the State can be made worse, theeves by robberies, and Souldiers by continuall spoyle, in taking away their goods, adde to their miseries. Cicala Bassa is sent against the Asian Rebels, and receiue an overthrow: the second time he reneweth his forces, with renewing his fortunes, namely, the losse of thirtie thousand of his men. The Persian recouered the countrey of Sirvan, and the Citie of Arusta, with the countrey thereabouts, and all that from the dayes of Solyman had beene taken from them, except two or three places. Hassan Bassa is sent against the Christians in Hungarie, assisted with the Tartars, alwayes ready to helpe the Turkes, both because they are linked in marriages, like in conditions, and that huge Empire, for want of heires male of the Ottomans, is entailed to the Tartar Cham: pay and spoile are no small motiues also to fetch them into these Expeditions. Cicala Bassa is sent against the Persians, but defeated with all his power by the Persian.

In Hungarie they doe more with their money, to maintaine rebellions, then with open force. In the yeare 1605. a tumult arose among the Ianizaries in Constantinople, and five hundred shoppes and ware-houses, with two hundred Iewes, and other persons to whom they belonged, were burnt: the Ianizaries enriched themselves with the spoile. Hungarie is at once vexed with forren and ciuill warres: the mutinous Christians doing more harme then the Turkes, and the people flee into Polonia, or the Mountaines, for refuge. The Rebels take great Townes, yea they spoyle Stiria and Austria. The German name growes odious to the Hungarian. Boissey, chiefe of the Rebels, is assisted by the Turkes, and called Prince of Transylvania; all Hungarie in manner following his ensignes. But the Rebels in Asia, and the Persian exploiters detained the Turkes from making vse of these occasions, else likely to haue swallowed Hungarie and Austria both: yet Pesth was before taken by them, and now Strigoniū. Cicala Bassa is againe ouerthrowne by the Persian, and with three hundred flieth to Adena. The Bassa of Trebezond is sent to succour him, but is discomfited, and almost all his armie slaine. Achmat enraged, causeth Cicala Bassa's house at Constantinople, full of wealth and treasure, to be rifled. Adena is yeelded to the Persian. The Bassaes of Damasco and Aleppo had before fallen out, and taken armes. Damasco had ouerthrowne Aleppo in the field, besieged him, and forced him to composition. Now againe, Aleppo ouerthroweth him, and the Bassaes of Tripolis and Gazara his companions, with their armie of threescore thousand men; tooke Tripolis, the Bassa whereof he againe ouerthrew, and added to his garlands Damasco, the treasure of the Turkes reuenue, and chiefe Citie of Syria. The Beglerbeg of Natolia sent his Lief-tenant with a great armie against him, but to their owne ruine. He intercepted a shippe laden with the tributes of Egypt. The Persian sent him, in token of loue, a present worth fiftie thousand crownes. Achmat is hereby forced to peace with the Christians, and to recall his forces out of Hungarie for this employment. Anno 1606. The Emperour yeeldeth satisfaction to the Discontents in Hungarie, with free vse of Religion to all, and Transylvania to remaine to Boissey and his heires male for ever.

A fire at Constantinople kindled in a Iewes house by the Tartars, burnt many houses and Iewes, and foure millions of goods. Achmat in great magnificence went to his Moschee, to render thanks to Mahomet for a peace concluded with the Emperour. Hee now looketh Eastward with his power, and as Master Henric Lello (in his letter from Constantinople, dated April 2. 1606.) testifieth of him, hee would needes at first bee a souldiour, but the last winter hauing felt the cold windes from the toppes of the hilles in Burfia, which are all the yeare long couered with snow, and receiuing some hurt in his stomack by drinking those cold waters, he proued stomack-sick to his expedition also, and giuing ouer his enterprife against the Rebels, is become one of Venus Knights, therein surmounting his Grand-father Murad or Amurath. An. 1607. he sent the Visier Bassa with an hundred and thirtie thousand against the rebels, who preuaileth more by discreet appeasing of them, then by force. The Bassa of Aleppo three times withstood his whole forces; the fourth time fleeth towards Persia with his treasure. Aleppo is left to be taken, and the Garrison put to the sword: But the Bassa himselfe obtained pardon, with restitution of his goods taken from him in Syria. Another fire arose at Constantinople, and consumed two millions of goods. The Duke of Florence doth much harme to the Turkes by the sea, 1608. The rebels make new commotions in Asia. Matthias the Arch-Duke standeth out with his forces against the Emperour, and commeth with his armie toward Prague, obtaineth the crowne and royalties of Hungarie by composition, comes King to Vienna; but the Protestants refuse to sweare allegiance, till free vse of Religion in Austria by King Matthias was granted. He was crowned at Presburg. And the last yeare 1612. the Emperour Rodolph being dead, he was chosen in his place. Anno 1610. the Persians <sup>a</sup> ouerthrew the Turke in diuers battels, wherein many thousands of them were slaine. This last yeare, 1613. The Turke <sup>b</sup> had prouided a great armie at Adrianople to passe into Transylvania, and his Garrisons began some stirres in Hungarie, and a new warre was there feared: but new occurrents in Asia altered that course. For the people in Natolia rose againe in rebellion, committing spoile and rapine: and in Arabia a certaine Rebell vsurped the title of a King, and gathering together aboue fiftie thousand followers, hath possessed himselfe of Aden, a commodious Citie for the Indian Merchandize, and fully seated for the command of the Red-sea. The Persian King put his Embassadour to death, because he had capitulated with the Turke, that his Master vnder colour of gifts should pay him a yearely tribute: and sent the Turkish Legate, which was sent with the Persian Legate, backe to Constantinople, hauing first cut off his hands, and put out his eyes. Hereby the Turke was forced to employ his forces this way, which he had intended for Transylvania: and by the Bassa of Buda hath promised to keepe peace: hath sent also his Embassadour into Poland with a great present to the King, swearing by his God, his Horse and Sword, to conserue the peace. This yeare also about Aprill was a great fire at Constantinople, which burned two thousand houses: the Merchants meane while labouring to conuey and saue their goods, the Bassa Nassuffensis pretended, that a certaine Merchant of Aleppo (whom vpon that occasion he found there weaponed) intended violence against him, and confiscated his goods (the chiefe cause of the quarrell) which amounted to an hundred thousand Chekins: which I mention, to shew the miserie of Turkish subiection.

Sultan Achmet is now Anno 1613. sixe and twentie yeares old: of good stature, strong and actiue more then any of his Court. He hath three thousand Concubines and Virgins for his lust: his eldest sonne is about eight yeares old: hee is much delighted with pleasures of the field, for which in Græcia and Natolia hee hath fortie thousand Falconers: his Hunt-men are not much fewer. And whereas their Religion binds them once euerie day to practise some Manuall trade, as his father did making of Arrows: This Sultan euerie morning after his deuotions maketh Horne-rings, which they weare on their thumbes for the better drawing of their bowes. Eight thousand persons are alway resident in his Palace. His Officers are the Capi Aga, by whom he speakes to such as haue suites to him; Treasurer of the Household, Cup-bearer, Steward, Overseer of his women, and principall Gardner. These sixe are in great place: he hath Mutes (persons borne deafe and dumbe) which attend him; he hath fiftene hundred gelded men, from whom their priuities are wholly cut, and they make water thorow short quilles of siluer, which to that end they weare on their Turbants. His Visier Bassas, or Priuy-counsellors, whereof there are nine at Constantinople, and were wont to be much fewer, are now thirtie. The rest of them are in their charges, or Beglerbegs places abroad. They sit euerie Saturday, Sunday, Munday, and Tuesday, in the Diuano or Counsel-hall. The Aga is Captain of the Janizaries. The Chiauses are his Pursuants. The Spahi his guard of horse-men. The Janizaries are his best foot-men, who in their child-hood are taken from their parents, rents, and brought vp in all hardnesse, and in the rules of their religion. Then are they put to Schooles, where vnder most seuerer Masters they are taught the vse of diuers weapons; and such as proue fit are enrolled for Ianizaries. Of whom in all are fortie thousand, and about fixteene thousand with their Aga, attend the Grand Seignior his person at Constantinople, where they are employed as Constables, Clearkes of the Market, Warders of the gates, Sergeants for arrests, to guard Embassadors, and other Offices. He hath also in pay others called Topegi, sixe thousand which are Gunners; & twelue thousand Gebegi, which haue charge of the powder and shot in the armies. He hath Seminaries for the trayning vp of those yonglings, the one sort of which are called Isehoglani, whereof are five thousand, which neuer goe out of the Seraglio in fixteene or twentie yeares, neuer see any but their Officers, where they are trayned vp to future seruice. The Gemoglani (who are also tithed children of the Christians) are brought vp with some more libertie, and to base offices of husbandrie and such like, and may also proue Ianizaries. Of these are twentie thousand. The Ianizaries and tithed children, with his Timariots, are the maine pillars of his Empire. His Timariots, which hold land in Fee, to maintaine so many horse-men in his seruice, are in Europe two hundred fiftie seuen thousand; in Asia and Africa, foure hundred sixtie two thousand. Beglerbeg signifieth Lord of Lords; of which were wont to be two; one in Europe, another in Asia: but by Solyman encreased, that though Romania and Natolia haue still the chiefe titles, yet in Europe are foure others; in Asia before these Persian warres, nine and twentie, in Africa foure, in all nine and thirtie, which are as Viceroyes, and haue their Begs or Sanzackes vnder them. His Admirals place is as great by sea. And thus much of Turkish affaires, the summe of the large worke of Master Kneller, whom I principally follow.

CHAP. X.

Of the Opinions holden by the Turkes in their Religion.

How the Turkes from so small beginnings haue aspired to this their present greatnesse you haue seene, bought indeed at a deare price, with their temporall dominions accepting of a spirituall bondage, becoming the Lords of many Countreies, and withall made subiect to those many Mahumetan superstitions. The occasion and chiefe cause of Sects in the Saracenicall deuotions ye haue heard in the fourth and seuenth Chapter: to which we may adde heere out of Bellinus. He saith, that besides the Alcoran, they haue another booke called Zuna, that is, the Way, or Law, or Councell of Mahomet, written after his death by his disciples, but the readings thereof being diuers & corrupt, the Caliph assembled a generall Councell of their Alphachi, or learned men at Damascus, wherein six Commissioners were appointed, namely, Musulin, Bochari, Buborayra, Anneyey, Atermindi, and Dent, to view and examine these bookes, each of which composed a booke, and those sixe bookes were called Zuna; the other copies being two hundred Camels-lading, were drowned in the Riuer; those six only made authentick, esteemed of equall authoritie among the Turkes, with the Alcoran, and after by one of their Diuines contracted into an Epitome; which booke was called the Booke of Flowers. But this Zuna being not Una (one as the Truth is) but full of contrarietie, hence haue arisen sects amongst them; the Turkes differing from other Mahumetan Nations, and diuided also amongst themselves.

Anthony <sup>b</sup> Ménauitius (who liued a long time in the Turkish Court) saith that the booke of their Law is called Musaph, or Curaam, which Georgianitz reckoneth another booke; not the Alcoran, but perhaps some Glosses, or some Extract thereof in Arabian, which they hold vs lawfull to translate into the vulgar. They haue it in such reuerence, that they will not touch it, except they be washed from top to toe: and it is read in their Churches by one with aloud voice; the people giuing deuout attendance without any noise: nor may the Reader hold it beneath his girdle-stedde; and after he hath read it, he kisseth it, and toucheth his eyes with it, and with great solemnitie it is carried into the due place. Out of this booke are deriued eight principall Commandements of their Law. The first is, God is a great God, and one only God, and Mahomet is the Prophet of God: this article of the Unitie (they thinke) maketh against vs, who belecue a Trinitie of Persons: in detestation whereof, they often reiterate these words, hu, hu, hu, that is, he, he, he, is onely God, who is worthie to be praised for their limbe, health, &c. and for that he hath prouided sustenance for euery one fortie yeares before his birth.

The second Commandement is, Obey thy parents, and doe nothing to displeasethem in word or deed: they much feare the curses of their parents. 3. Doe vnto others, as thou wouldest be done vnto. 4. That they repara to the Meschir or Church at the times appointed; of which after. 5. To fast one month of the yeare, called Ramazan or Ramadan. 6. That they giue almes to the poore liberally and freely. 7. To marrie at conuenient age, that they may multiplie the sect of Mahomet. 8. not to kill. Of these Commandements is handled at large in Menanino, and in the booke <sup>a</sup> of the Police of the Turkish Empire, and in others.

Their times of prayer, according to the fourth Precept, are <sup>b</sup> in the morning, called Salanamazzi, before Sunne-rising: the second at noone, called Vlenamazzi. (On the Friday they pray sixe times, resorting to their Church two houres before noone) the third, about three houres before Sunne-set, called Inebindamazzi. The fourth at Sunne set, Afcannamazzi. The fifth, two houres within night, before they goe to sleepe. They which meane to goe to prayer, goe first to the house of office, and there purge their bodie: they wash their priuie parts; and then going thence, wash their hands, their mouth, their nose, their countenance, and their wrists, each of them three times, and after their eares and neckes, saying a certaine Psalm, and then wash their feet to the mid-legge, saying another Psalm: and after all this, with a graue pace, walke to Church; without these washings they hold their prayers vnprofitable. Septemcastrensis saith, That for this cause of washing they cut their nailes, and all their haire; except on their heads and beards (which yet they combe, and bestow curious paines about, that the water may haue free passage to all parts) yea for this cause bee thinketh they obserue Circumcision, that nothing be left couered and vnwashed. They haue three kinds of washings: the first of all the bodie, no part being left free, called Zcoagirmeg, which is necessarie after any pollution. The second is called Tactrin, of the priuities and hinder parts after stoole, vrine, or breaking of winde. The third, Apsan, or Abdas, in the instruments of the five senses, beginning at the hands, from thence the wrists to the elbow; then the mouth and nostrills; then all the face with the eyes; then the eares, and from thence to the feet, which he washeth as high as the ankles. This is not necessarie before euery prayer, except some vncleannesse happen, but may serue for all day.

Their Almes, enioyned in the sixt Commandement, are publike or priuate. Their publike almes is a sacrifice or offering of some beast once euery yeare. For whereas of old they should haue giuen a certaine pension of money to the poore, namely, two in the hundreth: Mahomet vpon their complaint eased this heauie burthen, and conuerted it into this sacrifice. This beast must be cut in peeces, and giuen to the poore: neither must they themselues eate of it, yet may each man eate of his neighbours offering, and this sacrifice ought to be of the fairest and best, Horse, Veale, or Mutton. The place for this sacrifice is called Canaara: where are many Butchers, which cutting the throat thereof, say; In the name of him which hath made heauen and earth, and all things else; this sacrifice be to his honor and worship, and let his infinit bountie accept the same. They vse the like vpon occasion of vowes, if any of their house be sicke. As for their priuate almes, they hold it necessarie: hauing a vaine conceit, that it freeeth them from all imminent miserie, which (they say) together with the almes, turneth from them to the poore man; whence it commeth that the poore are so full of diseases. But for all this charitable Precept, many poore people die amongst them for want of reliefe: and <sup>c</sup> if the poore pay not their head-money to the King yearely, they are beaten, and their women and children sold to pay it.

Marriage ought to be sought (they say) for procreation, not for lust. They which hue vnmarried (after six time, which is about five and twentie yeares of age) are not iust, nor please God. Their Law enioyneth them to performe their mariage-ceremonies, with prayers and prayes, and modest shamefastnesse; and they ought to learne each other to reade, if either partie be ignorant. But their mariage is now farre degenerate from that ancient simplicitie: For if a man like a yong woman, he buyeth her of her father, and then enrolleth her in the Cadies booke; the mariage following with all Bacchanall solempnities. The father giueth only some peeces of household with her, carried openly by particulars thorow the streets. When he disliketh any of his wiues, he selleth them, or giueth them to his men-slaues. They sit not at table with their husbands, but waire and serue them; and then they dine by themselves, admitting no man or mankind with them aboute twelue yeares old. And they neuer goe abroad without leaue, except to the Bath; and on Thursday to weepe at the graues of the dead: They rise to their husbands, and stand while they are in presence; and besides them, come in no companie of men, nor doe they speake with a man or in any part of their bodie are seene of any man; because they thinke sight, especially where beautie or comeliness is, cannot be without sinne. Only the brother may be permitted to see the sister, but not the husbands brother. For this cause that sexe is not suffered to buy and sell, but is closely mewed saue that their law alloweth them to frequent the publike Baths; The wife and concubine differ in the right to a dowrie, which the later wanteth; but the wife must cause the other to be her husbands bed-fellow, when he commandeth, without gain-saying, except on their Sabbath, or Friday night, which is the wiues peculiar. Yet are the Turkes giuen in both sexes to vnnaturall lust (in these times) euen the women in publike Bathes, sometimes are so enflamed in that filthinesse, as is intolerable. Busbequius tells of one woman, which falling in loue with a yong maid, and no way else preuailling, cloathed her selfe in mans apparell, and hiring a house neere, procured the fathers good-will to haue that his daughter in marriage; which being so manifested betweene them, and the truth discovered (which the blacke mantle of night could not couer from Hymenaeus) complaint was made, and the Gouverneur quenched the hot flames of this new Bridegrome, causing her to be drowned for that offence. If the man abuse the wife to vnnaturall lust, she may haue her remedie by diuorice, if she accuse her husband; which modestie forbiddeth to be done in words, and therefore she puts off her shooe, and by inuerting the same, accuseth her husbands peruersenesse. One Master Simons, which liued amongst them, told me, that there are some which keepe Boyes gallantly arrayed, to serue for the worse then beastly lust of such as will hire them. He affirmed also, That they haue this lothsome punishment for that lothsome sinne of whoredome, to take the panch of a beast new killed, and cutting a hole thorow, to thrust the Adulterers head in this dung-waller, and so carrie him in pompe thorow the streets. It is death, either to the bodie by iudiciall sentence, or to the soule by turning Turke, for a Christian to haue carnall dealing with any of their women. A lew which had dealing with a Turkes wife, with her husbands consent, could not escape hanging therefore, (this indeed was a fauour, for hee should haue bene burned) notwithstanding his rich country-men offered two thousand duckats to saue him: Her husband was hanged for his wittoldly permission, and shee her selfe drowned. George Donsa reporteth the like danger, which an Armenian hardly escaped, but for talking with a Turkish woman, both of them being therefore imprisoned, and thence deliuered at a deere rate. He telleth of their Paderastie that they buy Boyes at an hundred, or two hundred duckats, and mew them vp for their filthie lust, till they proue bearded: they will also steale Boyes for that villanie, as hee instanceth of one which came with the Polonian Embassadour so stollen, and neuer could after be heard of.

Murther (prohibited in their eight Commandement) they hold vnpardonable, if it be done wilfully. Often will the Turkes brawle, but neuer in priuate quarels strike one another, for feare of this law, and the severitie of the Magistrate. And if one be found dead in a streete or house, the master of the house, or the Parish, must find out the murderer; otherwise he himselfe shall be accused of it, and the whole Contrado shall be fined, and likewise in case of robberte.

The second is the root of many other finnes. The third is most rife amongst them, and that is the most filthie and unnatural kind of Sodomie; their law to the contrarie notwithstanding. The fourth maketh a man a beast. The fifth shunteth men out of Paradise, and is forth of the rest. Wine is also forbidden them; but yet they will be drunke with it, if they can get their fill of it. And Mahomet the third (Anno 1601.) imputing diueltic solencies of the Janizaries to their excessiue drinking of wine (by the Musties persuasion) commanded on paine of death, all such in Constantinople and Pera, as had wine, to bring it out and stave it (except Embassadors onely) so that the streets ranne chere with. One drinking wine with Buibequius, made great clamors; being asked the cause, he said he did it to warne his soule to flee into some corner of the bodie, or else be quite gone, lest it should be polluted with that sinne. Yet in their Fast or Lent they abstaine very religiously. If it be proued against a Priest, that he hath drunke wine but once, he shall neuer be beleueed as a witness after it. Swines flesh is prohibited too; in abstaining from which they are more obedient; it being vterly abhorred.

mongers.

The Turkes generally hate (saith Septemcastrensis) that lightnes in apparel, speech, gesture, &c. vsed of the Christians, whom for this cause they call Apes and Gnomes. Likewise they are not sumptuous in their priuate buildings. They goe to the warre, as it were to a wedding, esteeming them blessed which are therein slaine. The wiuers and women-servants agree in one house, without iealousie and grudging, they are in their habite and behauiour modest; and, where himselfe dwelt, the father in law had no scene the face of his daughter in law, liuing in the same house with him, in twentie yeares space; so religiously doe they vtilise themselves.

On Friday they pray more deuoutly, but (as the Alcoran also permitteth) they abstaine not from all labour. He saw the grand Signor himselfe goe to their Church, and likewise to the Bath, attended only with two youtnes; none vsing any acclamation to him. And in the Church he prayed on the pavement covered with a Carpet, like to the rest, without any Throne or ensigne of Royaltie. And he obserued the like modestie in his other behauiour.

The Turkes are so zealous in their superstition, that they will rather lose their life then Religion: as among other examples in Seanderbegs time at Dibra, many Turkes chose rather to die Turkes, then to liue Christians; yea some, as it is reported, rather to kill themselves, then to leaue their superstition: and in the yeare 1568. the Persian Embassador was shot at, and one of his followers hurt by a Turke, who being apprehended, confessed that he did it because he was an Heretike, and sent from an Heretike: for which fact he was drawne at an horse-tayle thorow the Citie, and then had his right hand cut off, and after his head. They hate the Persians, as Russian Bassa told Buibequius, more then they doe the Christians: like as the Traditionarie Jew doth the Textuarie, and the Papist the Protestant.

Images they haue in such detestation; that (besides the scratching out the eyes of those in the Musique worke of Saint Sophies Temple) when Solyman overthrew King Lewis of Hungarie, he carried away three Images of cunning worke in Brasse, representing Hercules with his Club, Apollo with his Harpe, Diana with her Bow and Quer, and placed them in the tiltyard at Constantinople: but by the perswasion of the Musis, they were molten into great Ordinance. They haue no Seutchions or blizing of Armes: nay, they vse no scales in their letters or other writings, which seeme to them to savour of superstition, or superfluitie.

When they conquer any Citie, they turne the Temples into Mosques, and sacrifice there. Thus did Solyman at Buda, and Amurath sacrificed sixe hundred captiues to his fathers ghost.

They are moderate in their priuate buildings, and detest the Christians for their excessive and superfluous expences that way: What (say they) doe those Pagans think they shall liue euer? they often lodge (saith Willamont) at the signe of the Moone; and the like moderation they vse in diet and apparell. They haue a brasse pot, and their other meane houshold implements with them in the warres, which they vse in peace.

Readie

They haue the rising of the Sunne in great reuerence; and especially the appearing of the new Moone: as * when Mahomet the great besieged Scodra, the new Moone * Knoll p. 421. beginning to shew her selfe, the Mahometane Priests, going about the Armie, gaue the Souldiers warning thereof, as their manner is; by singing of a Song in manner of a Procession; whereunto the whole Armie answered with a short respond, and at the same time bowing themselves to the ground, saluted the Moone with great superstition.

They may haue twelue lawfull wiues, and as many Concubines as they will (some a Septemcast. say, but foure wiues.) The children of the one are equally legitimate as well as the other, and inherite alike: yet few of them keepe two wiues together in one house: but in severall places where they haue dealings, they haue severall wiues, which they dispose at pleasure.

They tell many things of Antichrist (whom they call Teilscheel) and of the Resurrection, and of the last Iudgement, of Hell, and Purgatorie: And that Mahomet after Iudgement shall deliver all of all Religions from thence. b Leunclau: faith Degual.

They haue no knowledge of liberall Arts, of cases of Conscience, of Originall sinne, or of actually further then the outward act.

Their respects to reliques appeareth by Mahomet c Knoll. the third, 1597. who in the discomfiture of his Armie fled towards Agria, shedding some teares as hee went; and wiping his eyes with a peece of Mahomet's garment, which he carryed about him as a Relique.

The Turkes may neither eate, drinke, nor make water, standing.

In their aduersitie they seeke with earnest prayers to their Prophets; and publike supplications are sometimes decreed. At d Knoll p. 1136 the taking of Alba Regalis, 1601. the Bash of Buda (then prisoner at Vienna) hearing of it, abstayned from meat with his two servants a whole day, prostrate vpon his face, praying vnto his Prophet Mahomet, who hee said had bene angrie all that yeare with the Turkes. They e Busbeq. endure punishments inflicted by the Magistrate with great patience, thinking they shall escape all torment in those parts in the World to come: they therefore reward the whipper, and esteeme the whip (which I enuie not to them) sacred.

They are (but contrarie to the Alcoran) addicted to soceries and dreames: their Priests write them letters or spells, to keepe them from danger and harme of shot, &c. called Haymayty. They will write any thing for monie, as letters of freedome for servants to runne away from their Masters; and such like. They make a shew of holiness, but are closely wicked, ignorant of their owne law (to couer which, they answered in darke sentences) and the people much more. Nothing is sinne, to count of, but that which endamageth ciuill societie. f Septemcast.

They esteeme for good workes, & the buildings and endowings of Hospitals, making Bridges and high-waies, digging of pits, and wells, and conueying waters to high-waies and Cities, building Bathes, and founding of Churches, and such like publike workes. Roslan g Their good Workes. Bassa left his wife, the Daughter of Soliman, at his death fiftene millions of gold, and shee had of yearely reuenue halfe a million: shee, amongst other her workes, strempted one most famous, which was a conduit to conuey water, for the vse of the Pilgrims betwixt Cairo and Mecca, fortie dayes journey; and for the same intent procured the Sultan Selym her brother, to write to the Venetians for a licence to extract out of Italie an hundred thousand pound of Steele, only to make Chissells, Hammers, and Mattocks, for the cutting of certaine rocks, by which this water must passe. h M. Harborn.

Their i Their oathes and vowes. Oathes (especially of their Emperors) are of many cuts, and varietie of fashion. And for vowes; in necessities and dangers, they will promise vnto God the sacrifices of beasts in some holy places, not vpon Altars, but k Andr. A. i. nabene. having flaid off the skinne, they giue it with the head, feete, and fourth part of the flesh to the Priest; another part to the Poore; the third to the Neighbours; the fourth is for the Guests.

They are so addicted to the opinion of Fate, that God is esteemed to blesse whatsoever soever hath successe, as namely, Salim murdering his Father; and to detest what waiteth good event, whatsoever ground it had. They feare not the Plague, accounting every mans time limited by Fate, and therefore will wipe their faces with the cloathes of such as have dyed thereof.

Arab. ep. 3. & 4.

They hold it alike acceptable to God, to offer almes to beasts, and to bestow iron men, when it is offered for the love of God. Some there are, which will redeeme bind, imprisoned in their cages or coupes, and having paid their price, let them live. Others (for the love of God) cast bread into the water to feede the fishes, esteeming it a worke greatly meritorious; but Dogges are accounted uncleane, in stead whereof they delight in Cats, following (they say) their Prophet Mahomet, who falling asleepe at table, and awaking to goe to his deuotions, rather cut off his sleeue, whereon he found his Cat fast asleepe, then he would disturbe her. Master Simon told me that he hath seene them at Cairo feede dogs with baskets of bread, one standing by with a club to keepe them from fighting; and one gave almes for a Bitch which had Whelps vnder a stall. Herein perhaps (as in other things) the Egyptians are more superstitious then the Turkes, especially in this of Dogs which sauiours of their old Anubis and dog-worshipping.

They say Moses was the first great Prophet, to whom was given the booke Torah, that is, the Law, and they which obserued it in those times were saued. But when men grew corrupt, God gaue Dauid the booke Czabur, or the Psalter: and when this preailed not, Iesus was sent with the Booke Ingil, or the Gospels, whereby in that time men were saued. Lastly, Mahomet receiued his Alcoran, and all the former were disannulled. This Law and Law-giuer is so sacred to them, that in all their prayers, euen from their mothers breasts, they obserue this forme: La illah, illelah Mahomet irresullallah tanre virpegamber hacc: That is, there is no God but one, and Mahomet his Prophet: one Creator, and more Prophets. This they suck in with their milke, and in their first learning to speake lisse out this deuotion. The infants go with the rest to their Mosques or Meschits, but are not tied to other ceremonies, sauing washing, till they are circumcised. Euery man hath (in their opinion) from his birth to his death two Angels attending him; the one at his right hand, the other at his left. At foure or five year old they send him to the Schoole to learne the Curaam, and the first words which their Masters teach them are to this sense, God is one, and is not containd in any place, but is through all, and hath neither father nor mother nor children, eateth not, nor drinketh, nor sleepeth, and nothing is like to him. The two Angels before said, are called Chiramim and Chrasitum, which write the good or euill that men doe against the day of Iudgement. The Turkes & abhorre blasphemie not only against God and Mahomet, but also against Christ and the Virgin Marie; and other Saints: and they punish blasphemers of whatsoever Sect: they account it a sinne for a man to build a house which shall last longer then a mans life: and therefore howsoever they are sumptuous and magnificent in their publike buildings, yet are there priuate dwellings very homely, and ill contriued. They eate much Opium, thinking it maketh them courageous in the warres. They have a remedie for paine in the head or elsewhere, to burne the part affected with the touch-boxe (which they alway carry with them) or with some linnen cloth whereby they haue many markes on their foreheads and temples, witnesses of their needlesse and heedlesse respect to Physicians.

As the Scripture containeth some Prophecies of the arising and proceedings of the Turkish Nation, the rod of God, whereby hee scourgeth his Christian people; so haue they also prophecies amongst themselves of their end and ruine, when God in his mercy to Christians shall execute iustice vpon the Turkes, and cast the rod into the fire, wherewith he had chastised his children. Such an one is that which Georgiowitz translateth and expoundeth: and such is that which Leunclavius hath transcribed out of their Booke called Messabli, wherein is written that Constantinople shall beer with taken before Degual Lain, that is, the cursed Antichrist, shall come; once by the Sword, another time by the force of the prayers of the sonnes of Isabae. Lain is an Epithete which they giue to Degual, signifying wicked or mischieuous. Of the Religious places amongst the Turkes: their Meschits, Hospitalls, and Monasteries: with their Liturgie and Circumcision.

THe places <sup>a</sup> of most Religion to the Turkes abroad are those which Mahumet himselfe polluted with his irreligion: as Mecca, Medina, &c. The places of most Religion amongst themselves are their Mosches, or Meschits: that is, their Temples and Houses of prayer, (whereof they haue many in all Turkie) and next thereunto their Hospitalls for the reliefe of the poore, impotent, and Pilgrims. Neither are the Turkes sparing in these or the like (seeming) charitable expences. For when a Turke falleth sick, and thinketh he shall thereof die, hee sends for his friends and kinsfolkes, and in their presence maketh his Testament: the greatest Legacies whereof are bequeathed to publike vses, which they thinke will be meritorious to their soules.

Empire,

Such are the making and repaying of Bridges, Causeyes, Conduits to conuey waters to their Hospitalls or Temples. Some also giue to the Redemption of Captiues. Many of their Women (the deuouter Sexe, whether in Religion or superstition) bequeath monie to bee distributed amongst such Souldiers as haue slaine any certayne number of Christians: a deede in their conceit very religious. These are the wills and deedes of the inferiour sort. But the Emperours, and great Bassaes, appoint Legacies to expresse a greater magnificence with their deuotion, as the building of Temples and Hospitalls.

Their Temples or Meschites are for the most part foure square, not much vnlike to our Churches, but larger in length then breadth. The Temple of Saint Sophie in Constantinople is of all other in the Turke Dominion the most admirable, built long since by Iustinian, and (by Mahumet the Conquerour) peruered to this Mahumetan vse about nine hundred yeares after. Of this Temple they write; <sup>a</sup> that it was first built by Constantinus, sonne of Constantine the Great, with a rooofe of Timber: and burnt by the Arians in the time of Great Theodosius, who againe repayed it. Saxamennus <sup>b</sup> saith, that in the broiles which hapned not long after in the raigne of Arcadius and Honorius about Chrysostome, the Church was fired, his enemies ascribing it to his partakers, and they againe to his Adversaries. It is reported that Theodosius Junior rebuilt it. But in the time of Iustinian, Procopius <sup>c</sup> testifieth, that base and wicked men burnt it againe, which Iustinian built a-new in such sumptuous and magnificent sort, that in regard of his change it might have been wished that it had perished long before. His chief workmen were Anthemius, and Isidorus, who raised it into a most goodly frame, which might amaze the beholders, and seeme incredible to the hearers. Both hee and Emagrins recite the particulars. The length was two hundred and threescore feet: the breadth one hundred and fiftene: the height a hundred and fourescore. Zonaras, Agathias, and Georgius Cedrinus, tell of the harmes it receiued by Earthquakes, when Iustinian liued; which yet he repaired, as did Basilius and Andronicus after him. Nicophorus saith, that Constantine raised the Temple of Peace (which before was but small) to that large and stately greatnesse, which in his dayes it retayned: and his sonne Constantinus finished the Temple of Sophia so neare it, that they seemed to haue but one wall. It was founded by Constantine his father: and was burnt in a sedition of the people, in the raigne of Iustinian, in which rebellion thirtie thousand of the people were slaine, and partly to pacifie the wrath of God (saith he) for so great a slaughter, he built this Temple. From the side of the Temple he tooke foure hundred twentie and seven pillars on an Image of Heathen Gods, and of twelue signes of the Zodiacke: and fourescore statues of Christian Emperors, which hee distributed in the Citie. But more then enough of the ancient structure thereof.

As it is at this day, diuers haue described it: but of them all most diligently, Pennus Gyllius. The walls and roofes thereof are of brick, the inner part lined with marble most excellent, and of diuers sorts, the rooffe is set with stones, and peeces of glasse gilded: Nature and Arte conspiring to breede the beholders both pleasure and wonder. It is so composed, and the Pillars and Arches so placed, that the middle Ile within (considered by it selfe) seemes like the forme of an Egge, long and round: but the whole fabrick both within and without, yeeldeth to the curious obseruer a square forme. All the inner part hath Arches, (in the top open to receiue light) which are sustained with marble Pillars of diuers colours, and there are, saith Bellonius, (if one may say it) many doores in that Temple, as are dayes in the yeare. It is farre more admirable then the Roman Pantheon: The worke of that being grosse, solid, and easie for a workman to conceiue. But this Sophian Temple is more subtile to the view of the eye and minde. It hath two rowes of Pillars each ouer other, those vpper ones supporting the hemisphere, loouer, or steeple, which is wrought all with Musaick worke, garnished with gold and azure. The doores or gates are couered with fine Laiten of Corinth: one of which (they imagine) was made of the woorde of Noahs Arke. And therefore there are in it three places left vncovered for the deuout people to kisse, for the pardon of their sinnes. It had sometimes about three hundred thousand Ducats of yearly reuenue. The Turkes, when they turkeified it, threw downe the Altars, turned the Bells into great Ordinance, and either tooke away the Images, or put out their eyes, for (say they) God, and not walls and pictures, is to be adored. Nicolas & Nicalai saith, that it had in compasse more then a mile, within which were comprehended the houses of Canons & Priests: of the most part of the Cloister (because it was neare the Serail) they made a stable for Horses; as Constantines Palace for Elephants; and a Temple (neare the Tilt-yard, or Hippodromus) for wilde beasts, which are tyed to the second pillars thereof, Lyons, Beares, Wolves, wilde Asses, Ounces, &c. No Christian may enter into this Meschit, but he may put his body in at the doores and view it: But M. Simons saith, they are not now so scrupulous: for he hath bene suffered to goe in: G. Doufa also reporteth of himselfe. There haue bene at once, in the time of Raisa, numbred thirtie and six thousand Turkes assembled for deuotion at an Easter-solennitie. It had in Iustinians time Porches or Galleries on both sides, one of which seemeth fel by some earthquake. The innumerable windowes and vnspeakable ornaments of the Temple would easily detayne our pen as a willing prisoner in the relation thereof. But besides the ancient, P. Gillius, Menauinus, Bellonius, Nicolas, Doufa, and many others haue done it already: neither will my Pilgrimage suffer mee to stay long in one place, which am to visit so many, both here and elsewhere in the World. Let vs proceede therefore to their other Temples: especially seeing this is such that none is able to expresse the excellencie, nor could euer worthily expresse the least part thereof. Hee besides what others haue reported, telleth of a marble pilier therein which continually sweates forth a certaine liquor, which the Turkes wipe off with their hand-kerchiefes, as (in their opinion) profitable against diuers diseases.

Mahomet the conquerour <sup>a</sup> built one in like fashion without any figures, which hath about an hundred houses covered with Lead for their Doctors and Priests, and for all strangers and pilgrims of any Nation or Religion, where they may refresh themselves, their seruants, and horses for three dayes, with meat and lodging at free cost. There are also without the precinct of the Mosche an hundred and fiftie other Tenements for the poore of the Citie, which haue there an asper a day, and as much bread as they need: but they account that kind of life so vnhappy, that oftentimes those Tenements stand emptie: but the money which should this way be bestowed, is sent to the Hospitals of the diseased. There are also fise other Meschits, in forme resembling the former, but not so great nor so rich. The rest <sup>b</sup> of the Meschits are of diuers sorts, some high, some low, of seuerall fashions. The Turrets, vpon which their Priests call the people to prayers, are of a great height, made in manner of watch-towers; their greater Churches hauing two, the lesser one of them. Vpon the tops is set an halfe Moone or Crescent, which is the Turkes ensigne, as the Crosse is vsuall to the Christians. Within their Temples they haue no kinde of ornaments, but bare walles, with Arabian Letters (some in gold) written thereon, saue onely their bookes, and Lampes burning with oyle in great abundance, and cloathes of Tapestry, on the which being spread ouer matters vpon the pauement, they prostrate themselves in prayer time. Their Hospitals they call Imarets; of these there are great vse, because they want Innes in the Turkes dominions. They found them for the reliefe of the poore, and of Trauellers, where they haue food allowed them (differing according to the vse of the place) and lodging places, without beds. They are open for the most part to all men of all religions. The chiefe Hospitals in Turkie, are in Constantinople: two of which Mahomet and Baiazet his sonne founded. Both these haue about fise and twentie round Turrets covered with Lead; one of which, being in the midst of the other, is larger and greater then the rest, and vnder are lodgings for the Priests: On one side are beds for Pilgrims and Trauellers, on the other for Lepers. Thride a day may any man resort thither into a certaine place for meat. There are maintained fourteene Doctors of their Law. Some say that the reuenues of *Mahomet*s Hospitall amount to an hundred and fiftethousand ducats, and the other as much or more. Each of which hath a little Chappell adioyning, in which the Founders are buried; who were at this great charge, that the Priests and such as are there refreshed should pray for their soules, and say, Alla Rehsmetile son: that is, God haue mercie on them. Selim finished that which Baiazet his father had begunne to build. But his sonne Soliman erected one farre surpassing the former. Orchanes was the first of these Ottoman Princes which founded Monasteries. Mahomet the first finished <sup>c</sup> the great Temple at Hadrianople, the seat Royall of the Turkes in Europe before Constantinople was wonne. He built also, besides a Palace, another Temple with a most sumptuous Abbey, and a publike Schoole adioyning, endowing the same with great reuenues. He also gaue great summes of money to be distributed yearly at Mecca and Medina, for the reliefe of poore Pilgrims, <sup>d</sup> Soliman erected, in memoriall of Mahomet his eldest sonne, a stately Tombe, a sumptuous Church, a Monasterie and Colledge, with other things for the health of his soule. He was buried himselfe in a Chappell which he had in his life-time built most stately with a Colledge and Hospitall, and his wife Roxolana, and some of his murdered children lying intombed by him: his Scimatar also hanging by him, in token that he died in warres, which honor they grant not otherwise to their Princes. The reuenues of the countrey about Sigeth in Hungarie (lately wonne from the Christians) were given to the maintenance of those houses which his deuotion had founded. Neither is it lawfull for them to conuert any Lands to such sacred vses, except they haue first with their owne sword wonne them from the enemies of their religion; the most acceptable service to their Prophet. And therefore Selim the second, sonne and successour of Soliman, intending to build a magnificent Temple, and munificent Colledge, Monasterie and Almes-house at Hadrianople, where he intended his Sepulchre, brake his league with the Venetians, and wan Cyprus from them, that thence he might endow the same with maintenance. But it were tedious to insist further in declaring their expences, which deuotion in all Turkie hath procured: their Emperours and Bassa's esteeming nothing of more honor in the world, or merit for heauen. Let vs come to their Church-rites and ceremonies.

The Temples in Turkie are (as hath beene said) innumerable, both publike, and priuate of meaner buildings: on which is a Tower, as with vs a Steeple, whereupon the * Muezzin or Thalisman ascendeth: and it being open with pillars or foure windowes, first he goeth to that on the East-side, and calleth the people to prayer with a loude voice, stopping his eares with his hands, crying: There is no God but one, and Mahumet his Messenger: come to make prayer for remission of your sinnes, and know that there is no stronger then the God of Mahumet his messenger. This he saith in order on euery side of the steeple. If there be in the Citie many Moschees, the Cathedrall beginneth, and then all the other Parishionall follow. This they doe five times a day, and on Friday their Sabbath sixe times. First at sunne rising with four bendings to the earth, and twice praying. The second, about noone with ten bowings, and five prayings: the third, at afternoone before sunne-set, with eight inclinations and foure prayings. The fourth, with five bendings and three prayings about sunne-set. The fifth, longer then the rest, with fiftene bowings, and eight prayings. This bending or bowing they call Erket, which is a doubled bowing with prostrating himselfe: their prayer they call Czalamet; which they make sitting after euery Erket with a salutation on the right hand and on the left, and the impressiō or signe of peace, which is done with bringing both hands ouer the face. Euery Buzurman is bound in resort to these their Liturgies at his Parishionall Meschite, except he haue some lawfull impediment: and if not at all of them, yet at least at one to be well washed, for which purpose they haue innumerable Bathes in Turkie stately built: nor may any enter into the Temple, especially in the morning, but first well washed in the Bathe, as is said before: and if he keepeth him cleane the rest of the day, that washing will serue: but if he haue committed any carnall sinne, or be any way soiled, or haue eaten any vnclene thing, then in some secret place he washeth his hands and armes to the elbow, his hinder parts <sup>b</sup> and priuities, and this sufficeth without going to Bathe, except he be otherwise polluted. For defect herein they haue inquisitions, and appointed penalties: respect or pardon being giuen to none that faile, especially on Friday, and in their Lent: such a one is carried about the Towne with a boord fastened to his neck, all be-hanged with Foxe-tailes, besides a penaltie according to his state in monie: and hee that will not thus order himselfe, shall not be allowed their buriall rites. After they are thus washed, they put off their shooes in imitation of Moses, and then enter into the Meschita, where the floore is couered with Mats or Carpets, nor is any other thing seene but white walls, and great store of burning Lamps, and in golden Arabian letters these <sup>c</sup> wordes before mentioned.

There is a Pulpit on which the Choza or Foequi ascendeth, and the first thing he doth is to stretch out his hands at large, and then ioyning them together he kneeleth and kisseth the ground: then hee litterh vp his head, and stopping his eares with his hands standing a good space as it were <sup>e</sup> distracted or rauished in his prayers, after lifting vp his hands, he againe kisseth the ground so many times as the houre of prayer according to that former rule requireth: and then lifting vp himselfe againe, he stretcheth out his hands againe, so standing about a quarter of an houre, and againe kneeling with his mouth to the ground, so continueth mouing it euery way about a Pater-noster while, and then lifting vp his head, and setting his hands to his eares, falls to his praying another quarter of an houre, and then licenseth the people to depart. There is no noise heard <sup>d</sup> as if there had beene nothing within. Not so religious is their counte (and yet that religion admits it) which Martin Braidenbach reporteth to be practised by them in a Moschee on Mount Sinai where Moses receiued the Law: which the Saracens vse to get therein Prophets, thinking the issue there gotten is holy, and full of the Prophetical spirit.

Menavino thus describeth their rites. After their mysticall washing (as before) they goe with a sober pace to the Meschit (not like one which runneth away) and if he happen to breake winde by the way, his former washing is vn sufficient and he must returne to renew it. Being assembled in the Meschit, they all turne their faces Southwards, and the Meizin or Muelden, (Clarke, Sexton, Priest, Bell-ringer, or Bell-rather) standeth vp and readeth that Psalm which before he had cryed to them in the steeple, and euery one standeth vp holding his hands fastened to his waste, and bow their heads to their feet with great reuerence and without stirring. Then ariseth another Priest of another order called Imam, and readeth a Psalm aloud, the Meizin as his Clarke answering, which being ended they fall on the ground and say, Saban alla, Saban alla, Saban alla, that is, God haue mercie on vs most wretched sinners, abiding prostrate till the Priest Imam singeth againe his Psalm, and then they rise. And this they doe foure or fve times according to the order of their seruice. After this they all kneele and prostrate themselves on the ground, the Meizin obseruing a long ceremony, in which with a loude voice he prayeth God to inspire the Christians, Jewes, Greekes, and generally all Infidels to turne to their Law. This being said, euery man lieth his hand to heauen, crying aloud, Amin, Amin: and then they touch their eyes, or wipe them with their hands; (which is, as crossing among the Papists, a blessing themselves) bringing their hands ouer their face, and so they depart. In the English Treatise of the Turkish Politie these things are related, with some other ceremonies: as that they say together with the Priest the first Azara or chapter of the Alcoran &c. Barholomaeus & Georgiouitz saith, that only the chiefe sort are bound to assemble to the daily deuotions which they obserue fve times a day; others which cannot spare the times are not tyed. On their Sabbaths it is otherwise.

The women enter not their Mesquitas but on Fridayes at nine a clock, or at Easter, and then they are in a Gallerie or Terasse apart, where they may see and not be seene, and this is not common to all; but the Wiues and Mothers of the chiefe of the place. And as we haue said of the Priest: so it is to be vnderstood that all the Men and Women there doe the same without failing in any point. They suffer not a Christian to enter therein: and yet will they enter into the Churches of the Christians to heare the Church-musick. The women abide in their Churches from nine of the clock to midnight, continually praying with certaine motions & strange cries, continuing so long in this act, that they fall vpon the ground as in a swoone through wearinesse: and if any feele her selfe at that time to be with child, the Turkes hold that they are conceived by the holy Ghost, and presently vow that child to God, and call such Nefes Oghl, that is, soones of the holy Ghost. And on Friday at nine of the clock the Priest vseth to preach to the people: and these their discourses last about two houres. That which is said is not very manifest, yet they say that he preacheth the miracles of Mahomet, sometime exalting their faith, sometime commending obedience, and sometime rehearsing fabulous tales to terrifie the bad, as that such mens soules are carried of certaine Carrels (there being some sixe thousand flying about in the ayre for this purpose) into the Sepulchres of wicked Christians, and that the good Christians are put in their emptie Sepulchres, inueighing against the blasphemers of Mahomet, Christ and the Saints; exhorting to almes, rehearsing their commandments of the law. And if they preach scandalous doctrine, the Musli and the Cadilescher deprive them, & correct them as here-hereticks; yea, some of them, for preferring Christ before Mahomet, are put to death; of which one Ibraim Sebec a Priest of Constantinople (reported to haue wrought miracles amongst the Turkes in the daies of Soliman) was stoned to death, his head cut off, and his bodie burned; and of his Disciples some were beheaded, others thrust into the Gallies for preferring Christ, and denying Mahomet. And were it not for the terror of the sword there would be more innovations of religion: and some haue perswaded the Grand Signior, not to suffer the Alcoran to be so common to be read & interpreted of euery one; guilty of the absurdities therein contained. But to returne. After this preaching ended, two young Clarke goe vp to him, & sing certaine prayers, which ended, the Priest againe beginneth to sing, with the people in a base voyce, with wingling euertie way for the space of halfe an houre, saying nothing but Lillallah, illallah; that is, there is but one God. And these ceremonies are done only on their Lenten Fridayes. Their Lent is one Moone or moneth in the year, which, if this year it be Iuly, the next it shalbe Aug.

gust, & so in order: that in twelve years they have fasted all times of the yeare, making no other difference of meats then at other times, but eating only in the night. They prepare themselves by diminishing their fare (not as the Christians at Shroue-tide) that they may the better endure it: for on the day, in which they fast, they will not so much as taste a cup of water, or wash their mouches therewith, till the starres appeare. And eight or ten dayes after it beginneth, some Officers ride about the Towne, crying; Such a day beginneth the Fast, prepare yee, prepare yee; and when it is begun, the Cadi and Subassi, if they finde any shops open, or any body eating in the day, sit him on an Asse backwards, with the taile in his hand, as Adulterers are punished. Neither will they suffer Jewes or Christians to scandalise their Turkes this way. And when their Lent is neare the end, they goe all to the Bashes and pluck off all their haire, but of the head and beard, with an ointment for that purpose: they colour their nails and with an enduring colour called Chua, with which they die also the taitles and fens of their horses; and the women their hands, feet, and priuile parts. This they doe in honour of their solemnity, which lasteth three daies with great feasting, in which nothing else but meates and drinke may be sold. They goe to the Sepulchres of the dead there to cate, full of gladnesse, and salute each other, saying; Baaram glusicezung, that is, God giue you a good Feast: and if they meete with a Jew or a Christian, welcome them. The Turkes keepe another Easter, especially in Mecca, more solemnly then the Tartars, Moores, and Arabians, then to the Turkes, except the Pilgrims, which relate shither. The Turkes say they are <sup>d</sup> circumcised, because they are the sonnes of Ismail, and because they may be cleane when they goe to their Temples, no filth lying hid under the skiane. At seuen or eight yeares of age, or later, this ceremonie is performed. The first thing they doe, is, to inuite many thither, both Turkes, Jewes, and Christians, besides the friends and kinred, to make the greater gaine, every one giuing somewhat according to his abilitie. When the day is come, they which are inuited mount on horse-back, for else it is <sup>e</sup> no solemnitie, and goe to the house of the child, who being mounted on a faire horse richly clothed with a great Tullipant on his head; is carried to Church with a long speare borne before him, hauing a torch on the top with a crowne, more or lesse, according to the state of the partie, adorned with Roses and Garlands, which with the speare is left a gift to the Church, the fees of the Priest: all the way they sound on instruments: after the sonne followeth the father, the kinred, and the rest of the friends, that sometimes there are a hundred horse; at Church they sing and accompanie the child to the Priest, which waiteth for them. Here one of the friends sitteth downe, and on his lap the child is set: presently another pulleth off his shoes, another holdeth his hands, and others his feet, and many hold him in talk with wordes, and these are the Gossips. The Priest seeing all things ready, taketh the end of the skinne of his yard, and draweth it out, and nipeth it with silver Pinsew, to mortifie it, and cut it off with lesse paine: then making him beleue he will desire it till the next day, he riseth, the other holding him fast: and after, as if he had forgot somewhat to be done about it, with fizzers, which he holdeth closely in his hand, suddenly cutteth it off, and another layeth thereon a certaine powder to ease the paine, and in five and twentie daies they looke to the curing of it, laying on it salt and marro-lade of Quinces, and thence forwards he is called a Musulman. But his name is not then giuen him, but at his birth, and that according to their qualitie.

After the child is loosed, who to shew himselfe of courage, smileth, and lifting vp his greatest finger saith those former words of their profession, and is againe mounted, and all the companie, after a little prayer and offering at the Church, with little pompe conueigh him home, where is great feasting prouision; some feast it three dayes together.

Amurath circumcised his sonne Mahomet at sixteene yeares old. Vnto which solemnitie many Christian Princes were solemnly inuited, who sent thither their Ambassadors with presents, who had there their scaffolds prepared for them, and furnished according to their states. The solemnitie lasted fortie dayes, and fortie nights, in the great Market-place of Constantinople. And to end these <sup>e</sup> solemnities, Mahomet the Prince was circumcised, not publikely, but in his fathers chamber, by Mechmet one of the inferior Bassas, sometime the Emperour Solymans Barber. And it is done of other Turkes also most commonly in the fathers house, not in the Church.

The Women-children about the same age among other women without other solemnitie, say ouer those wordes, Lailah, &c. and likewise the renegado-Iewes; but the Christian renegadoes are carried about the streets of the Cities, with much solemnitie, and many gifts given them, besides freedome from tribute: many blinded by conuetsnesse offer themselues to this circumcision. But if any for blasphemie against Mabomes, or iniurie to a Turke, bee by force circumcised, they haue no such gifts: which punishment the Cadilescher (by the testimonie of two accusing Turkes) inflicteth. And therefore to preuent the same, the Christians obtayne the grand Seignours safe-conduct, that in cases of conscience they may not be iudged of any, except they were accused at the Court before the foure Bassas, and the Cadilescher of Constantinople, and that by the witnesse of Priests only which had not in twelue yeares drunke wine.

CHAP. XII.

Of the Sepulchres, Funerall-rites, and opinions touching the dead, among the Turkes.

NOW, if you be wearie of viewing their Temples, and their prayers, and other ceremonies seeme tedious, I haue thought fit to present you with another sight, and to conclude with (that which is the conclusion of all flesh) a discourse of their Funeralls. When a Turke is sick and like to die, his friends visit him, and putting him in minde of his sinnes, aduise him with a penitent heart to bewaile them. Then doe certaine of their Priests, or one of his kinsmen, reade some Psalmes and Prayers. And if the pangs of death doe still continue, they bring him the Alcoran, or Curaam, wherein is one Legend called Thebara Echelezi, which they reade seuen times: and if hee shall die of that sicknesse, they thinke hee will die before they haue thrice read it: and if they see breath still remaine, they reade another Psalm called Iafinnel Curanis Hen, to the end that the Deuill cause no impediment to his soule. When he is dead, they lay him forth in the midst of the house vpon Carpets, and place him on his right side, with his face toward the South. Then doe assemble certaine Priests to burie him, who bring with them a string of Beades (such as the Papists vse in mumbling and numbering their deuotions) being a thousand of them, of lignum aloes, and therewith compass the body, and then say to euery one Subahan Alla, that is, God haue mercie on him, and turne it about foure or fve times. After this, their Priests (which are twenty or more) carrie the corps into the Garden, and lay it on a Table two hands breadth from the ground, taking away his shirt, and couering his shame with a new cloth made of fine bombast, with warme water and sope wash him from top to toe: then doe they take two sheets of bombast, in which they wrap the corps, wetting the same with rose-water, perfumes, and odoriferous things, and laying him on the Beere, couer him quite ouer with his best garments, placing his turbant at the head thereof, all bedecked with floures. Then doe the Priests beginne their deuotions, and some of the companie take vp the Beere, carrying the same with the head forwards to the Meschits: the kinsmen follow, and the women remaine at home weeping, and make readie to care for the Priests. When they come to the Church, they set him downe without doores, and goe and make an end of their seruice. After that, they carrie him forth of the Citie to the buriall place: (for it is not lawfull to burie in their Cities) some prouide their Sepulchres in their life time, some haue them made after by their friends, either in their Gardens, or some solitarie place: They haue also common buriall places, as are our Church-yards, wherein are many Tombes of marble, brick, or other matter, according to the qualitie of the person.

b If it be a woman which is dead, the women take this care & paines about it, to lay her forth, &c.

If the deceased were a man of high condition, his horses are led with his corps, and his Tombe is adorned with many Epitaphs. And if he were a great Commander, these horses are saddled the contrarie way, and richly furnished, hauing certaine things hanged at their noses which cause them to neigh, as it were lamenting the losse of their Master. They carry also the truncheons of their Lances with their Standards and Ensignes, trailing along the ground. There are planted also about their Sepulchres violets and other pleasant floures. The common sort haue their Tombes of marble engrauen with letters.

When they are come to the place, with those sheets they let it into the graue, covering him on every side with boordes, only on the face they lay a little earth, and then leaue him, and returne home, where they finde store of cheare, and there make a prayer for his soule. * Georgianiz faith, that they make ouer the graue the forme of an Altar, lest the beasts should goe ouer it, and defile it. They also often repaire thither with teares, and set on the monument flesh, bread, wheate, eggs, milke, &c. which is done for the dead mans soule in almes to the poore, or to the birds, or ants, which they also account an act of mercie, no lesse meritorious then the other. The Priests haue fire aspers a peece giuen them for their paines. And if the partie be poore, they gather moneie, to pay the Priests, and to discharge the funeralls. They weare blacks eight dayes in token of mourning: and those that are of great account, three dayes: at which time the friends of the dead assemble, and vsing some wordes of mutuall consolation, from thenceforth resume their wonted habite. Howbeit their kindred, specially of the male sexe, often repaire to the graues to lament there. Belonius in his Observat. observes, that they sew not the sheet at the head nor at the feet. The reason is, this dreame of certaine Angells, sent in commission presently after the buriall, to examine the deceased partie, into whom they say God hath then put a new spirit. These Angells Menavino calls Nechir and Remanchir, who come with dreadfull countenances and burning fire-brands, and examine him of his life, which if they finde wicked, they scourge him with fierie whips, if good, they become goodly Angells, and comfort him. Belonius a little otherwise telleth, that those Angells (which he calleth Gumquir and Mongir) come, the one with an yron hammer, the other with a hooke, which set the corps vpon his knees, and put a new soule into it; and then aske if he haue believed Mahumet and obserued his precepts, if he haue done good workes, kept their Lent, paid his Tithes, giuen almes. Of which, if hee can giue good account, they depart from him, and two other Angells come in their places, white as snow, and one of them puts his armes, in stead of a pillow, vnder his head, the other sits at his feet, and defends him vntill the day of iudgement. But if hee satisfie not the demands of those black Angells, hee with the yron mallet strikes him at one blow therewith into fadome vnder the ground: and neither of them ceaseth, the one with his hammer, the other with his hooke, to torment the deceased partie vntill the day of iudgement. For this cause the Turkes write vpon their dead carkasses the name Croco, and make their Sepulchres hollow, that they may haue roome to kneele, and some lay boordes out, that no earth fall in. The feare hereof makes them in their morning prayer to say, Lord God, from the questioning of the two Angells, the torment of the graue, and the euill iournie, deliuer me, Amin. Yea, hence are the prayers which the Turkes, Men and Women, say at the graues of the dead, for deliuerie from these Angells.

Concerning the day of iudgement, they hold that there is an Angell standing in Heauen named Israphil, holding alway a Trumpet in his hand prepared against Gods command, to sound the consummation of the World. For at the sound thereof, all Men and Angells shall die, for so they finde it written in their Curaam, which Booke is of high authoritie with them. The Turkish Doctors would dissent from that opinion of the Angells mortalitie, if this Booke would giue them leave: for to contradict the authoritie thereof is punished with fire, or else their Tongues are pulled out of their heads. They hold, that after this dismall sound shall be a great Earthquake, which shall tumble Mountaynes and Rocks from their places, and grinde them to meale. After this, God will returne to make anew the light, and the Angells as before, and will cause to fall a pleasant raine called Rehemet sui, that is, the raine of mercie: and so shall the earth remaine fortie dayes, although those dayes shall be of a larger size then these. Many also holde, that from thenceforth there shall be no darknesse of the night, as now, but that it shall be most cleare; neyther shall there need any more sleepe for the sustentation of our bodies.

After fortie dayes God will command Iſraphel to sound his Trumpet the second time, at which sound all the dead shall be raised againe by the will of God, the dead even from Abel to the end of the world, throughout all the earth, hearing the sound thereof, and rising in manner as they were buried. Amongst them shall be seene diuers faces and countenances, some shining as the Sunne, many like the Moone, many as the Starres. Others shall be obscure and darke, and others with hogges faces, with swolne tongues. Then shall euery one crie Nessi, Nessi, that is, Woe is me wretch who haue suffered my selfe to be overcome with my filthie lusts. The Angels shall with their fingers point at the faces which shine, which are they that haue wrought good workes, and shall shew them to one another. The wicked shall haue enuy thereat. They say, that those with faces like hogs, are such as haue bin vsurers, and those with the swolne tongues, liars and blasphemers. There shall be others troden vnder foote, to wit, the proude persons of this world. God, say they, will then demand account of the Kings, Princes, Emperors, and Tyrants, which vse oppression and violence. ¶ Then shall God diuide this raised company into seuentie parts, all which shall be examined, presenting their sins before their eyes, and all that they haue in this world done well or ill: wherto he shall need no testimony; euery member bearing witnes against it selfe of the deeds, yea, and very thoughts. There shall be also Michael the Angel, holding in his hand the ballance of diuine iustice, and shall weigh soules, & distinguish the good from the bad. There shall be Moses with his Standard, vnder which shall all the obseruers of his lawe be assembled. Neare to him shall be Iesus Christ, the son of the virgin Mary, with another great Standard, & al his Christians, the obseruers of his faith. On the other side shall be Mahomet with his standard and faithfull Mahumetans: they which haue done good shall be all gathered vnder the said standards, where they shall haue a pleasant shadow; the rest shall be extremely scorched by the heat of the Sun, according to the measure of their sinnes. Thus shall both parts abide, till God shal pronounce his eternal sentence. When that doome is pronounced, the Angels shall stand diuided in squadrons, all alike adorned, the Seraphins on one side, the Cherubins on the other: of the which, one part shall sound instruments of diuers sorts, and the other shal sing hymnes: and many shall stand at the gates of Paradise, singing & gratulating the blessed soules which haue obserued the diuine Precepts; Christians, Iews, Turks, & Moors, being all of equall beauty & beatitude, if they haue don well. But sinners shall be known afunder. They affirme also, that God wil giue those soules of Paradise a large space in heauen for their euerlasting habitation, goodly & shining. They shal also haue Barachi, Sun beames, on which they may ride and take their view round about Paradise, of the pretious delights therein. There shal they haue pleasant fruits, and if they eate one apple, two shall grow in the roome; and to quench their thirst, they shall haue riuers cleare as crytall, sweet as sugar, by drinking of which their sight & vnderstanding shal increafe, in such sort, that they shal see from one Pole to the other. The meats which they eate, shal consume by a subtil kind of sweat. Further they say, they shall haue their women called Vri, that is, shining, which shall euery day be Virgins, with which they shall continue for euer. Neyerther shall there be any danger of olde age; the men alway being as of thirty years olde, the women of fiftene or twentie. Those three Standard-bearers shall be the principall, each of them hauing a peculiar part of Paradise assigned him for his dominion.

Those which for their bad deeds shall be condemned to hell, shall be all known by their proper names, which they shall beare in their fore-heads: and they shal beare the number and greaunesse of their sinns on their shoulders. Thus shall they be led betwene two mountaines where Hell is situate, at the mouth whereof is a most venomous serpent: and from one mountaine to another is a bridge thirty miles long, which is so made, that they ascend on the first part, the other part is plaine, the last descendeth. This bridge (say they) is made of thinne yron and sharpe: (they call it Seras Caplissi, that is, the bridge of Iustice.) Vpon this shall passe the sinners with the heavy weight of their sinnes vpon their shoulders: and they which haue not beene altogether euill shall not fall into Hell, but into Purgatorie : but the other shall sodainely be plunged into the bottom of Hell, where they shall burne, more or lesse, according to the quantitie of the fire of their sinnes, which they haue carried out of this world : and after the burning they turne to be refreshed, and presently againe to the fire. In the middes of Hell they say is a tree full of fruit, euery apple being like to the head of a Diuell, which groweth greene in the middes of all those flames, called Zouacum Agacci, or the tree of Bitternesse, and the foules that shall eate thereof, thinking to refresh themselves, shall so finde them, and by them and their paines in Hell, they shall grow madde. And the Diuels shall binde them with chaines of fire, and shall dragge them vp and downe through hell. Those soules which sometime shall name God in their ayde, they say, after many yeares, shall goe into Paradise; and none shall remaine in Hell, but such as despaire of their saluation and Gods mercie. Thus saith Menanino. To this agreeth Bellonius, and addeth, that in the day of Iudgement, they belecue a resurrection of the Birds and Beasts : and that the Rammes which they kill at their Easter, shall goe into Paradise : and therefore, though one should serue, they kill many. For the Booke of Zuma saith, that those Rammes shall pray for their Sacrificers in the day of Iudgement. It tel'eth that the Starres are hanged in the ayre by golden chaines, to watch lest the Diuels should learne the secrets of Paradise, and reueale them to Sooth-sayers. Also, that the Ramme which Abraham offered in stead of his sonne, was a blacke one, which had bene nourished fortie yeares in Paradise; that Mah. shall be turned at the end of the world into a Ramme; and the Turkes into Fleas; whom he shall carry striking to him, out of Hell into Paradise, and there shake them off, where they shall againe receiue the formes of Turkes : That he shall wash them with the water of that Fountaine in Paradise, to purge the blackenesse which they got by the scorching of Hell, from whence he will deliuer all good Turkes.

CHAP. XIII.

Of the religious Votaries amongst the Turkes, and of their Saints.

TO proceed vnto the differences of opinion amongst the Turkes : Septemcastrensis (who liued very many yeares amongst them) saith, that though they consent against Christ, yet doe they much dissent among themselves, wresting the Alcoran to their purposes, and scarcely one of a hundred agreeing with his fellow about Mahomet and their Lawe. And besides their differences in Ceremonies, there are, saith he, four sects differing in maine grounds of Religion; which would not be appeased without blood, if they feared not the higher power, and were not thereby kept in awe. One of these sects is that of the Priests, holding that none can be saued, but by the Lawe of Mahomet. The second, of their religious Dervischler, reputed the Successors of the Saints, the friends of God and Mahomet, who are of opinion, that the Lawe profiteth nothing, but the grace of God : and these ground their opinions on miraculous visions, of which he reporteth one in the time of Amurath the second, who examining this contention betwixt these Seculars and Regulars, and being purposed to give sentence in the behalfe of the Priests, and against the religious, one of these Dervischler appearing to him in a Vision, (others also ground Faith on Visions) and deliueing him out of a great danger, altered his minde : for going to the stoole in the night, the boords gaue way, and he fell in, staying on a crosse timber, where this religious man in their wonted habite appeared to him, and bid him now vse the helpe of his Priests for his deliuerance. This after so affected the King, that himselfe became a religious man till the necessitie of State-affaires compelled him to resume his gouernement. (He that listeth may compare with this, Dunstons deuises for his Regulars;) The third he called Czafilar speculatiue men; which Sect is founded on Tradition, holding that they are saued by Merit, without Law or Grace. These are verie earnest in prayers, neuer ceasing; and meeting in the night, and sitting in a Circle they begin to say, Layla illalack, with

with shaking their heads till they fall downe senselesse: these three sorts are manifest to the people, and as it were of equall esteeme with them: The fourth are called Heretikes, that is, Heretikes, holding, that euery man is saued in his owne Lawe, and all Lawes to be alike good to the obseruers; these are burned if they be taken.

Strange it is, that he reporteth of the miraculous workes of some of them, that they may seeme (as he saith) incarnate Diuels: Some going naked, with their priuities onely hidden, and some of these are impassible, besides the violence of Winter and Summer, induring, like stones, the branding with fire, or wounding with sword: some seldome eate or drinke, and some not at all: others, but from hand to mouth: some are perpetually silent, hauing no conuersation with men, of which he saith he saw one; and some haue their supernaturall traunces or rauishments: some dwell amongst men, some by themselves apart, and some in Wildernesse: some keepe hospitalitie in Cities, at least to harbour men, if they haue not food for them: some carrying about water in leather bagges, giuing it to all, and demanding nothing for the same, except any voluntarily gratifie them. Some inhabite at the Sepulchres of the Saints, keeping the same, and liuing on the vowes and offerings of the people, not obseruing the washings and ceremonies of the Lawe. As concerning those Water-carriers; Nicholas Nicolay saith, that he hath seene in a morning at Constantinople fiftie of those Sacques (so he calleth them) in a company, all furnished with their scrips of leather, full of Cisterne or Fountaine-water hanging on their side, with cuppes of fine Corinthian latten, gilded and damaskined, bearing in the same hand a Looking-glasse, which they holde before the eyes of them whom they giue to drinke, admonishing them to thinke on death: and if any giue them any thing, they out of a Violl cast on their faces sweete smelling water. He telleth of some that would seeme to liue a solitary life amongst beasts, but indeede liue in shops in most popular Cities, the walls whereof are covered with skins of diuers beasts, and vpon the hornes thereof they hang tallow Candles. In the midst of this their sacred shop standeth a foole covered with a greene cloth, and vpon the same a great latten Candle-sticke, without any Candle. Moreouer, they haue painted a Cinuerre hung in the midst, in memory of Hely, who forsooth with his sword cut the rockes in sunder: and they breed vp with them beasts, as Bulls, Beares, Hares, Ravens, Eagles; so that in stead of their liuing with beasts, beasts liue with them. And if sufficient be not brought to their shops, they with one of these beasts in their hand goe about the streets begging.

In the armie of the Turkes that assaulted Malta in the yeare 1565. were <sup>b</sup> thirteene thousand of a certaine kinde of men amongst the Turkes, which liue of the reuenues of the Church, who had at Constantinople <sup>c</sup> vowed their liues for their superstition. Anastio Pagisetta reporteth, that as the Emperors Ambassadors were conveyed from the presence of the great Turke to their lodging; by the Janizaries and their Aga, there were amongst them certaine religious men, called Huagi, which vse to follow the Janizaries, who continually turning about, and in their going singing, or rather howling certaine Psalmes or Prayers for the great Sultans welfare, made them wonder that they fell not downe for giddinesse. And this my friend Mr. Simons hath seene them doe, taking one another by the hand in a ring; and so continuing their whirling deuotions with continuall turnings (silly agreeing so so giddie and brainicke a Religion) till with the great applause of Turkes, and admiration of others, sweat and a long-protracted wearinesse makes an end of this dauncing their round.

The Giamailer are for the most part faire young men, of rich houses, which giue themselves to trauell through diuerse Regions, at other mens charges, vnder colour of Religion; carrying with them none other apparell then a little Cassecke, of purple colour, girt with a girdle of silke and golde; vpon the ends whereof hang certaine bumballs of silver, mixt with some other cleare sounding mettall: and they doe ordinarily weare sixe or seuen of these about their girdles, and vnder their knees. In stead of a cloake they are couered with the skinn of a Lion or Leopard, being whole and and in his naturall haire, which they make fast vpon their breast, by the two former legges. All the rest of their bodies are bare; sauing that they weare great Rings on their eares, and a kinde of sandalls on their feet, their haire groweth long like women, disheueled ouer their shoulders. They beare in one of their handes a Booke, written in the Persian language, full of amorous Sonets. And thus with their voyces and cymbals, they make pleasant musicke, especially if they meete some faire stripling, whom they set in the midst of them, and incompasse with their Morice-musicke. These are the Pilgrims of Ioue; and vnder pretext of Religion doe draw vnto them the hearts of women and yonglings, and are called the men of the Religion of Ioue, vnto which order of Religion youth is prone more then enough. The partakers of their musicke ordinarily impart to them of their coine.

f Nic. Nic. 16.

The Calender <sup>f</sup> is of a contrary profession to the former, glorying of abstinence and chastitie. They haue for their dwelling certaine little Churches, which they call Teachie, ouer the gates whereof they doe write these or like wordes, Cada norma, di ersincusciumge al, cacheccur: that is, they which will enter into their Religion, must doe workes like theirs, and remaine in their Virginitie. These Calenders are clothed with a little short coate without sleues, after the fashion of a haire-cloth, made of wooll and horse-haire, and doe not let their haire grow long, but cut the same, and couer their heads with felt hats, like the Priests of Græcia, about which hang certaine strings, about the breadth of an hand, made of horse haire: in their eares, and about their neckes and armes they weare great rings of iron. They pierce the skin vnder their priuymember, thrusting thorow the same a ring of an indifferent bignesse and weight, to barre them from venerie, if they were thereunto otherwise willing. They also goe reading of certaine songs, made by one of their Order, called Nerzimi, the first Saint and Martyr, after their reckoning, of their Religion, who for certaine words spoken against the law of Mahomet, was in Azamia flaide quicke. Menauino <sup>z</sup> saith, he had read some of his writings agreeing with the Christian faith in many points. Some <sup>h</sup> say, he was martyred for confessing Christ.

g Lib. 1. c. 10.
h Policy of the Turkish Empire,

The Dervis goe bare-headed, and cause their head and beard to be cut with a Rasor, and all the hairie partes of their bodie: and burne also their Temples with a hot iron, or an olde peece of cloth burnt; hauing their eares pierced, wherein they doe weare certaine great rings of Iasper. All their cloaths are two sheapes or goat skins, the haire therof being dried in the Sun, one before, and the other behinde, embracing the body in forme of a girdle, otherwise naked, Winter and Summer. They dwell without the Cities in Suburbes and Villages. Thus vnder the colour of Religion they roame, and downe, and make no conscience to rob, kill, and murder (if they finde themselves the stronger, with a small Hatchet which they beare vnder their girdle) all men of whatsoeuer law or nation. They are fornicators, and most detestable in that most detestable sinne of Sodomie. For shew of holinesse they eate of a certaine herbe <sup>i</sup> called Matlach, the violent operation wherof maketh them to become madde, so as through a certaine furie, they with a certaine Knife or Rasor, doe cut their neckes, stomacks and thighes, vntill they be full of most horrible wounds; which to heale, they lay vpon them a certaine hearbe, letting it lie vpon their hurt, vntill it be altogether consumed into ashes, suffering in the meane time extreme paine with maruellous patience. Thus doe they imitate their Prophet Mahomet, who, through abstinence in his denne, fell into such a furie (say they) that he would haue throwne himselfe from the toppe of it. And therefore fooles and mad men are in great reuerence; yea, they account such for Saints: and if such mad men strike or rob them, they take it in good part, and say they shall haue good lucke after it. They erect stately monuments ouer such mad mens graues, as at Aleppo, <sup>k</sup> one Sheh Bonbac (who being mad, went alwayes naked) being dead, they built an house ouer his graue, where to this day (saith our Author) there are lampes burning day and night; and many of these Daruises there maintained, to look to his Sepulchre, and to receiue the offerings of such as come, as many do euery weeke out of Aleppo. If any be sicke or in danger, they vow to offer money or other things to Sheh Bonbac if they recouer.

i This seemes to be the same hearbe which their meanes.

The same account they make of one Sheh Mahammet a madde man, yet living in Aleppo, Aleppo, going naked with a spit on his shoulder. Men and women will come and kisse his hand, or some other part of his bodie, and aske him counsell, for they hold that madde mens soules are in heauen talking with God, and that he revealeth secrets to them. And even the Bassaes themselves will kisse and consult with this Oracle. Hard I deeme it to say whether is the madde man. In a late victorie against the Christians, they affirme that this Sheh Mahammet was scene in the field many thousand miles distant, fighting against their enemies, whom by his helpe they overcame.

But to returne to our Dervises, this our Author saith, that oftentimes great Bassaes, in displeasure with the Emperour, will retire themselves into this Order, as the Hospitall and Sanctuaries of their diseased and dangerous state. Their wife is of better account then any other mans, although he were an Emir, or of the kindred of Mahomet. They live of almes, as the other Religious doe, which they begge in the name of Holy. They have in Natolia a sepulchre of a Saine called by them Saidibattal, who (say they) conquered the most part of Turkie, and about the place of the sepulchre is an habitation and couent, where, aboute fife hundred of these Dervises dwell: and there once in the yeare they keepe a generall assembly, in which their Superiour (whom they call Assambaba) is present and President; their Counsell or Chapter consisting (saith Manum) of aboute eight thousand of their Order. One of these Dervises drawing nere unto Baizet the second, as if he would have received an almes of him, desperately assailed him with a short Scimitar, which he closely hid vnder his hypocritical habit. But Baizet by the starting of his horse (afraid of this hobgoblin) avoided the deadly blow, but not unwounded: neither had hee so escaped, had not Ishender Bassa with his horse-mans Mace presently stricke downe the desperate villaine, as hee was redoubling his blow, who was forthwith rent in peeces by the souldiers. Baizet thereupon proscribed all them of that superstitious Order, and banished them out of his Empire. The like (as Septemvstrans saith) they had attempted against Mahomet his father in his youth, while Amurath was yet living. And in our dayes Mehemet or Mahomet, the great Visier Bassa, who swayed almost wholly and onely that mightie Empire (as appeareth in the historie of that State) in the dayes of Soliman, Selim, and Amurath, and as Master Harbours relateth, was esteemed to possesse two and twentie millions of gold, was not assaured only, but murdered by one of these Dervises. For whereas it is a custome of the great men, that at ordinarie houres all their Chaplaines, or Priests, assemble themselves in the Divano, there together mumbling their superstitions: and this Dervise ordinarily thither admitted, vpon an old grudge, for that Mahomet had before deprived him of a souldiers place and pension, when the Visier was there to giue publike audience, sitting right against him, after his Murphy finished, the Visier reaching vnto him his wonted almes, hee with a dagger closely before provided, stabs him into the breast, and was therefore of Mahomet slaves with exquisite torments done to death. In their great Counsel before mentioned, there are yong men clothed in white, which tell the most memorable obseruations in their traualles, which they present to the Assambaba in writing, subscribed with their names. On the Friday they rise after prayer and eating, the herbe Asseral, to reade the same with dances, and after their dance (which is about a huge fire, made of as much wood as an hundred beasts can carrie) they cut the skinne of their armes, legges, or breasts, engraving some figure thereon, whereto they after apply ashes and vrine. In the doing hereof they utter this speech: This I cut for the loue of such a woman. Vpon the last day of their Feast, they take leave of their Gouvernour, and depart in troupes like souldiers with banners and drummes; and so returne to their owne Monasteries.

The Telaguis by other called Durmisurs, cloath themselves with sheeps and goats skins, like vnto the Dervis: aboute the same they wrap about them in manner of a cloake the skin of a great Beare, with the haire, made fast vpon their stomacke with the legs: vpon their heads they weare a white bonnet of felt folded with small plaits, hauing the rest of their bodies altogether naked. They also burne their Temples as the former. A beastly generation. For they know not, nor will learne to reade, write, or doe any ciuill profitable act, but liue idly vpon almes, roaguing thorow the Countrie alone, and in troupes thorow the deserts, robbing such as they meete handsomely apparelled, causing sing them to goe as they doe, naked. They professe palmistry and fortune-telling, the people seeing and feeding them for such vanities. And sometimes they carrie with them an old man, whom they worship as a God: lodging themselves neere the best house of the Towne where they come. And there this new numen, and old impostor, faineing himselfe raiſhed in spirit, pronounceth graue words and spirituall commandments; at sundrie times lifting vp his eyes to heaven, and after turning to those his disciples, willet them to carie him from thence, for some imminent iudgement there to be executed, as is reuealed to him. They then pray him to auert that danger by his prayer, which he accordingly doth: which the people (deluded by their hypocrisies) reward with large beneuolence, at which they after amongst themselves doe merittly scoffe. They eate also of the herbe Maslatz, and sleepe vpon the ground naked of cloathes and shame, and commit also abominable Sodomitie. And thus much of their misorderly orders of an irreligious Religion. He that will reade more at large of them, let him reade the booke of the Policie of the Turkish Empire, which out of Menanins discourseth more largely of these things, and other the Turkish rites.

Septemcastrensis f telleth of certaine Saints of exceeding estimation for holinesse, whose sepulchres are much frequented of deuout Votaries: as that of Sedichasi (which signifieth a holy Conquerour) in the confines of Caramania. Another is called Hafschipasssch, that is, the Pilgrimes helpe: Another Aseik passa who helpeth in loue matters, and for children, in barrenesse: Another Uaupassa, for concord: and Schrych passa, in trouble and affliction: and Gai or Muschin or Barischin passa, innoked for their cattle: and Chidirelles for traouellers, to whom he sometime appeareth as a traoueller; and any one that hath extraordinarily liued, is reputed a Saint after his death.

h Dan. 3. 37.

They haue many whose names I remember not (saith he) in like reuerence with them, as are the Apostles with vs. When they would seeke for things lost, they goe to one Saint; when they are robbed, they go to another; and for the knowledge of things secret, they repaire to a third. They haue their Martyrs, and Miracles, and Reliques. Thus they tell of certaine religious men condemned wrongfully, for suspicion of treason, to the fire; which they entred without harme (as h those three companions of Daniel) and their shooes were hanged vp for a monument. Their Nephes agli, that is, soules or persons begotten of the holy Spirit (such is their fancie) without seed of man, they hold in such reputation, that they account themselves happie, which can do them any good, yea that can touch them: and if their haire be laid vpon any, they say that their sicknesses are cured.

cap. 18.

In this reputation of sanctitie, they haue a certaine old woman, which hauing a dog with her (in her pilgrimage to Mecca) readie to die for thirst, made water in her hand, and gaue it to the dogge: which charitable act was so highly accepted, that a voyce was presently heard from heaven, saying, This day thou shalt bee in Paradise. And at the same time she was caught vp bodie and soule into heaven: and hereupon are they libell to their dogges. If this crosse an opinion, which some Saracens hold, that women come not to Paradise, no maruell, seeing falsehood is commonly contrarie both to the Truth, and it selfe. He that would reade the miraculous tales which they tell of their Saints, may haue recourse to that namelesse Author, which of his countrey is called, and heere often cited by the name, Septemcastrensis: who telleth i of his Master and his Mistis their deuotion and vowe to Gai and Mirschin, for preservation of their cattell, sometimes miraculous (so readie is the Diuell with his sauing destruction, and destroying preservation) yea hee saith, that the Diuell doth turne himselfe amongst them into an Angel of light, with such effectual illusions, that there are scene, or (at least) beleued amongst them, the dead raised to life, diseases of all sorts cured, secrets of the hearts disclosed; treasures long before hidden in the ground, reuealed: and besides, such ostentation, and shew of dissembled holinesse, that they may seeme not to come short of the Fathers and Apostles in that behalfe: if bodily exercise were the trial of sanctitie.

Busbequins k telles, that they haue like conceit of one Chederles, amongst them, as some superstitious persons haue of Saint George, and the Turkes affirme to be the same.

The

The Dernis haue a great Temple dedicated in his honor at Theke Thioi, not farre from Amasia, the chiefe Citie of Cappadocia. The Countrey and both Legends agree for the killing of the Dragon, deliuering the virgin, &c. They say that he trauelled many countries, and at last came to a riuer, the waters whereof yeelded immortality to the drinker, and now cannot be seene. Choderles hereby freed from death, rides about euery where on his horse (which thence also dranke in immortality) and delighteth in battells, taking part with the best cause: and to make vp the tale, they say he was one of the companions of Alexander the Great; they affirme, that Alexander was Salomons chiefe Captaine, and Iob his high Steward. In that Moschee or Temple at Theke Thioi is a fountaine of water, which they say, sprang vp of the staling of Choderles horse. Like stories haue they of his horse-keeper, and nephew, whose sepulchres they shew, where deuout pilgrimes obtaine many blessings. They shew for reliques the pores of the shooes which Choderles his horse brake in that Dragon-fight, and vse the same in drinke against agues and head-aches. These places are full of Dragons and Vipers. Sultan Murat Chan, or Amurath the second in a battaile against the Christians, used this prayer, O righteous God, giue vs strength and victorie, O Alphamos, O Mastapha the top of glorie, by abundance of miracles, by the abundance of Gaib-erenslers, which are friends to the Musulmans, and walke inuisible, by the abundance of the Choderles, grant vs victorie. In the time of Prehan, or Orchamos the sonne of Ottoman, they say these Gaib-erenslers appeared on white horses in a battell against the Christians, and slew them. These (they say) are friends to the Isaams, that is, Catholike, or right-believing Musulmans, and are diuine protectors of the Imania or Mahumetan law. Such tales you may reade in the Spantish relations of the West Indies, as at the battell of Tausco, where a strange horse-man discomfited the Indians, &c. And our inuocation of God and Saint George, is rather Turkish, then truely Christian: For God alone is our strength, which teacheth our hands to fight, and our fingers to battell: and whom haue I in braues but thee, and I haue desired none in earth with thee? As for George and Choderles I know them both alike in matter of Inuocation, saue that it is worse to abuse to impietie a Christian name then a Turkish: and King Edward the third seemed to inuoke Edward as much as George, His Saint Edward, his Saint George (saith Thomas Walsingham.) But that of George is rather an Embleme of euery Christian, as not onely the heroic Muse of our Spenser in Poeticall fiction, but the Diuiner of great Diuines, in their iudiciall censure haue manifested. It seemeth that the Choderles and Gaib-erenslers are diuers: and perhaps that Marriall Nation in conquest of the Christians of those parts, would soone reconcile themselves to that marriall Saint, and drinke in those further deuotions which his horse pissed. Such Emblemes were those of Christopher, Catherine, George, which the Papists inuocate as Saints; an error proceeding from those pictures (as it seemeth) in Churches, according to that of the Prophet, The stocks is a doctrine of vanitie, and the Image a teacher of lies. The ruder posteritie in that mist of Antichrist, and shew from the bottomlesse pit, not being able to discern an Embleme and Historie asunder, haue made Saint George the Mars of the Christians, quem nostra inuentus Pro Morte colit. Baronius struggles much, rather then hee will lose his Saint, and yet confesseth the Historie Apocryphall. Baronius his fellow Cardinall, but beyond in truth, acknowledgeth it an Image of a Symbole, rather then of a Historie, which Iacobus de Voragine without good authoritie, in his Golden Legend maketh historicall. He saith the Virgin representeth some Prouince, which imploereth the Martyrs helpe against the Diuell. But Hypirius and Villanientinus Possenini interpret it more fitly, to signifie the Church assisted by the Diuell, protected by the Christian Magistrate: in which respect our Defender of the Faith, may iustly be termed the Patron of that renowned Order, which hath now learned their George to be symbollicall, not a Cappadocian, and (as Princes of Gadusbandrie, which gaue name to Saint George) to fight against the Dragon, and the beast with horns like the Lamb, but speaking like the Dragon. As for the Popish George, Baronius also hath another originall from the Arrians, worshipped of them for a Martyr. But if any would be further acquainted with this Knightly Saint, let him resort to Doctor Raimold: his larger Discourse touching these Romish Idolatries.

CHAP. XIII.

Of their Priests, and Hierarchie: with a digression touching the Hierarchie and miserie of Christians subject to the Turke.

After the discourse of their Regulars (which in estimation of devotion haue with the Turkes, and therefore in this Historie, the first place) their Secular Priests follow to be considered. These are of differing degrees, which Menauino <sup>a</sup> thus reckoneth: first the Cadilefcher, vnder which the Mosti or Mufii; the third the Cadi; and after these (in subordinate orders) the Modeci, Antippi, Imam, Mezzini and besides these the Sophi. A certaine Ragusan, <sup>b</sup> in an Oration before Maximilian the Emperour doth not much disagree: but for Cadilefcher, hee calleth the first Pescherehah, whereof (he saith) there are two, one in Romania, the other in Natolia, chiefe Judges of the armie, hauing power to reuerse the sentence of the Emperour, if it be against the law of Mahomet. A second Magistrate (saith he) is called Muchti, the chiefe interpreter of the law, from whose sentence is no appeale.

Nic. Nicolai <sup>c</sup> saith the same of their two Cadilefchers, and that they are chosen out of their most learned Doctors of their Law, and alway follow the Court and with the consent of the Bassies, constitute and depose the Cadi; hauing for their annual stipend seven thousand or eight thousand ducats, besides their ordinarie gaires. They haue ten Secretaries kept at the Grand Seigniors charge, and two Moolorbassies, which are busied about the horses: they haue also two hundred or three hundred slaues. They vse few words, but such as are of their Law and Religion altogether, with very much shew of grauitie. Arzuabani <sup>d</sup>, (in his Preamble to the Italian Alcoran) maketh Cadilefcher to be a generall name to all their orders of Priests. Others doe place the Mufii in the highest place, and the Cadilefcher in the second ranke: and perhaps others gaue the Cadilefcher the first place, because their life was more in action and gouernment, as attending on the Court, and on the warres: but the Mufii being highest Interpreter of their law (though without gouernment) must indeed haue preeminence. And so Menauino <sup>e</sup> seemeth to affirme, who, though he placeth the Cadilefcher first, yet saith, that when happily appeals is made from his sentence, they haue recourse to the Mophii. And this opinion is now generall and most current, which ascribeth to the Mufii the chiefe place.

Master Harbern, sometime Ambassador into Turkie for England Queen (the world wonder, our Westerne Hesperus, that shined so far ouer and beyond all Christendom; into the East; but my words are too base to vnder in that renowned name) Eliaabeth, thus reporteth. The Turkes doe holde for head and chiefe of their Religion the Mufii (the choyce of whom is made by the great Turke, himselfe) such a one as is knowne to be wise and learned, and chiefly of a good life. His authoritie is so esteemed, that the Emperour will neuer alter a determination made by him. He intermedleth in all matters as best him liketh, whether they be ciuill or criminall, yea, or of State. And yet he hath no power to command; but it is in each mans free liberarie, when there happeneth any doubt of importance, to make in some few words by writing, a declaration of his matter, in forme of a question; to whom the said Mufii, in a writing likewise (called Zetfa) giueth a brieue answer containing his iudgement thereon. This Zetfa, brought to the Iudge, is the rule of his sentence; provided, that the declaration made before to the Mufii, contained no wrong. Also the Grand Signior; to shew that he is religious and iust, doth serue himselfe of the authoritie of this Mufii in affairs of warre and peace, demanding his iudgement (in manner aforesaid;) by this couise, the subjects being inclined to more forward obedience. But yet the Mufii will commonly flatter him, and leane to that part, to which he seeth him incline: as in the time of Suleym the second, the Mufii hauing discovered the Emperours intent to warre vpon Cyprus, approved the same in his Zetfa. But after, vpon great offers made to Alchemet the Visier, to breake that resolution, the Mufii, by him wonne to fauour the matter, matter, affirmed still, that the warre against Cyprus was good and iust, but that his Maiestie had a greater obligation in conscience, which he was bound to take in hand, namely, to procure the revolt of the Moores in Spaine, there oppressed by the Christians, wherein he was so bold with the Emperour, as to tell him to his face, that if he did neglect the cause of those Mahumetans, hee might bee thereunto by his subiects compelled.

Concerning the Musti, and other steppes of their Hierarchie, Master <sup>a</sup> Knolles writeth, That the Turkes haue certaine Colledges called Medressa, at Constantinople, Andrinople, Bursa, and other places, in which they liue, and studie their prophane Diuinitie and Law, and haue among them nine seuerall steps or degrees vnto the highest dignitie.

The first is called Safsi, which are yong students. The second are Calsi, who are readers vnto the first. The third Hagi, writers of bookes (for they will suffer no Printing.) The fourth are Naipi, or yong Doctors, which may supplie the place of Iudges, in their absence. The fift Caddi, Iudges of their Law, and Iustices to punish offenders; of which there is one at least in every Citie through the Turkish Dominion: and are knowne from other men by their huge Turbants, two yards in compass. The sixt are Madrifi, which oversee the Caddies doings, and are as Suffragans to their Bishops; who are the seuenth sort, and are called Mull, which place and displace Church-men at their pleasure. The eighth, Cadilescari, who are but two great and principal Iudges or Cardinals, the one of Græcia, the other of Natolia: and these two sit every day in the Diuano among the Bassaes, and are in great reputation. The ninth is the Musfi, who is among the Turkes, as the Pope among the Roman Catholikes. When the Bassaes punish any offence against their Law, they send to him. He may not abase himselfe to sit in the Diuano, neither when he comes into the presence of the Grand Seignior, will he vouchsafe to kisse his hand, or to giue any more reuerence, then he receiueth. The great Sultan ariseth to honor him, when hee comes vnto him, and then they both sit downe face to face, and so talke and conferre together. No man can ascend to this place, but by the dignities aforesaid.

Mahomet <sup>b</sup> the third, forced by a tumult of the Ianizaries to present himselfe vnto them, came accompanied with the Musfi, and some few others of the reuerend Doctors of their Law, who were by the Sultan commanded to sit downe, whiles the great Bassaes abode standing. Such respect is had to these men. Thus much Knolles.

In the booke <sup>c</sup> of the Policie of the Turkish Empire, it is said, that the Musfies authority is like to that of the Iewish high Priest, or Roman Pope. I rather esteeme it like to that of the Patriarkes of Alexandria, Antioch, &c. as binding not all Mahumetans, but the Turkes only: whereas the one had, the other challengeth a subiection of all, which profiteth their religion. That Author also affirmeth, that whensoever the Musfi goeth abroad forth of his owne house (which he vseth to doe very seldome) his vse and custome is, first to go and visit the Emperour; who as soone as he seeth him comming to salute him, and do him reuerence, presently ariseth out of his seat, and embracing him with great kindnesse, entertaineth him very friendly and louingly, causing him to sit downe by him, and giuing him the honor of the place.

His authoritie, saith <sup>d</sup> Soranzo, is so great, that none will openly contradict the Musfies sentence: but yet if the Emperour be setled in a resolution, the Musfi with feare or flatterie inclines vnto him.

Next to the Musfi is the Cadilefcher, who being also chosen by the Emperour, may be compared to those, whom the Christians call Patriarches, or else to the Primats and Metropolitans of a Kingdome. Of these there are now in this increased greatnesse of the Turkish Empire, three: whereas it seemeth that they had in the time of Baiazet but one, and long after (as before is said) but two. To one of these is assigned Europe, namely, so much thereof as is subiect to the Turke, for his Prouince: To the second, Natolia or Turkie: to the third, Syria and Egypt, with the parts adioyning. There were but two Cadilefchers, till Selim wanne Syria and Egypt, and erected a third. But <sup>e</sup> Soranzo saith, that this third of Cairo is not rightly called Cadilefcher, but should rather be called the great Cadi. Out of all which Prouinces, whatsoever causes come to be determined, by appeale or otherwise, they are brought to be decided before the *Cadi*schcr of the same Prouince whence they arise: notwithstanding that the abode of each of them be continually, or for the most part, at Constantinople, or elsewhere, where soeuer the Emperour holdeth his Court. The honor done to them; is little less then to the Musii, for that their authoritie is ouer Priest and people, temporall and spirituall: they are also learned in their law, aged and experienced. Of the Muderrisi and Mulli, I can say no more then I haue done.

Next to these are the Cadi, which are sent abroad and dispersed into every City and Towne of the Turkish Empire: which besides their Ecclesiasticall iurisdiction (as I may terme it) in forcing men to their religious obseruations, are as it were, Iustices and gouernours of the places. Soneere glued are the Offices and Officers, the religion and politie of the Turkes. There are other which are not sent forth, which are called Cheza, that is, Elders. These, with the *Talisman*s, haue the ordering of their parishionall Churches: The Tbalisman calling the people to prayer, and the Cheza executing the Seruice and Preaching; and in absence, each supplying others office. Mentem no more distinctly, and in other names, numbrell those Church-officers. The Modetis is a Gouernour of an Hospitall, receiuing and disposing the rents, with the other customes thereof. Their Schoole degrees are before spoken of, out of Knolles. Some is adde to these former, these other Priests, of baser condition. The Antippi are certaine Priests, which vpon Friday (called of them Glumaagun, and is obserued as their Sabbath, because Mahomet (as some hold) was borne on that day) and on other their fasting and feasting-dayes, after they haue vsed diuers Ceremonies in a certaine place in the midst of the Temple, about thirtie steppes high, from thence reade vnto the people something concerning the life of Mahomet. After which, two little boys stand vp and sing certaine Prayers: Which being ended, the Priest and all the people sing a Psalm with a low voice, and then for halfe an houre together they crye Ilah, illelah, that is, there is but one God. After all this, one of those Antippi, out of that high place, sheweth forth vnto the people a Lance and Scimitar, with exhortation to vse their swords and lances in defence of their Religion. Of the Imam and Mezin is elsewhere shewed, that the one calleth the people to the Mosche or Mefchit, the other there celebrateth publike orisons. The Sopbi also are certaine Clerkes or Priests, employed in the singing of Psalmes and Hymnes, after their manner, in their Churches at the times of publike Prayers.

All these inferiour orders of Priests are chosen by the people, and haue a certaine stipend allowed them by the Emperour, which yet is so small, that many of them are diuened to vse either writing of Bookes, or Handicrafts and Trades for their liuing, and are clothed like lay-men. They haue no great learning, it is sufficient if they can reade the Alcoran; which being written in Arabian, they are as loth to haue translated into the vulgar, as the Papiests are to haue the Scripture. He which can interpret, and make some Exposition of the Text, is of profound learning. Yet are they reuerenced: and if a Turke doe strike or offer outrage to them, he loseth his hand; and if he be a Christian, his life; being sure to be burned. Some say, that now of late some of them are more studious of Astronomie and other Arts. As for those superiour ranks, no doubt may be made of their high account. The *Cadi*schcr is clothed in Chamlet, Satten, Silke, Damaske, or Veluet of seemely colour, as Russet, or Tawnie, and of Purple-coloured Cloth with long sleeues. Their Tulipan on their head is of maruellous greatnes, sharpe in the midst, of Purple Russet colour, deeper and thicker then others; their beards great. They ride on Geldings, with Purple foot-cloths fringed; and when they go on foot, they goe slowly, representing a stately and sacred grauitie.

There is another order of sacred persons, which yet are neither regular nor secular, by any vow or ordination, but had in that account for their birth, being supposed to descend of the line of Mahomet. The Turkes and Tartarians call them Senti or Sitbi, the Moores Seriffi. These weare greene Tulipans, which colour none else may weare, and that onely on their head. Some Christians, ignorant hereof, haue had their apparell cut from their backs, for wearing somewhat greene about them. These they call Hemir. They enioy many priuiledges, especially in giuing testimonie, wherein one of these is as much as two other, which they abuse to iniurie and wrong. The most of them are Moores, which goe ten or fiftene in a companie, with a banner on a staffe, hauing a Moone on the top; and that which is giuen for Gods sake, they sit and eat in the street, where also they make their prayers, and are poorly clad. Like to these (in priuiledge and prauiledge) are the Chagi or Fagi, which liue on almes like Friers. They attend on the publike Prayers, on the holy Reliques, on the Corpes and Funerals of the dead, and to prey on the living by false oathes.

A DIGRESSION TOVCHING THE HIERARCHIE, and miseries of Christians vnder the Turke, &c.

And thus haue we taken a leifurely view of the Turkish Hierarchie from the poore Sofito the courtly Cadilefcher and pontifical Mufri, flourishing and triumphing together with that Monarchie, which is exalted, & hath exalted them, with the power, not of the word of God, but of the sword of man. But with what words meane whiles shall we deplore the lamentable and miserable estate of that Christian Hierarchie and Ecclesiasticall Politie, which sometimes flourished there with no fewer nor lesse titles of dignitie and eminence? Where are now those Reuerend Names of Bishops, Archbishops, Metropolitans, Patriarkes, and the swelling stile of Oecumenicall? nay where are the things, the life, and living? for the stile, Names, titles, still continue; continue indeed, but as epitaphes and inscriptions on the monuments of their deceased and buried power, as the ghosts, and wandering shadowes of those sometimes quicke and quickning bodies, of rule and gouernment. Great Citie of great Constantine, seated in the throne of the world, the fittest situation to command both sea and land through Europe, Asia, and Africa; at thy first natiuitie honored with a double Diadem of Christianitie and Soueraigntie; to which the sea prostrateth it selfe with innumerable multitudes of fish, the land payeth continuall tribute of rare fertilitie, for which old Rome disrobed her selfe to decke this her New-Rome daughter and Imperiall heire, with her choicest iewels and monuments: a Compendium of the world, eye of cities, heart of the habitable earth, Academie of learning, Senate of gouernment, Mother of Churches, Nurse of Religion, and (to speak in the language of thine owne) A new Eden, an earthly heauen, modell of Paradise, shining with the varietie of thy sacred and magnificent buildings, as the firmament with the Sunne, Moone and Stars: this was thy ancient greatnes, great now, onely in miserie and mischiefe, which as chiefe seat of Turkish Greatnes, is hence inflicted on the Christian Name. And thou, the soule of this bodie, the goodliest iewell in this ring of Perfection, which so many wonders of Nature conferred to make the miracle of Art, the temple of that wisdom of God, which is God, called by him which saw thee both Christian and Mahumetan, A terrestriall beauen, a Cherubicall chariot, another firmament, beyond all names of elegance, which I thinke (saith another) c she very Seraphins doe admire with veneration, and (which hath heere moued thy mention) high seat and throne of that Patriarchicall and Oecumenicall Highnesse, which hence swayed all the East, and contended with Westernē Rome for Soueraigntie; now excludest rule, rites, yea persons Christian, wholly hallowed to the damnable holies of ridiculous and blasphemous Mahometisme: the multitudes of other Churches, as filly captiued Damsels, attending and following thee into this Meschiticall slauerie. O Citie, which hast beene (wo worth that word, that hasty hast-beene) which hast bin; but who can say what thou hast bin? let one word, the summe of all earthly excellence, expresse what floods of words and seas of Rhetorick cannot expresse, which hast bin Constantinople, which art (that one name may declare thy bottomlesse hellish downfall) in deed, though not in name, Mahometople, the seat of Mahomets power, the setting of Mahumetan dregs: What words can serue to preach thy funerall sermon, and ring thy knell to succeeding ages? Sometimes the Theatre of worldly pompe, but then on that dismal day of thy captiuiy, the stage of earthly and hellish Furies, the sink of blood, and slaughter-house of Death. What sense would not become senselesse to see the breaches of the wals filled vp with the flaine; the gate by death shutting out death, closed<sup>d</sup> vp to the arch with cōfused bodies of Turks & Christiās; the shouts of mē fighting; the cries, grones, gaspes of men dying? the manifold spectacles and varietie of death? and yet the worse estate, and more multiplied deaths of the living? women rauished; maidens forced; persons vowed to sanctitie deuoted to lust, slaughter, slauerie; reuerend age no whit reuerenced; greene youth perishing in the bloome, and rotten before it had time to ripen; the father seeing the hopes of his yeares, deare pledges of Nature, slaine or sold before his face: the children beholding the parents passe into another captiuitie; all taking an euermourning farewell of all welfare, as well as of each other. Well may we in comparison weep for those miseries, the bitter passion hereof, like a violent whirlwind, did to them drie vp the fountains of tears: Euen he which writ the history of these things, quorum pars magna fuit, George Phrauxa, Counsellor, and great Chancellor to the Emperour, might much moue vs with his owne particular, himselſe sold to one, his wife to another, his daughter richly espoused, now married to the Serraille-slauer, his sonne slaine with the Sultans owne hand, for not being obsequious to his beastly lust: if particular and priuate cases could finde any proper place in publike calamities; and if the Emperours owne historie, were not (as some haue to'd it) more tragicall. O Sunne how could thy brightnesse endure to see such hideous spectacles? but clouds of shot, dust and smoake, hid them from thee. O Earth, which otherwhiles at that time a of the yeare, deckett thy selfe with thy fairest robes, embroidered with varietie of flowers; how wast thou then couered with dead carcases, and furrowed with rills of blood? O God, that the sinnes of man should thus prouoke thy iustice, by vniust and finfull instruments to punish iniustice and sinne! and to chastise thy Christian seruants by Antichristian and diuellish enemies! Iust art thou O Lord, and iust are thy iudgements, which in iudgement remembreth mercie, which saueſt the soules of thine, in and by the affliction of their bodies, but wilt cast this Rod of thy wrath into a fire that neuer shall be quenched.

But me thinkes I heare some excepting at this long digression, and quarrelling at this Tragedie in stead of the proceeding historie. Shall I craue pardon? Or shall I rather desire the Reader a little to consider with me in this narration of Constantinople (as the Map and Epitome of Easterne Christendome) the miserable and perplexed estate of all Easterne Christians, by like meanes brought and trampled vnder the feet of the Ottoman horſe? The larger storie of their rites & opinions is referred to another task: this I haue propounded as the glasse of their miseries, that being now to take leaue of the Turkes, we might not so much honor them with this peale of our Ordnance, as by this mirrour of miserie, be touched with feare in our selues for like punishments, if in time we meet not God with repentance; and remembering the afflictions of Ioseph, to pray for those our brethren, that God would haue mercie on them, and giue them patience and (in his time) deliuerance. They which would take more view of the miseries of Christians vnder the Turke, may in Vines, Georgioutz, Septemcastrensis, and others reade them; for me, the parallels of the Turkish and Christian Hierarchie, was some occasion of this digression, touching which, let me borrow a few words with our Reader.

Mahomet the Conqueror, for the reepling of the Citie pretended great fauour to the Christians, gaue them licence to elect a new Patriarke, whom he honored with the wonted rites and solemnities: and vouchsafed to conferre with him about the Christian mysteries (for his mother was a Christian, and he himselſe addicted to studies of learning being skilfull in the Greeke, Chalde, Persian, Latine, Arabike, besides his Turkish, languages, professing knowledge also in Astrologie) and received at the hands of this Patriarke (his name was Gennadiu) a large treatise thereof, yet extant in Greeke and Turkish; and gaue him diuers priuiledges. But thing; fained cannot continue: and partly through his owne couetousnes, partly through the ambition and disagreeing of the Clergie, heauie fines were imposed on them, and the Seat receiued in his time more successions, & eight in the raigne of Baiazet his son, & so groweth vnder that burthen to this day. And howsoeuer the Patriarke enioyeth spirituall and Ecclesiasticall respect amongst the Christians, yet is he contentned of the Turkes, some of them vpbraiding both him and other Christians with the names of dogs, Ethnickes, vnbeleuers, and the like zealous Rhetorick: nor is he admitted a roome amongst the Bassas, except when he brings his tribute of 4000. ducats, with almost as much besides to the Bassas and other officers, officers. In his Monasterie and Patriarchal Church and Palace, are no Bishops or great Prelates nourished, but a few Monks and some lay-officers and Counsellors. He sometimes (but seldome) preacheth, on some chiefe feasts at the Consecration of some Bishop or Archbishop, and very little preaching they haue amongst them, and that which is in the old pure Greeke, which very few of them vnderstand, thinking it sufficient if two or three of their audience conceiue them, and very few can preach. They haue not the Scriptures in the vulgar Greeke. The reuenue of the Patriarch is about 20000. Dollers. They gather much in their Churches, and he sendeth his Collector to gather abroad, and the other Prelates pay an annuities to him. To preuent abuses from the Turkes he hath a Ianizarie or two at the Church-dore in the time of the Lyturgie. They reade in their Churches great Legends of the lies of Saints, aswell as the Papiests. Their Religion is almost altogether in rites, like the other: and the difference betweene new and old Rome was one principall occasion of the losse of Constantinople, as appeareth by the Emperour Iohn his going to Rome to sollicite aide, (which had beene giuen him but for refusing a Papall ceremonie) and the proceedings of the Councell of Florence. The Patriarkes of Alexandria, Antiochia, and Ierusalem, acknowledge this of Constantinople Oecumenicall: and his iurisdiction extendeth through Asia Minor, the Archipelago, Greece, Mysia, Walachia, Moldavia, Dalmatia, Russia, and Muscovia. The Calogeri or Monkes haue their Gardens and Vineyards which they till and dresse with their owne hands to sustaine themselves. The other Patriarchs also pay a yearly tribute to the Turke. The Priests are poore, and liue of Almes and the prices of their holies, which are most gainefull in exequies. The Laitie is no lesse miserable for the most part, of spare diet, but giuen to drinking. Both Iewes and Christians pay for themselves and euery of their Children aboue twelue yeares old, a Ducat by the poll: and much more for the maintenance of the Nauie, besides their tribute-children for Ianizaries.

The Greekes are ignorant and vnlearned, and haue exiled (in a blinde zeale) Poeticall and Philosophicall Authors, for feare of pollution to their studies. And as Symon Cabasilas writ to Crusius, they haue about 70. Dialects of the moderne Greeke tongue, the purest of which is at Constantinople, the most barbarous of all (O times) at Athens. O Athens, before called Ἐλλάς & Ἑλλάς, The Greece of Greece; and that which the sight is in the eye, that which the minde is in the soule, such was Athens in Greece, seat of the Muses, Graces, Empire, Arts! O Athens! but I am forced silence. Let Zygomalos, an eye-witnesse, speake; There now (saith he) remaines no more but the skin thereof, herselfe is long since dead: the True Athens and Helicon are come into our Western parts. And how can any of them labour in learning which must labour to liue? Necessitie hath no law, no learning. Euen we here now behold a Brittish Athens, or rather an Attike Britaine, where whilome our Ancestors (euen after Learning and Religion had here long flourished) found through the Danish pestilence, a brutish barbarisme. Alfred, the sonne of a King, and after King himselfe, could not finde a Master in all his Dominions to teach him the Latin tongue: and procuring with care and cost, forreiners to teach him, first learned that language at fixe and thirtie yeares of his age: hauing begunne to reade the vulgar at twelue yeares, which his elder and lesse studious brethren could not then doe. And himselfe in the Preface of Gregories Pastoralls, (to vse his owne wordes in our later English) saith, that learning was so fallen in the English Nation, that very few were on this side Humber, which their seruice could vnderstand in English, or an Epistle from Latin into English declare: and I weene that not many beyond Humber were not. So few of them were, that I also one only may not remember by South Thames, when as I to raigne vndertooke. I could shew the like in Italie also by the testimonie of Pope Agatho, in the sixth Synode at Constantinople vpon like cause. But I forget my Greekes, as they haue done their Greeke; I feare rather, I seeme to remember them too much, and that seuerer Censors will iudge this an abortiue issue, borne before the time. I will therefore stay my willing pen till fitter time, referring the more studious to those which haue written of this subiect, especially to Marcius Crusius his Turcogracia, where out of the letters of Gerlach and others, as also of the Greekes themselves, Iohn and Theodosius Zygomalos, and of the Patriarchs, Metrophanes,

The Venetians allow the Greekes free vse of their religion through all their Dominion: and Crete is a chiefe place for their learned men,

The greatest miserie which accompanieth the Turkish thraldome is their zeale of making Proselytes, with manifold and strong inducements, to such as haue bene more nuzzled in superstitions then trayned vp in knowledge, and see such contempt of Christians, and honours which befall to many Renegados: and very many are perverted and bewitched therewith.

Yea many voluntarily offer themselves to Apostasie; and others, by hopes, fears, griefes, despaires, importunities, distracted: by that vizor of vertue in the Turkish grauitie, sobrietie, bodily puritie, and spirituall zeale (after their sect) with whole rables of Satanicall miracles deluded: wanting all intercourse of Sacraments, preaching, reading, and all Christian holies: and full of wants in necessities for this life; forge a better, and turne Turke. Thus doe they sell to the Deuill their soules, bought by the blood of Christ Iesus. We may well despaire of words to vtter this miserie, and to describe this mart of Hell: seeing it exceedeth all words to see the markets made of Christian bodies, the remainders of cruell and bloudie warres, chained together in more then beastly bondage, so brought to the markets: if any be sick by the way, driuen on as long as they can goe, and when their feet faile, laid ouer a horse, like as butchers deale with small cattell, and if they die, left for a prey to the foules and beastes: the places of their abode by the way, filled with cries, of younglings of both sexes, abused to naturall lust. In the markets they are stripped, viewed, and (modestie forbids to speake, O image of God thus abased!) openly in the secretest parts handled, be they male or female: forced to goe, runne, leape; and if shame or disdaine make them vnwilling, by whips and stripes compelled: the infant plucked from the mothers breast and sold from euer againe seeing her of libertie: the wife thus openly deluded and dealt with before the husbands face, and for a base price giuen by some baser Turke, euermore diuorced from his face: his daughters virginities, openly, secretly: my words are swallowed vp with horreur of the fact: himselfe, at home reuerend for his yeeres, now in that respect contemned, and hanging long on hand as vnprofitable ware, before he finde a buyer. Priest, souldier, merchant, artificer, husbandman, all equally subiect in this iniquitie, saue that Gentlemen and those of most liberall education are least esteemed and most abused, because they can bring least profit to their Masters. Where besides filthy lusts, they suffer hunger, thirst, cold, and stripes; and which redoubled those blowes, euen there is the passion of Christ, in this passion of their owne, vbraded to them. Some in impatience reuolt, some runne away, and are brought backe to a worse estate, if possible: some kill themselves; and some! But I can say no more. Let vs pray for them: and let vs at last leaue this tragedie, and take view of former Atrocities.

CHAT. XV.

Of the Regions and Religions of ASIA MINOR, since called Natolia and Turkie.

Ext after the Turkish Religion thus related, it seemeth fittest to discourse of the ancient names and limits of Regions, and of the former Heathenish Religions of that part of the Turkish Dominion, which among Authors<sup>a</sup> hath since, in a singular eminencie, obtained the name of Turkie. And if it seeme strange, that the Turkish Religion (a newer vpstart) be declared before those former of the Pagans, the matter wee had in hand hath thus altered our methode, that after wee had described the deformed disioyned lineaments of the Mother, an Arabian Saracen, her more mis-shapen Daughter, this Turkish Mopsa, might attend her hard at her heeles. As for the Region, wee haue followed the Turkish forces hither: and now that wee haue glutted our selues with the view of their later affaires of State and Religion, let vs cast our eyes about vs, and obserue the Countrey it selfe, which because of her long and entire subiection to this Nation, is styled by their<sup>b</sup> name. The Greekes<sup>c</sup> called it Natolia, ἀπὸ τῆς ἀνατολῆς, because it was the Easterne part of that Empire, as they called Thracia, the Countrey about Constantinople (which was named Nēa Rōmē) Romania. This Natolia, or Anatolia, is of others called Asia Minor: and yet Asia, in most proper and strict account, is peculiarly applied to one Region in this great Chersonesus, or Peninsula, containing besides, Pontus, Bichinia, Lycia, Galatia, Pamphilia, Paphlagonia, Cappadocia, Cilicia, and Armenia Minor. It was bounded on the East with Euphrates (now Frat); on the South, with the Mediterranean Sea: on the West, with the Archipelago: on the North, with the Blacke Sea; stretching in length from 51. to 73. degrees of Longitude, and in breadth from 36. to 45. This Countrey hath been anciently renowned for Armes and Arts: now the <sup>d</sup>grave of the carkasses, or some ruinous bones rather and stonie Reliques of the carkasses of more then foure thousand Places and Cities, sometimes inhabited; Many changes hath it sustained by the Egyptian, Persian, Macedonian, Roman, Tatarian, and Turkish Generall Conquests, besides such exploits as Crasus and Mithridates of old, and the Westerne Christians of later times, haue therein achieued. Let the studious of these things search them in their proper Authors: our taske is Religion, whose over-worne, and almost out-worne leppes, with much curious hunting in many Historiis, we haue thus weakely traced. of the Turkes we haue alreadie spoken, and we leaue the larger relations of the Christians (for why should we mixe Light with Darknesse?) to their proper place. For euen yet, besides the Armenians, there remaine many Christians of the Greeke Church in Cappadocia, and other parts of this Region.

Next vnto those parts of Syria before deliuered, are situate in this lesser Asia, Cilicia, Armenia Minor, and Cappadocia. Cappadocia, called also Leucosyria, and now Amasia, stretcheth foure hundred and fiftie miles along the Euxine Sea; bounded on the West with Paphlagonia; Galatia, and part of Pamphilia; on the South, with Cilicia; on the East, with the Hilles Antitaurus and Mochius, and part of Euphrates. Heere runneth Halys, the end of Crasus Empire, both in the fire and fate thereof; the doubtfull Oracle heere giuing him a certaine overthrow. For when he consulted with the same touching his Expedition against Cyria, hee received answer, That passing Halys, he should ouer-turue a great State; which he interpreting aduently of his Attempts against Cyria, verified it passively in himselfe. And heere besides other streames, lieth Thermodon, sometime made famous by the bordering Amazones. Of which Manly seeminne people, ancient Authours disagree: Thiophrastus deriuing them from the Sauromata; Salust fetching them from Farais; P. Diacorus describing them in Germanie; Trogus and Iustin reporting them Scythians; Diodorus trotting the Seas to finde them in Lybia, and thence also, his further search, passing into an Island in the Atlanticke Ocean; Ptolemy and Curtius placing them neerer the Caspian Sea; Strabo doubting whether there euer had beene such a people, or no. Some haue found them out anew in the new World, f naming that huge Riuer of them. Goropius confidently avoucheth them to bee the Wiues and Sonnes of the Sarmatians or Cimbrians : who, together with their husbands, invaded Asia. And this he proueth by Dutch Etymologies and other coniectures. Which, if it bee true, sheweth, that their Religion was the same with the Scythian. They s are said to haue worshipped Mars, of whom they saie themselues to bee descended. Religion<sup>r</sup> were to speake of their Religion, of whose being wee haue no better certaintie. Strabo h writeth, That in the places ascribed to the Amazones, Apollo was exceedingly worshipped.

In Cappadocia was seated the Citie Comana, wherein was a Temple of Bellona, and a great multitude of such as were there inspired and rauished by deuillish illusion, and of sacred Seruants. It was inhabited by the people called Casaones, who being subiect to a King, did neuertheless obey the Priest that was in great part Lord of the Temple, and of the sacred Seruants, whose number (when Strabo was there) amounted to fixe thousand and vpwards of Men and Women. The Priest receiued the reuenue of the Region next adioyning to the Temple, and was in honour next to the King in Cappadocia, and commonly of the same kindred. These Idolatrous Rites are supposed to haue beene brought hither out of Taurica Scythia by Orestes and his sister Iphigenia, where humane Sacrifices were offered to Diana. Here, at the solempne Feasts of Bellona, those sacred Seruants before-mentioned, called Comani, wounded each other in an extaticall furie; bloudie Rites fitting Bellona's solemnities. i Argem, whose hoarie head was couered continually with Snow, was reputed a religious Hill, and Habitation of some God.

Strabo k reporteth of the Temple of Apollo Catanus, in Dastacum; and of another of Iupiter in Morimena, which had three thousand of those sacred Seruants or Religious Votaries, which as an inferior Order were at the command of the Priest, who receiued of his Temples reuenue fifteene Talents, and was reputed in the next ranked honour to the Priest of Comana.

Not farre hence is Castabala, where was the Temple of Diana Persica l, where the sacred or deuoted women were reported to goe bare-footed on burning coales without harme. It is reported m, That if a Snake did bite a Cappadocian, the mans blood was poyson to the Snake, and killed him.

Many excellent Worthies hath this Region yeelded to the World. Mazaca (afterwards of Claudius called Cæsarea) was the Episcopall Seat of Great Basil: Cucusum, the Receptacle of exiled Chrysostome: Amasia (now a Prouinciall Citie of the Turkish Beglerbegs) sometime the Countrie of Strabo, to whom these our Relations are so much indebted: Nissa and Nazianzum, of which, the two Gregories receiued their surnames. But that Humane and Diuine learning is now trampled vnder the barbarous foote of the Ottoman-Horse. Here is Trapezonde also, whilome bearing the proude name of an Empire. Licaonia, the chiefe Citie whereof is Iconium, celebrated in holy Writ, (and a long time the Royall Seat of the first Turkes in Asia, and since of Caramania, now Conia, or Cogne, inhabited with Greekes, Turkes, Jewes, Arabians, and Armenians) is of Ptolemy adioyned to Cappadocia. And so is Diopolis, called before Cabira, since Augusta, which Ortelius placeth in the lesser Armenia: a Region which hath on the South Cilicia; on the East, Euphrates; on the West, Cappadocia.

In Diopolis was the Temple of the Moon had in great veneration, much like, in the Rites thereof, to that before mentioned of Comana: which although it bare n the surname of Cappadocia, yet Ptolemy placeth it in this Armenia; and Comana Pontica, in Cappadocia, of the same name and superstitious deuotion to the same Goddess. Thence haue they taken the patterne of their Temple, of their Rites, Ceremonies, Divinations, respect to their Priests. And twice a yeare, in the Feasts, which were called, The Goddess her going out, the Priest ware a Diademe. Hee was second to none, but the King: which Priest-hood was holden of some of Strabo's progenitors. Pompey bestowed the Priest-hood of this Temple vpon Archelaus, and added to the Temples Reuenue two Schani, that is, three score furlongs of ground; commanding the the inhabitants to yeelde him obedience. He had also power ouer the sacred seruants, which were no lesse then sixe thousand.

Lycornes after enioyed that Prelacie, with foure Schani of land added thereto: Cesar remoued him. placing in his roome Ditenuus, the sonne of Adiatorix, whome (with his wife and children) he had led in triumph, purposing to slay his elder sonne, together with him. But when the younger perswaded the souldiers, that he was the elder, and both contended which should die, Ditenuus was of his parents counsaile to yeelde to the younger, and to remaine aliue, to be a stay to their familie. Which piety Cesar hearing of, grieuing for the death of the other, he thus rewarded. At the Feasts aforesaid is great recourse of men & women hither. Many Pilgrims resort to discharge their vowes. Great store of women is there, which for the most part are deuoted; this Citie being as a little Corinth. For many went to Corinth, in respect of the multitude of Harlots prostituted or consecrated to Venus.

Zela, another Citie, hath in it the Temple of Anais, much reuerenced of the Armenians; wherein the Rites are solemnized with greatest Sanctimonie, and Oathes taken of greatest consequence. The sacred Seruants and Priestly Honours are as the former. The Kings did sometime esteeme Zela, not as a City, but as a Temple of the Persian Gods: and the Priest had supreme power of all things, who with a great multitude of those sacred Seruants inhabited the same. The Romanes encreased their Reueres.

In Cappadocia the Persian Religion was much vsed: but of the Persian Rites see more in our Tractat of Persia. The Pleadnesse of the Cappadocians grew into a Prouerbe; if any were enormously wicked, he was therefore called a Cappadocian.

Galatia, or Gallugracia, so called of the Galli, which vnder the conduct of Brennus (saith Suidas) assembled an Armie of three hundred thousand, and seeking aduentures in forraigne partes, diuided themselues: some inuading Greece; others Thrace and Asia, where they settled themselues betweene Bithynia and Cappadocia. On the South it is confined with Pamphilia, and on the North is washed with the Euxine Sea the space of two hundred and fiftie miles. Sinope, the mother and nursing Citie of Mithridates, is here seated: one of the last Cities of Asia that subiected it selfe to Turkish bondage, in the dayes of Mahomet the second. Of the Galatae were three Tribes, Trogini, Tolistobogii, and Tectosages: all which Goropius deriue from the Cimmerij. At Tavium, which was inhabited with the Trogini, was a brazen Statue of Iupiter, and his Temple was a priuiledged Sanctuarie. The Tolistobogi had for their chiefe Mart Pisinnus, wherein was a great Temple of the Mother of the Gods, whom they called Andigista, had in great veneration; whose Priests had sometime beene mightie. This Temple was magnificently builded of the Attalian Kings, with the Porches also of white stone. And the Romanes, by depriving the same of the Goddesses Statue (which they sent for to Rome, as they did that of Aesculapius out of Epidauros) added much reputation of Religion thereunto. The Hill Dindyma ouerlooketh the Citie, of which she was named Dindymena as of Cybelus (which Ortelius supposeth to be the same) Cybele. Of the Galatians, Deiotarus was King: but more fame hath befallen them by Paulus Epistle to them.

Plutarch tells a Historie of a Galatian woman, named Camma, worthie our record. She was faire and noble (the daughter of Dianaes Priest) and richly married to Sinoris the Tetrarch. But Sinoris, a man richer and mightier then he, became his vnjust corruall, and because he durst not attempt violence to her, her husband liuing, hee slew him. Camma solaced her selfe as she could, cloystering her selfe in Dianaes Temple, and admitting none of her mightie suiters. But when Sinoris had also moued that she seemed not vnwilling: and when he came to desire her marriage, shee went forth to meete him, and with gentle entertainement brought him into the Temple vnto the Altar, where she dranke to him a cup of poysoned liquor; and hauing taken off almost halfe, she reached him therest: which after she saw he had drunke, she called vpon her husbands name aloud, saying; Hitherto haue I liued sorrowfull without thee, waiting this day, now welcome me vnto thee: for I haue reuenged thy slaughter on the most wicked amongst men, and haue beene companion and partner with thee in life, with him in death. And thus died they both. The like manly womanhood (if a Christian might commend that, which none but a Christian can discommend) Valerius Maximus sheweth of Ghiomara her country-woman, wife of Oriyagon, a great man amongst the Tectosages: who, in the warres of Manilius the Consul, being taken prisoner, was committed to the custodie of a Tribune, who forst her to his pleasure. After that agreement was made for her ranfome, and the money brought to the place appointed, whiles the Tribune was busie about the receit thereof, she caused her Galligracians to cut off his head, which she carried to her husband, in satisfaction of her wrong.

At the Funerals of the Galatians they obserued this custome, to write letters and hurle them into that latest and fatall fire, supposing that their deceased friends should reade them in the other world. At their sacrifices they vsed not an Aruspex, or Divinour, which gazed in the Entrails, but a Philosopher, without whom they thought no Sacrifice acceptable to their Gods. The Diuell certaine was the God to whom their humane Sacrifices were acceptable, which in diuellish inhumanitie they offered at their bloudie Altars, when they diuined of things to come, which they did by his falling, by the dismembred and flowing forth of his blood. * Athenamus out of Plinarchus, telleth of one Ariannes, a rich Galatian, which feasted the whole nation a whole yeare together, with Sacrifices of Bulls, Swine, Sheepe, and other prouision, made ready in great Caldrons, prouided of purpose for this entertainment, that he made them in spacious Bootheries, which he had therefore built. Pausanias saith, That the Pessinonians abstained from Swines flesh. The Legend of Agdistis and Ate, which he there addeth, is too filthie to relate. At Tauium was a brazen Image of Iupiter and his Temple was a priuiledged Sanctuary.

Betweene the mouth of Pontus, the Thracian Bosphorus, and part of Propontis on the West, and Galatia on the East, part of the Euxine Sea on the North, and Asia (properly so called) on the South, is situate the prouince called by the double name of Pontus and Bythinia. There were sometimes two Prouinces, diuided by the River Sangarius: now they are called Bursa by Girana; by Castaldus, Besfargial. The most famous Cities therein are, or rather haue beene, Nice, famous sometime for Neptunes Temple, but more for the first generall Councell therein celebrated, against Arrian in defence of the Trinitie, and Christs Diuinitie: Nicomedia, sometimes the seate of Emperours, now ruinous: Apamia, and Prusa or Bursa nigh to the mount Olympus, where the first Ottomans had their seat royall, and all of that race, except the great Turke themselves, are still buried: Chalcedon, built seuentene yeares before Byzantium; and therefore the builders accounted blinde, which neglected that better seate. Here was a famous Councell of sixe hundred and thirtie Bishops, against the heresie of Eutyches: here Iason had built a Temple to Iupiter, in the straights which sever Europe from Asia, after Melus measure, five furlongs. Of their auncient Kings others haue related: but one cannot passe this our Historie without obseruation, and that is Mithridates, the sixt King of that name; who loosing his father in the eleuenth yeare of his age, by his tutors was treacherously assailed, but escaped, and by vse of that antidote, which of him still beareth the name Mithridate, out-liued their poysoning conspirack. He liued indeede to the death of thousands, which eyther his crueltie or his warres consumed. Foure yeares together (to auoyde their Treasons) he liued in the Fields and Woods, vnder a shew of hunting; both preventing their designes, and inuring himselfe to hardnesse. He spake two and twentie languages, being Lord of so many Nations. He held warres with the Romanes sixe and fortie yeares, whom those renowned Captaines, Sylla, Lucullus, Pompey, did so conquer, as he alway arose againe with great lustre, and with greater terror: & at last died, not by his enemies command, but voluntarily in his olde age, and his owne Kingdome, neuer made to attend the Romane triumphes; Syllas felicitie, Lucullus prowesse, and Pompeys greatnesse notwithstanding. His aspiring thoughts had greedily swallowed the Soueraignty both of Asia and Europe. He caused in one night, all the Romanes in his dominions to be slain; in which massacre perished a hundred and fiftie thousand; as some haue numbered. But it cannot be conceiued (saith Orosius) how many there were, or how great great was the griefe both of the doers and sufferers, when euery one must betray his innocent guests and friends, or hazard his owne life; no Lawe of Hospitalitie, no Religion of Sanctuarie, or reuerence of Images, being sufficient protection. And no maruell, if he spared nor his enemies, when<sup>d</sup> hee slew Exipodrus and Hemochares his sonnes; and after the poysonings and voluntarie death of Monyma his wife, Statira and Roxane his daughters; his sonne Pharnaces (like to taste of the same cup) wonne to his part his fathers Armie, sent against him, with which he pursued his father so hotely, that he, hauing denounced a heauie curse vpon him, entred amongst his Wiues, Concubins and Daughters, and gaue them poyson, pledging them in the same liquor; which his bodie, accustomed to his Antidotes, easily ouercame, and therefore was faine to intreat another to open a bloudie passage for that his cruell soule. A man (saith Orogus) of all men most superstitious, alway hauing with him Philosophers and men expert in all Artes, now threescore and foureteene yeares olde. The Religion in Pontus was little differing from the Greekes. We reade of the Sacrifices of this King to Ceres, and to Iupiter Bellipotens, in which the King brought the first wood to the fire. He poured also thereon Honey, Milke, Wine, Oyle, and after made a Feast. In honour of Neptune they drowned Charriots, drawne with foure white Horses, with which (it seemed) they would haue him ease himselfe in his Sea-voyages. <sup>e</sup> At the mouth of Pontus was the Temple of Iupiter Iasus, called Panopseum: and nigh therto, a Promontorie sacred to Diana, sometime an Island, ioyned to the Continent by an Earthquake. Heretabouts was the Caue Acherusium, whole bottomlesse bottome was thought to reach to Hell.

I may in the next place set downe Paphlagonia, which, as it fareth with such as haue mightie neighbours, can scarcely finde her proper limits: Some<sup>f</sup> reckon it to Galatia, before described; and sometimes Pontus hath shared it: and eyther the force of Armes, or bountie of Emperours hath assigned it at other times to Phrygia, Cilicia, or other parts. The bounds thereof are thus deliuered: Pontus confineth on the North; on the East, the River Halys; on the South, Phrygia and Galatia; on the West, Bithynia. Of the people hereof, called Heneti, some<sup>g</sup> deriue the Veneti of Italia. They now call it Roni. It had the name Paphlagonia of Paphlagon, the sonne of Phonon. The Mount Olgafys is very high, and in the same are many Paphlagonian Temples. Sandaracurgium is another Mountaine, made hollow by the Metall-miners, which were wont to be slaues redeemed from capitall Sentence, who here exchanged that speedie death for one more lingering. So deadly is the Alpha and Omega, the beginning and ending, of this Idoll of the World: which the Spaniards haue verified in the West, by the destruction of another world. Vitruuius tells of a fountaine in Paphlagonia, as it were mixed with wine; whereof they which drinke without other liquor proue drunken.

The Heptaconeta and Mossynæci inhabited about these parts; <sup>h</sup> a people of that beastly disposition, that they performed the most secret worke of Nature in publike view. These are not so much notorious for being worse then beasts, as their neighbours, the Tibareni, for surpassing in iustice other men. They would not warre on their enemy, but would faithfully before relate vnto him the Time, Place, and Houre of their fight; whereas the Mossynæci vsed to assault strangers that travelled by them vnto treacherously. They haue also a venomous kinde of Honey, growing out of their Trees, with which they beguiled and slew three troupes of Pompey. The Tibareni observed one strange fashion, that when the woman was deliuered of a childe, her husband lay in, and kept his chamber, the women officiously attending him, a custom observed at this day amongst the Brasilians.

This Region (in the strict sense) being a particular Prouince of the lesser Asia,<sup>a</sup> is bounded on the West with part of Propontis, and Hellespont, the Aegean Icarian and Myrtoan Seas; on the South with the Rhodian Sea, Lycia and Pamphilia: on the East, with Galatia; on the North with Pontus and Bythinia, and part of Propontis. In which space are containd Phrygia, Caria, and both Mysia's, Aeolis, Ionia, Doris, Lydia. Some<sup>b</sup> circumscribe from hence both Phrygia, and Mysia, alleging the authoritie of S. Luke. But in the Apocalypse chap. 1. these partes are also added; and 1. Pet. 1. 1.

Phrygia is diuided into the greater, which lyeth Eastward; and the lesse, called also Hellespontiacae and Troas, and of soone Epictetus. The greater Phrygia hath not many Cities. Here stood Midaium, the royall seate of Mydas, and Apamia the Phrygian Metropolis.<sup>d</sup> Phrygia is called of the Riuer Phryx, which diuideth it from Caria. Herodotus telleth<sup>e</sup> that the Phrygians were accounted the most auncient of all people; for the triall whereof Psephismachus King of Egypt had shut vp, without societie of any humane creature, two children, causing onely Goates to be admitted to suckle them, who after long time pronounced bec, which they had learned of the Goates: but because that (with the Phrygians) signified bread, therefore they accounted the Phrygians first authors of mankind. Before Deucaliions flood, Nannacus<sup>f</sup> is reported to raige there, and foreseeing the same to haue assembled his people into the Temple, with supplications and prayers. Hence grew the prouerbe to say, A thing was from Nannacus, which was exceeding olde. Many antiquities are tolde of their Gods; whose Theologie thus is recited by Eusebius. The Phrygians tell, that Meon was the most auncient King of Phrygia, the father of Cybele, who inuented the pipe called Syrinx, and was named the Mountain-mother, beloued of Marjyas. But when as Attis had misd her belly, her father slaying him and his fellowes, she, enraged with madnesse, ranne vp and downe the countrey. Marjyas roamed with her, who after, being ouercome in a Muscical contention of Apollo, was slayed quicke. After these things, did Apollo loue Cybele, with whom she wandered to the Hyperboreans: and by his command the bodie of Attis was buried, and Cybele obtained diuine honours. Hence it is, that euen to this day the Phrygians bewaile the yong mans death. In Pessinus a Citie of Phrygia, (after reckoned to Galatia) they erected a Temple to Attis, and Cybele. After the death of Hyperion, the children of Calus parted the Kingdome amongst them, the most famous of which were Atlas and Saturne: to the first of which befell the parts adioyning to the Ocean. He had great skill in Astronomie. Of his seuen daughters were procreated many of the Gods and Heroes: and of Masa the eldest, and Iupiter, was Mercurius begotten. Saturne the sonne of Atlas being couetous and wicked, married Cybele his sister, and had by her Iupiter. They tell of another Iupiter, brother of Calus, and King of Crete (but there and here they are so intingled with Fables, that the least inquirie hath most ease and no lesse certaintie.) This Cretan held the Empire of the world, and had ten sonnes, whom they call Curetes: his Sepulchre they shew to this day. Saturne (the brother of Atlas) raigned in Italy and Sicilia, til Iupiter his sonne dispossessed him, who proued a seuerer Prince to the wicked, and bountifull to the good. Thus much Eusebius of the Phrygian diuinity out of their owne Legends, the mysteries whereof he after vnfoldeth. Other tales they had, as, that Minerva killed there a fire breathing beast, of Philemon and Baucis, and such like, mentioned by the Poets. Alexander making warres with the Pessinuntians, vowed for sacrifice whatsoeuer he first met after he returned with conquest, which he performed on Archelaus his sonne, overcoming<sup>h</sup> he saith one, pietie with pietie. Impious is that pietie which destroyeth humanitie, and diuellish crueltie both in the idoll and dolater; as appeared also in the euent, (if our storie be true) the father rewarding such pietie with greater impietie on himselfe, and casting casting himselfe into the riuer, left his name thereunto. The like is told of the riuers Sagaris and Scamander. Hercules, when hee went with the Argonautes to Colchos, came on shore on Phrygia to amend his oare, and being thirstie sent his sweeting Hylas to the riuer for water, who falling therein was drowned, whereupon hee (leauing his companions) wandered in the woods, bemoaning his Hylas.

About these times Tantalus<sup>a</sup> liued in these parts, a man besides other vices exceedingly couetous, not sparing the Temples of the Gods. Hence arose the Fable that he was punished in Hell with perpetuall hunger and thirst, whiles pleasant waters and deintie fruits did offer themselves to his mouth, but when he would haue tasted them, fled from him. So indeede doth Mammon torment his followers, making them to want as well that which they haue, as that which they haue not, the medicine being the increaser of the disease, as when fire is quenched with oile: like Gardners Asses laden with good hearbes, a burthen to them, food for others, themselves glad to feede on Thistles. And how many Tantals doe we daily see enduring a hunger and thirst in the midst of their abundance? a monstrous and vnnaturall sicknesse, to hunger after that which they haue, yet cannot, yet will not feede on; a dropsie-thirst, saue that they dare not drinke that, which they haue and thirst for. Vnworthy of that life, which he sacrificeth to that, which neuer had the dignitie to be mortall: vnworthy that body, which he pineth with plentie; or that soule, which he damneth for a fancie of hauing; or that nature of man which he confineth to the Gallies, to the Mines, in the seruice of a peece of earth; vnworthy of the name of Christian, whose Christ was, to one of his<sup>b</sup> forefathers, worth thirty pence, but now this will sell him for three halfe pence, for a peece of bread, yea, like Esops dogge, for the shadow of a peece of bread, vnworthy of any thing, saue that his couetise, to be his tempter, his tormentor, his furie, his deuill: Once, proue it is, that he priset a halter so deare, else would he rid the world of a burthen, and himselfe of his worthlesse life. But whither hath Tantalus carried mee? Take heede (reader) he doe not carry thee further, or thou him, beyond words: They say he would haue sacrificed his son Pephslops, had not diuine power releued him: thou art like to finde him Tantalus still. What the Poets tell of Ganymedes euery one knowes; of Niobe famous for her sons and daughters, which she lost all in one day: of Mydas (another Tantalus) whose couetousnesse became a new Alchymie<sup>k</sup> to turne all into gold. And how doth this two-fold Alchymie gull the world? the one making with vaine hopes a rich estate become poore, the other with full haps making all gold but the man; onely the Romane<sup>l</sup> Alchymist is Master of that Art, which the former professe, that turnes to easily a little Lead into so much good gold: onely the wise man, wise in the later to be Master of himselfe and his wealth, not a slaue to passion or pelfe. And yet Mydas in a publike calamitie, (happening by an Earthquake, which swallowed vp houses) warned by an Oracle, to cast into those gaping iawes of the Earth that which was most precious: hurled therein much treasure (what could hee thinke more precious: and how much more easily would many a Mydas haue hurled in himselfe?) But the Earth not perswaded, would not close vp her mouth, till his sonne Anchymus (esteeming man to be most precious) leaped in, and the reconciled Element receiued an Altar in witnesse of his haughtie courage. There were many Phrygian Kings named Mydas.

The Phrygians sacrificed to the Riuers Meander and Marfias: they placed their Priests after death vpon stone, ten cubits high. They<sup>m</sup> did not sweare, or force others to an oath: they were much addicted to diuination by Birds. Macrobius<sup>n</sup> applieth their tales of Cybele, and Attis, to the Sunne. Silennus is reckoned among the Phrygian deities: whom<sup>o</sup> Goropius fetcheth out of Scythia, and maketh him Mydas his Master in Geographic and Philosophie: The diligent attendance of the Scholler was occasion to that Fable of his long eares: the learning of the Master gaue him diuine honours.

In Phrygia on the riuer Sangarius stood Gordie (or as Arriannus calleth it, Gordion) of which he reporteth that whe<sup>p</sup> Alexander came thither, he had a great desire to see the tower, in which was the palace of Gordius & Mydas, that he might behold the shafis or beam of Gordius his cart, & the indissoluble knot fastned thereto. For great was the fame thereof amongst the next adioining people: that Gordius was one of the ancient bitants of Phrygia, hauing a little place of ground, and two yokes of Oxen, the one he vsed to the plough, the other to the waine or Cart. And while he was one day in plough, an Eagle sat vpon the yoke, and there continued till euening. Gordius, astonished at so ominous a token, went to the Telmislean sooth-sayers (for to the Telmislean both mē & women this diuining science seemed hereditarie) and there met with a Virgin, whom he acquainted with this accident: she counselled him to return thither & to sacrifice to Iupiter the King, for the augury was good. Gordius entreated her company with him, that she might instruct him how to sacrifice, which she granted him, and afterwards her selfe also in Marriage. These had betwixt them Midas, a proper stripling. Now, a sedition hapning among the Phrygians, they consulted with the oracle, which answered that a Carre should bring them a King, that should end that sedition. And while they were musing on this answer, Midas came riding in his Carre (with his parents) into the throng, and was by the Phrygians forthwith acknowledged King. The Carre, in memory hereof, was hanged vp to Iupiter in the tower (or temple) of Iupiter, so Curtius calleth it) with thanks for that Eagle (Iupiter's bird) sent before to fore-signifie thus much to his Father. The knot fastned vnto it, was of the barked of the Cornell or dogge-tree, woven with such Art, that a man could neither finde beginning nor end thereof. Bruted it was amongst the Phrygians, that he which could untie it should be Lord of all Asia. Alexander turning it to and fro, and with vaine curiositie searching how to loosen it, at last with his Sword chopped it in sunder, least he should otherwise leaue some scruple in the hearts of his Souldiers. Thus far Arrianus.

In the Lesser Phrygia, (of a Hill therein, called Ida; of a Riuer, Xanthe, of the Kings, Troas, Dardania, &c.) stood that eie of Asia, and Starre of the East, called Ilium or Troy. Of which, all that I can say will but obscure the renowne and glory which all heathen Antiquitie haue by an vniuersall consent of poesie, and historie, given to it. And what Greeke or Latine Author hath not mentioned her ruines, and done execution to her funerals? Dardanus is named her founder, after whom, and his succeeding sonne Erichonius, Tros ruled, who erected the Temple of Pallas, and reedified the Citie, assigning thereto his name. To him succeeded Ilus, and after him his sonne Laomedon, whom Neptunus and Apollo helped in repairing the Citie: which Hercules sacked, and Priamus restored, but to a greater losse, by the Grecians ten yeers siege, and one night spoile. Dares, and Diclys, supposed historians of those times, besides Homer, and the Greekes and Latines his followers, haue more then enough related the particulars. Hesione, Sister to Priamus, was by Hercules giuen to Telamon for first entering the walles. Her did Priamus demaund in vaine by Antenor, and Aeneas his ambassadors. Paris, otherwise called Alexander, one of the fiftie children of Priamus and Hecuba, was sent in the same businesse, and returned with Helena the wife of Menelaus a Lacedemonian Prince: who consulting with the other Grecian Lords for her recovery, first Diomedes and Vlysses were sent to intreat; after, a thousand saile of ships, to force her restitution: which after a tedious warre, with much losse on the one side, and vaine ruine on the other, was effected. The league of the Greekes was made by Calchas, who diuiding a boare in two parts, caused the Princes with their swords drawne and besprinked with blood to passe betweene, swearing destruction to Priamus and the Troians. The like rites of Solemne Couenant we reade obserued by God himselfe, and by the Iewes.

The religion of Phrygia and Troy, and all these Grecian parts of Asia were little (if little) differing from the Greeke superstitions: of which in our Europe-discoueries we are to relate. Therefore adiourning a larger discourse till then, we are a little to mention here their deuotions. In Troy were the Temples of Iupiter Herculeus, at whose Altar Priamus was slaine; of Iupiter Fulminator, of Iuno, Apollo, Minerva, Mercury, Neptunus, To Neptunus they which sailed, did sacrifice a blacke bull, & oxen, whose hinder parts were burnt, the inwards they tasted; Rams and Hogges were sacrificed also to him. To Mercury clouen tongues hurled into the fire; To Venus, on the hill Ida; To Seamander, to the Nymphs, in Caves. To the dead also they sacrificed black sheepe ouer a ditch or hole in the ground, with wine, water, & flower, thinking that the souls drank the blood. They had whole flocks sacred to the gods, vntouched by mē. They obserued anguries, Thunders, dreames, Oracles of Apollo, and other superstitions. But the most famous of all, their fatall Palladium (a name given to all Images; which superstition beleueed not made with hands) was said to haue fallen from heauen at Pessinus, or (as Apollodorus witnesseth) at Ilium, at the prayer of Ilium when he built it. For hee hauing a pyed Ore giuen him by the King of Phrygia, and warned by him to build a Citie where that Ore should lie downe, followed him to this place, where he built a Citie, which he called of his owne name Ilium; and desiring Iupiter to send him some signe, found this Palladium the next morning before his tent. Some say Asius a Philosopher made it by Magickall Art: Apollodorus addeth, that it moued vp and downe, holding in the right hand a iauelin; in the left, a Distaffe. It was three cubits long. Apollo's Oracle fore-warned, that that Citie should neuer be taken, in whose walles it was kept. They hid it therefore in a more secret part of the Tower, that it should not bee publickely knowne, making many other like it to deceiue all future deceiuers: A woman-Priest attended the holy things in honour thereof, keeping fire continually burning. It was walow full with common hands or eies to touch or see it. And therefore when Ilium sawed it from flames, the Temple being on fire, hee was for his blinde Zeale punished with blindness; of which, soone after hee recovered by diuine indulgence. Vlysses stole it from thence. And thus perished that famous Phrygian Citie, if that may be said to perish which still continueth, farre farre more famous by Homer's pen, then Priams Scepter or Hectors valour.

The ruines thereof are as yet very apparant (according to Belonius, an eie-witness, his report) the walles of the Citie yet standing, the remnants of her decayed buildings still with a kinde of maiestie entertaining the beholder: the walles of large circuit, of great longie blacke and hard stones, cut foure square. There are yet to be seene the ruines of the monuments of the Turrets on the walles. They spent foure houres, sometime on horse, and sometime on foot, in compassing the walles. Great Marble Tombs of ancient workmanship are seene without the walles made Chest-fashion: and their couers yet whole. There are also extant the ruinous shapen of two great Towers; one in the top of the hill, (on the bending whereof the towne stood) the other in the bottome: and of another in the middle. Many great Cisterns made to receiue raine-water are yet whole. There are the ruines also of Churches built there, by the sometimes inhabiting Christians. The soile about it is drie and barren: the riuers (so much chaunted) Xanthus and Simois are small rilles, in Summer quite drie: as also Mela testifieth, samâ quàm hâter à maiora flumina.

This Ilium (whose sepulchre onely Belonius hath seene) is not in that place where old Ilium stood, but thirty furlongs Eastward, if Strabo be receiued, yea it changed the place and situation often, and heere at last abode by warning of the Oracle, which also hath now had his Fates as well as Ilium. A small towne was this later Ilium, hauing in it the Temple of Pallas, which Alexander in his time graced, enriching the Temple with offerings, and the place with name of a Citie, with building and immunitie. After his victorie ouer the Persians, he sent them a fauourable Epistle, with promise to build them a sumptuous Temple, and there to institute sacred games, which Lyfimachus after his death in great part performed, peopling it from the neighbour Citie. The Romans also planted there a Colonie, when as Lyfimachus afore had wallosed it, and built the Temple. Fimbria, in the warres against Mithridates, hauing treacherously slaine the Consul Valerius Flaccus, and seeking to enter, vpon deniall assailed it, and in the eleuenth day entred by force; glorying that he had done as much in few daies, as Agamemnon with a thousand faile of Greekes, had done in ten yeere. Not so much, replied an Ilian, for Hector was not heere to defend the Citie. Cesar, ambitious of Alexanders attempts, and deriuing his pedigree from Iulus, confirmed their former libertie, adding a new region to their territorie. Mela telleth a strange wonder of the hill Ida: Soone after midnight they which looke from the top thereof, perceiue certaine disperfed fires, which as the light approacheth are more vnited, and at last gathered into one flame, like a fire, which by degrees groweth into a round and large globe, and then by degrees diminishing in quantitie, but in qualitie of light increasing, is at last taken vp into the Chariot of the Sunne.

Achilles among the later Ilions enioied a Temple and a Toombe: Patroclus also Antiochus had their Toombes: to them all and to Atias d d the Ilions sacrifice in honour denied to Hercules for sacking their Citie: an vniust quarrell, if this yet may be a iust excuse of their partiall superstition. Thymbra is a field hard by, through which Alideth Thymbreus, disemboking it selfe into Scamander there, where standeth the Temple of Thymbraan Apollo.

Arrianus reporteth, that Alexander sacrificed to Protesilaus, (erecting Altarus his graue) who was the first of the Grécians that in the Trojan warre set foot in Asia; as he had before in the Straits of Hellepont: offered a Bull to Neptune and the Sea-Nymphes, powring a golden Viall into the Sea: and in the places from whence he set saile, and where he arriued; he set vp Altars to Iupiter Descensor, to Pallas, and to Hercules. And being come to Ilion, hee sacrificed to Trojan Pallas, and fastening the armes, which he vsed, in her Temple, (a rite which the Philistims observed in slaying their enemy, and Dauid with the armour of Goliath) he tooke thence the armour sacrificed to the Goddesse; monuments till that day of the Trojan warre, after ward the weapons of his gard. He appealed also Priamus his Ghost, performing his exequies at the Altar of Iupiter Hircius, so to reconcile him to Neoptolemus his house, of which he, by his mother, descended. He crowned Achilles his Toombe: calling him Epipic, who had Homer to blaze abroad his praises to the world; in which he was greater then Great Alexander.

Not farre hence is the Citie and Hauen Priapus, so called of the beastly God: like Orthonus and Conisalus and Tychon, drunken Gods of the Athenians. This God or Diuell (of more iniquitie, then antiquitie) was not knowne of Hesiod. This Region was called Adraffia of King Adraffus, who first built a temple of Nemesus calling it Adraffia. In the country adioining was an Oracle of Apollo Altans, and Adraffia: whose oratorie being demolished, the stones were carried to Parium, where was built an Altar, famous for fairenesse and greatnesse. Of this Adraffia was a Temple at Cyzicus.

This Cyzicus was a Citie of Misia minor; (for there is another Mysia called Maia, according to Ptolemy's diuision;) the former is called Olympica, the later by Cyzicus Hellepontica: there is another Mysia in Europe, which Volateran distinguisheth calling it Mæsia. Some ascribe this Cyzicus to Bithynia. We list not to vmpire betwix Geographers, but to relate our Historie, which telleth that this Citie was renowned for Antiquitie, giuen by Iupiter in Dowrie to Proserpina; whom therefore the inhabitants worship. The greatnes, beautie, lawes, & other excellencies of Cyzicus let others shew you: their Temple I cannot but stay to view with wonder, whose pillars are measured foure cubits thicke, fiftie high, each of one stone: in which, the whole building was of polished stone, and every stone was ioined to his fellow with a thread of line of gold: the image of Iupiter was of Iuorie, crowned with a marble Apollo. Such was the beautie of the worke, and costlinesse of the matter, that the Earth whelmed with loue seeking to embrace it, or with iust hatred for the idolatrous curiositie, swallowed vp both it and the Citie in an Earthquake. The like befell to Philadelphia, another Mysian Citie (one of the seuen Churches to which Iohn writ:) and to Megaris in the same Region. Neere to Cyzicus was the hill Dyndima: and thereon Cyzicus Temple built by the Argonautes: who had also vsed a certaine stone for an anchor, which they fixed sure at Cyzicus with Lead, because it had often plaid the fugitive, called therefore the fugitive Stone. The Cyzican towers yeelded a seuen fold Echo.

The Mysians for their great deuotion were called smoke-climbers, a fit name for all superstitious. They had in honour the Nymph Bryibia: vnder colour of religion the Parians coufened the Lampfacens of a great part of their territorie. Of this Citie was Priapus aforesaid, a man monstrous in lusts, admirable in his plentifull issue; hated of the men (howsoeuer of the women beloued) and by them exiled to a wilde life in the field, till a greuous disease, sent amongst them, caused them, by warning of the Dodonzan Oracle, to recall him; Fit seruitour for such a God. Hence the tale of his huge Genitals, and of his Garden-deitie. Offering to rauish a Virgin at the time of her Wedding, he was scared by the braying of an Ass, a creature for this cause consecrated to his sacrifices. Lettice most suitable to such lips.

A little hence standeth Abydus,* where was a famous Temple of Venus, in remembrance of their libertie recovered by a Harlot. Over against the same on Europe side, was Sestos, chaunted by the Poets, the guard of the Hellespont, one of the keys (saith Belonius) of the Turkish Empire; the Castles being for that purpose well furnished, the Straits not above seven furlongs ouer. Here did Xerxes ioyne Asia to Europe by a bridge, professing warres not against the Greekes alone, but against the elements. To Mount Athos he did this Mount Atpeos write his menacing Letters. To the Hellespont he commanded three hundred stripes to be giuen, and fetters to be cast in, with reuiling speeches for the breach of his new-made bridge; which the Sea (disdayning the stopping of his passage, and infringing his libertie) had by tempest broken.

In Mysia was that famous Pine-tree, foure and twenty foote in compass, and growing intire threescore and ten foote from the roote, was diuided into three armes equally distant, which after gathered themselves close into one top, two hundred foote high, and fifteene cubits. Apollo Cillaus had a Temple dedicated to him at Cilla; another was erected at Chrysa to Apollo Smynthius; and twentie furlongs thence, another to Diana Astirna; another (with a sacred Caue) at Andira to the mother of the Gods: this Caue reached vnder the earth to Palea, a hundred and thirtie furlong. Attalus reigned in these parts, who furnished the Library of Pergamus with two hundred thousand volumes, for the writing whereof those parchment skinnies were inuented; therefore called to this day Pergamena. Of this name Attalus were three of their Kings; the last of which made the Romanes his heires. Here was that cruell Edict of Mitridates published to murder the Romanes, whereby many, driuen to seeke helpe of Esculapius in his Temple at Pergamus, found him eyther vnmercifull, or vnskillfull to cure them, although his Physicke-shop was in this Citie. Here were inuented (by King Attalus) Tapestry hangings, called Aulæ of Aula his hall which was hanged therewith. Here was also a yearly spectacle of the Cock-fight. The Mysian Priests abstained from flesh and Marriage. They sacrificed a Horse, whose inward partes were eaten before their yowes.

Southwards from hence along the Sea-coast, trendeth Eolis: whereunto adioyneth Lydia, called aunciently Asia, and the inhabitants, Asiones. It was called Mxonia of Manes their first King, who begat Corys, and he, Atrys, and Asius, of whom (some say) Asia taketh name. Cambyses a Lydian King (saith Athenas) was so addicted to gourmandize, that in the night he did reare and eate his wife; and finding hephand (in the morning) in his mouth, the thing being noysed abroad, he killed himselfe. The same Author telleth of King Andramytes, that he made women Eunuches for his attendance: that the Lydians were so effeminate, that they might not endure the Sunne to looke vpon them, for which cause they had their shade bowers: that in a place, therefore called Impure, they forced women and maidens to their lust, which Omphale (who had indured this violence, comming after to be their Queene) reuenged by as vnjustiustice. For assembling all the seruants or slaues, she shut vp among them their masters daughters, permitting them to their pleasures: She was daughter of Laridans of the posteritie of Atrys, who set Hercules his taske to spinne amongst her maidens: Her husband Timolus deflowred Arriphe in Dianas Temple. Of him haply was named the hill Timolus, which yelded golden sands to the River Pactolus. Halypatrus was after a long succession the Lydian King, father to Crius; whose Sepulcher was an admirable monument, being at the bottome stone; elsewhere, earth: buik by men and women, slaues, and hired persons. It is sixe furlongs in compass, and two hundred foote; and a thousand and three hundred foote broad. All the daughters of the Lydians prostitute themselves, and thereby get their liuing and dowrie. These were the first inuenters of coyning money: the first hucklers and pedlers: the first players at Dice, Balls, Chess, in the time of Atrys the first; driuen to this shift by famine, which when they knew not otherwise to redresse, they deuised these games, passing the time of e-very second day with these pastimes, then beguiling their emptie bellies, and (according to their ominous inuention) now not so much the companions, as the harbengers and forerunners of emptinesse, although some contrary to their first originall, vse them to ease their fulnesse. Thus did the Lydians liue (if Herodotus be beleued) two and

Here on the winding streames of Meander (or nigh thereto) was situate Magnesia (not that by Hermus) whose Inhabitants worshipped the Dyndimene Mother of the Gods. But the olde Citie and Temple perishing, and a new builded, the Temple was named of Diana Leucophryna, exceeding that of Ephesus in workmanship, but exceeded in greatnesse and multitude of oblations. And yet this was the greatest in Asia, except the Ephesian and Dindymene. Of Tralles a neighboring City was Metrodorus the Priest of Iupiter Laryssaeus. In the way from thence to Nysia, is a village of the Nysiaens named Acharaca. There is the Plutonium (compassed with a groue) and the Temple of Pluto and Luno, and the Cave Charonium, admirable to the view, overhanging the groue, which it threatneth, seeming to deuoure it. They say that sicke men which are deuoted to those Gods, goe thither, and in a streete neere the Cave, stay with such as are expert in those mysteries, who sleeping for them, inquire the courses cure them by dreames. These inuoking diuine remedies many times leade them into the Cave, where abiding many dayes with fastings and sweatings, they sometimes intend to their owne dreames, by the Counsell of the Priests. To others this place pestilent and inaccessible. Here are yearly festivals solemnized, and then most of all are these deuotions practised. Youthes and striplings naked and annoynted, draw leade a Bull into the same Cave with great speed, who falls anon dead. Thirty furlongs beyond Nysia is a festiuall place solemnely frequented by the neighboring Inhabitants, which is said to haue a Cave dedicated to the same Gods, and reaching to Acharaca.

After Omphale, Hercules posteritie, which he had by her, reigned; carrying for their royall Ensigne that Battle-axe, which Hercules had taken from Hippolita the Amazon. Candaules wearie of the burthen, gaue it to one of his Courtiers to beare, interpreted an ominous presage of that which happened. He thinking it not enough happie to enioy the beauties of his wife, vnlesse some other eyes were witnesses of his possession, placed Gyges his friend where he might see vnscene (happily the occasion of the tale of Gyges Ring, wherewith he went inuisible) to take view of his wifes nakednesse. But being perceiued by her at his departure, shee put him soone after to his choyce, whether he would enioy what he had seene, and the Kingdome for downe without other ioynture then Candaules bloud, or would there himselfe be slaine. Easie to iudge his choyce, by which Hercules his race failed. Of him descended Crasus, whose Historie is knowne. Him did Cyrus ouerthrowe, and had set him on a pyre of wood to burne him, who then cried Solon, Solon, Solon: which Cyrus not vnderstanding, caused him to be asked, why he so called: he answered, That sometimes drunken with wealth and pleasure, he thought himselfe happie, but then was taught by Solon, not to iudge any happie till his end; which lesson he now learned to his cost: to his good indeede; for Cyrus for this pardoned his life, now the second time saued: which a little before a souldier in taking the Citie had bereaued, had not naturall affection in his sonne (before this time dumbe) violently inforced Nature to loosen the instruments of speech, and proclaime, It is the King. Thus had the Oracle prophesied, that the day would be dismall and disastrous to the father, when the sonne should speake (whereto he had before in vaine sought helpe of God and men) and could speake freely all his life after. And this was all that Crasus by his sumptuous presents, and superstitious deuotion could get of Apollo, which had foretold him, that he himselfe had no power to auert or alter, not to speake of his enigmaticall answers, snares, not instructions, nouments, not documents vnto him.

CHAP. XVII.

Of Ionia and other countreies in that Chersonesus.

Ionia is situate on the Icarian Sea, ouer against the Island Chios. The Inhabitants are accounted Athenian Colonies (whereas Athens may rather seeme to be Ionian) deducing their name from <sup>a</sup> Ion the sonne of Crensa and Xuthus. But more probable is <sup>b</sup> their opinion which deriue them from Iaman, as is <sup>c</sup> before obserued by vs. Of the Ionians in Asia, were reckoned ten principall Cities in the continent, Miletus, Mysus, Priene, Ephesus, Colophon, Lebedus, Teos, Clazomena, Phocaa, Erythraea, besides Chios and Samos in the Islands, to which they imparted their names.

The Ionians had their common Sacrifices and Ceremonies at the Promontorie of Mysus, generally by all the Ionians dedicated to Neptune Heliconius, erecting there unto him a Temple; the place was called Panionium, and the feast in which those sacrifices were offered, Panionia. To those twelue Cities, <sup>d</sup> Strabo mentioning the founders of them, addeth also Smyrna, and saith that they were called to the Panionian solemnities by the Ephesians, who were sometime called Smyrnæans of Smyrna the Amazon, who is named the founder of Ephesus. Against those Smyrnæans the Sardians warred, and would on no condition raise their siege, except the Smyrnæan Matrons were permitted to their lusts. <sup>e</sup> The maide-servant of one Philarchus amongst them deuiled, that those of her condition might in their Mistresses habite be sent, to saue their Masters beds, which was accomplished.

As for Ephesus, the place was designed by Oracle for the building thereof, which warned them there to build, where a Fish and a Bore should shew them. It hapned, that as certaine Fishermen at the sacred fountaine Hyppolani were broyling their fish, one of them leaped with the coales into an heape of straw, which thereby was fired; and a Bore which lay couered therein, leaping out, ranne from thence as farre as Trachon, and there fell downe dead of a wound which they gaue him, grunting out his last gaspe, where Pallas after was honoured with a Temple. Greater then Pallas and her (swinish deuotion, was that <sup>f</sup> Great Diana of the Ephesians, (so proclaimed in the madness of their zeale) and that Image which came downe from Iupiter, which all Asia and the world worshipped. This Image (as <sup>g</sup> Plinie writeth) was thought by some to be of Ebonie; but Mutianus thrice Consull, writ, That it was of the Vine, neuer changed in seuen alterations or restitution, which the Temple received. It had many holes filled with Spikenard, the moysture whereof might fill and close vp the rifts. The doores of the Temple were of Cypresse, <sup>h</sup> which after foure hundred yeares were as fresh as if they had beene new. The roofof the Temple was Cedar. The Image, which superstition supposed came from Iupiter, was made (saith the same Mutianus) by one Canetia. The Temple (reputed one of the worlds seven wonders) was first the building of the Amazons, as Solinus affirmeth. But <sup>i</sup> Pausanias reprobeth Pindarus, for affirming that the Amazons had built it, when they made their Expedition against Thebes and the Athenians: for at that time (saith he) the women going from Thermodon, sacrificed to the Ephesian Diana in their way, as they had done before in the times of Hercules and Bacchus. Not the Amazons therefore, but one Crasus of that Countrey, and Ephesus (supposed the sonne of the Riuer Cayster) founded it. Of him the Citie also receiued her name. About the Temple dwelt both diuers other suppliants; and women of the Amazonian race. These were spared by Androclus the sonne of Cadmus, who here planted his Athenian Colonie, and chased out the Lelages, which before were the Inhabitants; who being slaine in this Expedition, his Sepulchre remayned in Pausanias his time, on which was set a man armed. Xerxes when hee burned all other Temples in Asia, spared this, vncertaine whether for admiration or deuotion; most certaine, a bootlesse clemencie. For <sup>k</sup> Herostratus, to lengthen the memorie of his name with detestation of his wickednesse, fired this Temple on that day in which Alexander was borne at Pella, Diana forsooth, (who in her Midwife-Mysterie Mysterie is called also Inno Lucina) in her officious care to helpe Olympias in her travail, was then absent. It was after restored to a greater excellencie by Dinocrates, or (as Strabo tearms him) Chermocrates, who was also the Archite& of Alexandria. Some<sup>m</sup> affirme, That two hundred and twentie yeares were spent in building this Temple, by all Asia: Plinie saith, foure hundred. It was built on a Marish, because of Earth quakes (which are said to be more common in Asia then other partes) being founded on Coles, the second foundation Wooll. There were therein an hundred twentie fouen Pillars, the workes of so many Kings, threescore foote in height, and fixe and thirtie of them very curiously wrought. The Temple was four hundred twentie five foot long, two hundred and twentie broad; of the Ephesians holden in such veneration, that when Craesus had begirt them with a straight siege, they deuoted their Citie to their Goddesse, tying the wall thereof with a rope to the Temple. It was enriched and adorned with gifts beyond value. It was full of the workes of Praxiteles and Thrafo.

The Priests were Eunuches, called Megalobryzi, greatly honoured; and had with them sacred Virgins. Some<sup>r</sup> call these or else another order of Diana's Priests, Essi- rores and Essene, that is, Good fellowes (after the appellation of this bad age) which by yearely courses had a peculiar diet assigned them, and came in no priuate house. All the Ionians resorted to Ephesus, at Diana's festiuall, which with daunces and other pompe they solemnized, with their wiues and children, as they had done before at Delos: the Temple had priuiledge of Sanctuarie, which Alexander extended to a furlog, Mithridates to a flight-shot, Antoninus added part of the Citie: But Augustus disannulled the same, that it should no longer be a harbour for villaines. This the Romanes finde (saith a Roman Pope relating this Historie) among whom are so many Sanctuaries, Cardinals houses, in which theeues and ruffians haue patronage, which make the Citie (otherwise quiet and noble) a denne of theeues. A lake named Selinusius, and another which floweth into it, were Diana's patrimonie, which by some Kings being taken from her, were after by the Romanes restored. And when the Publicans had seized the profits, Artemidorus was sent in Ambassage to Rome, where hee recovered them to Diana, for which cause they dedicated to him a golden Image in the Temple. In the middes of the lake was the Kings Chappell, accounted the worke of Agamemnon, Alexander not only restored the Ephesians to their Citie, which for his sake they had lost, and changed the gouernement into a popular state, but bestowed also the tributes, which before they had paid to the Persians, vpon Diana, and caused them to be slain which had robbed the Temple, & had ouerthrowne the Image of Philip his father therein, and such of them as had taken Sanctuary in the Temple he caused to be fetched out and stoned. While he stayed at Ephesus, he sacrificed to Diana with very solemne pompe, all his armie being arrayed in battell array. But this Temple of Diana, together with their Diana is perished: But neuer shall that truth perish which Paul writ in his Epistle to them; for obseruing which by Christ himselfe in another Epistle written by S. Iohn, they are commended; and which in a Councell there holden, was confirmed against the heresie of Nestorius and Celestius. But alas, that golden Candlestick (as was threatned) is now almost by Greekish superstition and Turkish tyrannie removed thence: a Bishop with some remnants of a Church still continuing.

The Ephesians were obseruers of curious Artes, which not onely Luke mentioneth, but the prouerbe also confirmeth, Ephesia litera: so they called the spells, whereby they made themselves in wrestling, and other conflicts, invincible. The summe of those Magicall bookes burned by them, Luke saith at 50000. peeces of silver; which Budaeus summeth at 5000. crownes. The many temples of Venus at Ephesus, are not worth memorie. Memorable is the historie of an Ephesian maide, who, when Brunus invaded Asia, promised him her loue (which he much desired) & withall, to bestow the citie to him, if he would giue her all the Iewels and attire of the women; which the souldiers were commanded to doe, who heaped their gold so fast vpon the Damocell, according to their command, that she was therewith couered & slaine. The Asiarchs, which Luke nameth, Beza saith were certain Priests, whose office it was to set forth publike playes & games in honor of their Gods; as also were the Syriarcha. The Ephesians, ians, & as all the other Ionians, were much addicted to nicenesse and sumptuousnesse of attire, for which, and other their delicacies, they grew into a proverbe.

The Ionians had other places and Temples amongst them famous for deuotion and antiquitie, such as no where else are to be seene, as the Temple and Oracle of Apollo at Gemoni. Myus had a small Temple of the Sea, whose waters by the meanes of Meander falling, the foyle brought forth an innumerable multitude of fleas, which forced the Inhabitants to forsake their Citie, and with bagge and baggage to depart to Miletus. And in my time (saith Pausanias) nothing remained of Myus, in Myus, but Bacchus Temple. The like befell to the Atarnitz neare to Pergamus. The Persians burnt the Temple of Pallas at Phoece, and another of Iuno in Samos, the remains whereof are worthie admiration: the Erythrazan Temple of Hercules, and of Pallas at Priene; that for the antiquitie, this for the Image. The Image of Hercules is said to be brought in a ship which came (without mans helpe) to the Cape, where the Cibians and Erythrazans laboured each to bring the same to their owne City. But one Phormio a Fisher-man of Erythra was warned in a dreame, to make a rope of the haire cut off from the heads of the Erythrazan Marrons, by which their husbands should draw the same in to their towne. The women would not yeeld; but certaine Thracian women which had obtained their freedome, granted their haire to this purpose, to whom therefore this priuiledge was granted, to enter into Hercules Temple, a thing denied to all other the Dames of Erythra. The rope still remaineth: and the Fisherman which before was blinde, recovered his sight. In this Towne also is Minerues Temple, and therein a huge Image of wood, sitting on a throne, holding with both hands a distaffe. There are the Graces, and Honors, formed of white Marble. At Smyrna was the Temple of Esculapius: and, nigh to the Springs of their riuer Meles, a caue, in which they say Homer composed his Poems. Thus much Pausanias, The Ionian<sup>b</sup> letters were more resembling the Latine, then the present Greeke are, and were then common, as in our first Booke is shewed in our Phœnician relations.

At Miletus, a madde phrensie had once possessed their Virgins, whereby it came to passe, that they in great multitudes hanged themselves. Neither cause appeared, nor remedie: Needs must they goe whom the Diuell driues. Whom neither the sweetnesse of life, bitterness of death, teares, intreaties, offers, custodie of friends could moue, Modestie detained from proceeding in this immodest butcherie: and which is more to be wondered at, a Posthume modestie, which could not bee borne, till they were dead. For a Law was made, That the naked bodies of such as thus had strangled themselves, should be drawne thorow the streets: which contumely, though it were but a Gnaw to those Camels, which with the halter they swallowed, yet strained they at, and it could not be digested, but stayed their furie. Before the Trojan warre, was Hercules famous at Miletus. The Ionians were subiect to the Assyrians: after that to the Egyptians: next to the Lydians, Persians, and the other Empires, which successively followed.

From Ephesus to Colophon are seuentie furlongs. This towne grew into a Prouerb; for through their excellencie in horsemanship they vsually made the victorie (otherwise doubtfull) to be certaine on that side which entertained them. Before Colophon was the groue of Apollo Clarius. And here died Calebas that famous wizard for griefe, that when vpon his demand Mopsus had certainly answered how many pigs were in the belly of a Sow, by him propounded: Calebas could not doe the like, when Mopsus asked of the number of figs growing on a fig-tree thereby.

Not farre from hence is Erythra the towne of one of the Sybils, which liued in the time of Alexander, of which name also there were others in other places and times, renowned for their prophecyings. Beyond Clazomenæ is the Temple of Apollo, and Smyrna famous in thoe blinde times, for the Temple and statue of Homer; since for the Prelate of Polycarpus, whom our Lord himselfe so highly commendeth. Pliny writeth of one in Smyrna, which being a maide changed her sexe and became a stripling: of which sort hee affirmeth hee had seene one in Africa, then liuing when hee writ, which on her marriage-day sustained that alteration. Pblegon relateth of Philotis another Smyrnan mayde, thus made a male. Pontanus telleth the like of a woman at Caieta married to a fifter foure yeares, and of another the wife of Antonio Sprus twelve yeares, which after married a wife and had children. And in late times Spaine hath yeelded two such examples: of which I list not to play the Philosopher, whether they were imperfect males, or perfect Hermaphrodites. But to hold on our Asian journey. Nelus builded Miletus (who also erected an Altar at Possidium) The Milesian Oracle was sacred to Apollo Didymus: amongst the Branchidz, who betrayed the treasures of their God to Xerxes the burner of their Temple; and therefore for feare of punishment followed him after in his flight. Afterwards the Milesians builded a Temple, which for the exceeding greatnesse remained without rooffe, compassed with dwelling-houses, and a groue, adorned sumptuously with gifts of ancient workmanship. Heere was the legend framed of Branchus and Apollo, whom they called Ulias, and Artemis, of healing. Neare vnto the Temple of Neptune at Possidium was Herzum, an old Temple and Oratorie, after conuerted into a store-house, but then also retaining diuers Chappells full of old workes, as was also a Court-yard without, from whence when Antoninus had taken three Colosses (the worke of Meno) standing on one basis, Augustus placed there againe Pallas and Hercules, but translated Iupiter to the Capitoll, and built him a Chappell.

Solmissus is not farre hence, where the Curtes or Priests of Iupiter dulled the eares of Iuno with the sound of weapons, whiles Latona was deliuered. Heere were many Temples, some old, some new. The Curtes or Corybantz, for so they were also termed; were a shaven order of Priests, who, rauished with a sacred furie, played vpon Cymballs, and danced, shaking their heads to and fro, drawing others into the same rage of superstition. These first began their deuotions at Ida, a hill of Phrygia, and after sailed into Crete, and heere with their furious sounds they deliuered Iupiter from Saturnus gullet (who had before couenanted with Titan to kill all his male children) while he could not by meanes of their noise heare Iupiters crying. Diodorus Siculus writeth, That Corybantis was the sonne of Iason and Cybele, and with Dardanus brought into Phrygia the rites of the mother of the gods, and called his disciples in that sect Corybantes. Natalis Comes traueseth many opinions about their original and rites; their dances were in armour.

The Region of the Dorians was almost rounded with the Sea: Herein was Gnidus a Citie of name for the marble Image of Venus: and Halycarnassus, the Countrey of Herodotus and Dionysius famous Historians, and of Mansolus, whose Sepulchre, erected by Artemisia his wife and sifter, was accounted one of the worlds seuen wonders.

In the Suburbs of Stomalymne was the Temple of Esculapius of great reputation, and riches. In it was Antigonus of Apelles workmanship: there was also Venus naked, after dedicated to Cesar at Rome, as the mother of that Generation, by Augustus.

Neere to Bargolia was a Temple of Diana. Mylasa another Citie of Caria had many publike buildings and faire Temples; among the rest, two of Iupiter (surnamed Oso) in the one; and in the other, Labrandeus, of Labranda a Village, a little off, which had an ancient Temple of Iupiter Militaris much frequented. The way leading thither was called Sacred, paved sixtie furlongs, through which their Procession passed in pompous solemnitie. The noblest of the Citizens were ordained Priests, which function dured with their liues.

There is a third Temple of Iupiter Carinus common to all the Carians, of which also the Lydians and Mysians are partakers. Strabo reporteth of two Temples at Stratonica; one at Lagina, sacred to Hecate, where were celebrated yearely solemnities; the other neere the Citie of Iupiter Chrysoreus common to all the Carians, whither they resort to sacrifice, and to consult of common affaires: which their assemblie is called Chrysorean.

Lydia, called also Meonia, was a rich Countrey, whose mother-Citie was Sardis, the royall seat of Crasus, washed by golden Pactolus, where idleness was a speciall fault, and punished by the Law. Five miles from the Citie is a lake called Colous, where is the Temple of Diana Caloena very religiously accounted of, wherein, on their festiuals, Apes were reported to dance. The Region, called Burned, stretcheth it selfe heere about hour the space of five hundred furlongs; mountainous, stonie and blacke, as if it were of some burning, wanting trees altogether (Vines excepted) which yeeld a very pleasant wine. Here was another Plutonium at Hierapolis over-against Laodicea. It was a hole in the brow of a hill, so framed, that it might receive the bodie of a man, of great depth, Below it was a squared trench of halfe an acre compasse so cloudie and darke, that the ground could scarcely be seene. The aire is not hurtfull to them which approach: but within it is deadly. Strabo put in Sparrowes, which presently died. But the gelded Priests called Galls, might approach to the mouth, and looke in, and diue in as long as they could hold their breath; without harme, but not without signes of working passions, whether of diuine inspiration or relaxation of the naturall forces. No lesse marvellous then the dampe of the aire, is the hardning qualitie of the waters, which being hot, doe harden themselues into a kind of stone. Warner mentioneth the like in Hungarie, and Acosta, in Peru. Those Galls heere mentioned were Priests of Cybele, so called of Gallus a river in Phrygia; & the waters whereof, temperatly drunken, did exceedingly temper the braine, and take away madnesse; but being sucked in largely, caused madnesse. These Priests drinking hereof vnto madnes, in that furie gelded themselues. And as their beginning, so was their proceeding also in madnes, in the execution of their rites, shaking and wheeling their heads like mad men. Volatran out of Polybius reporteth, that one Gallus the companion of Atys (both gelded) imposed this name on the river, before called Teria. Of Cybele and Atys we haue spoken before: I adde, that after some, this Atys was a Phrygian youth, which when he would not listen to Rhea in her amorous suit, gelded himselfe; so consecrating his Priesthood vnto Rhea or Cybele: others<sup>i</sup> affirme that she preferred him to that Office, first hauing vowed perpetuall chastitie, and breaking his Vow, was punished with madnes, in which<sup>k</sup> he dismembred himselfe, and would also haue killed himselfe, but that by the compassionate Goddesse he was turned into a Pine-tree. That the Fable! this the Historie! that these gelded Priests wore also long womanish attire, played on tymbrels and corsets, sacrificed to their Goddesse the ninth day of the Moone; at which time they set the Image of the Goddesse on an Ass, and went about the Villages and streets begging, with the sound of their sacred tymbrell, corne, bread, drinke; and all necessaries, in honor of their Goddesse: as they did also in the Temples, begging money in her name, with some muscicall instruments; and were therefore called Marragryta. Thus did the Priests of Corona also begge for the maintenance of their Goddesse, with promises of good fortune to their liberall contributors. Lucian in his Asinus relateth the like trauesies of the Priests of Dea Syria. Concerning this Image, Albrius thus putteth it: A Virgin sitting in a chariot, adorned with varietie of gemmes and metals. She is called mother of the Gods and Giants: these Giants had Serpentine feete, one of which number was Titan, who is also the Sunne, who retained his Deitie, for not ioyning in conspiracie against the Gods with his brethren. This chariot was drawne with Lions. Shee wore on her head a crowne fashioned like a tower. Neere her is painted Atys a naked boy, whom in ielousie shee gelded. Macrobius applies this to the Sun: Boscace<sup>l</sup> to the Earth (mother indeed of the Ethnike Deities, which were earthly, sensuall, diuinitie) who addeth to that former description of Albrius, a Scepter in her hand, her garment embroydered with branches and herbes, and the Gallis, her gelded attendants with trumpets. The interpretation whereof, they which will may reade in him, as also in Phorantus, Fulgentius and others, with many other particulars of her legend. Clandian calls her both Cybele and Cybele, which name Stephanus thinketh shee received of a hill of that name in Phrygia (as doth Hesychius likewise) so was shee called Dindyma of the hill Dindymus. I could wearie the Reader with long narrations out of Pausanias, Arnobius, Lilius Gyraldus and others, touching these things: but in part wee haue before shewed them, in our narrations of Adonis in Phoenicia, and of the Syrian Goddesse (to which Phorantus referreth this) and when we come to a larger handling of the Grecian Idolatries we shall finde more fit occasion.

It is now high time to leaue this (properly called) Asia, and to visit Lycia, washed by the Sea two hundred miles, wherein the mount Taurus ariseth, hence stretching it selfe Eastward, ynder diuers appellations, vnto the Indian sea. They were gouerned by common

At the foot of the hill stood Pinara, wherein was worshipped Pandarus: and a little thence the Temple of Latoa; and not farre off, Pataras the worke of Patarus, beautified with a Hauē, and many Temples, and the Oracles of Apollō, no lesse famous (if Mela be beleueed) for wealth and credit, then that at Delphos. The hill Telmessus was here famous for Sooth-sayings; and the Inhabitants are accounted the first interpreters of Dreames. Herein was Perga, neare wherunto on a high place stood the Temple of Diana Pergaea, where were obserued yearly Festiuals. Sida had also in it the Temple of Pallas.

m Dom. Nigey.

There remaine of this Chersoneusus,<sup>m</sup> Armenia minor, and Cilicia. Armenia minor, called also Prima, is diuided from the Greater, or Turcomania, by Euphrates on the East: it hath on the West Cappadocia; on the South Cilicia, and part of Syria; on the North the Pontike Nations. It was sometimes reckoned a part of Cappadocia, till the Armenians by their inuasions and Colonies altered the name: As for their rites I finde little difference, but they either resemble the Cappadocians, or their Armenian Ancestors.

n Strabo. l. 14.

Cilicia butteth on the Easterne borders of Pamphylia, and was diuided into Trachea, and Campestris; now hath in it few people, many great Mesquites, and well furnished: the chiefe citie is Hamsa,<sup>n</sup> sometime called Tarsus, famous for the studies of learning, herein (saith Strabo) surmounting both Athens and Alexandria; but most famous for yeelding him to the world, then whom the whole world hath not happily yeelded any more excellent that was meerey a man, that great Doctōr of Nations, who filled these Countries and all Regions, from Ierusalem onen to Ilyricum (now full of barbarisme) by preaching, and still filleth the world by his writings, with the truth which he learned, not of man, nor at Tarsus the greatest Schoole of humanity, nor at Ierusalem the most frequented for Diuinity, but of the Spiritu of truth himselfe: who both was at first from Heauen conuerred, and asrer in the third Heauen confirmed in the same.

Strabo mentioneth the Temple and Oracle of Diana Serpedonia in Cilicia; where being inspired, they gaue answeres: The Temple of Iupiter also at Olbus, the worke of Aiax. From Anchiale, a Cilician Citie, Alexander passed to Solos, where he sacrificed with praises to Æsculapius for recouery from a strong Feuer, gotten before in the waters of Cidnus, and celebrated Gymnicall and Musicall Games. The Corycian and Triphonian Dennes or Caues were held in much veneration among the Cilicians, where they sacrificed with certaine Rites: They had their diuination by Birds and Oracles. Of the Corycian Den or Caue (so called of the towne Corycos, almost compassed with the sea) Mela writeth, that from the hill which ascendeth the space of ten furlongs, this Caue or strange valley descendeth by degrees, the further the more spacious, enuironed with a greene circle of pleasant shadie groues, filling the eyes and mind at once with pleasure and wonder. There is but one passage into it, and that narrow and rough, which continueth a mile and halfe vnder delightfull shades, the rills running here and there, resounding I know not what strange noise in those darked bowen. When they are come to the bottome, another Caue presently presents it selfe, which terrifieth those that enter, with the multiplied sounds of Cymbals and uncouth minstrellie. And the light failing by degrees, it brings them into a darke vault, where a river riseth, and hauing runne a swift course in a short channel, is againe drunke vp of the earth: so soone dieth that streame which is yet immortal, the Earth dealing with this, as some with their children begotten and borne in darknesse, smothering that breath which but euen now from them they receiued, alway bearing, and alway barren. There is a further passage, but none durst view it, possessed with a superstitious fancie of the Gods inhabiting; that conceit presenting all things to the minde as venerable and full of Deitie, which to the sense were dreadfull and full of horror. Beyond this was the Tryphonian, alway couered with a blacke mantle of darknesse, fabulously supposed the the bed of Typhon, and naturally extinguishing the naturall life of whatsoeuer entered.

Vnto these things which haue been said of the Temples, Priests and Rites, obserued in Asia, thus much may be added out of Sardus, of their Sacrifices. The Phrygians sacrificed Swines blood. This did the Galli, Priests of Cybele, and this did the Beulern Votaries, to recouer of their madnesse. The Colophonians offered a dog to Enodia, which is Hecate, as did also the Carians to Mars. The Phaselites in Pamphylia sacrificed fishes to Caber, the sonne of Vulcan; and the Lydians, Eeles to Neptune. The Capadocian Kings in their Sacrifices to Iupiter Stratioticus, or Militaris, on a high hill, built a great fire, the King and others bringing wood thereto: and after that another lesser, which the King sprinkled with Milke and Hony, and after fired it, entertaining those which were present with good cheere.

Pencus tells of diuinations vsed in some parts of Lycia: betwixt Myra and Phelias there was a fountaine full of fishes, by whose forme, nature, motion, and feeding, the Inhabitants vsed diuination. The same Lycians, in the groue of Apollo, not farre from the Sea, had a drie ditch, called Dina, in which the diuiner put in fishes, and ten gobbets of roasted flesh, fastened on spits, with certaine prayers: after which, the drie ditch became full of water, and fishes of all kinds and formes, by which the Priests obserued their Prædictions. And not farre from hence, at Myra in Lycia, was the fountaine of Apollo Curius, where the fishes being three times called with a Pipe, assembled themselves, and if they deuoured the meats giuen them, it was interpreted a good bode and happie presage: if they stricke away the same with their tailes, it was direfull and dreadfull. At Hierapolis in Lycia, the fishes in the Lake of Venus being called by the Temple-keepers, presented themselves, enduring to be scratched, gilled, and mens hands to be put in their mouthes. They diuined by lots six moneths of the yeare together, at Patara in Lycia, in Apolloes Temple. But Saturnus hath swallowed his owne children; and Time, which brought forth these, both Gods and Religions, hath also consumed them, not leauing any such memoriall of them as might satisfie any curious searcher: yet in relation of the Greekish Rites (from which these, for the most part, haue not much swarued) you may expect a more full and ample Discourse.

Lowly hitherto haue we proceeded in the discoverie of a part of Asia; sometime the store, sometimes the want, of conuenient matter, detaining our penne: In the one, Time, the consumer of things, causing much time and paines to bee spent in curious search, that wee might produce some light out of darkenesse: In the other, store of Stones, and varietie of varying Authors hath dimmed our weaker eyes with too much light, vncertaine in so many Tracts and Tractates, where to beginne, and when to end. Now at last are wee passed Euphrates, into a Countrey that often exalteth it selfe, as though it would pierce the Skies, and as often receiueth the due punishment of ambitious pride, being cast downe into so many lowly valleyes and deiected bottoms. The World, which after the Floud was reepeople from hence, still carrieth in the several Ages, Places, Peoples, and Men thereof, the resemblance of this her Cradle, now vp, now downe, in all varietie and vicissitude of chance and change, constant in vnconstancie, treading this Armenian Measure with vnequall paces, ouer Hills and Dales, like it selfe onely in vnlikenesse. Heere Noes Arke seiled, and heere must our Shippe hoyle sayle.

Armenia hath a part of Cappadocia and Euphrates on the West; Mesopotamia on the South; on the North part, Colchis, Iberia, Albania; on the East, the Caspian Sea, and Media. Part of this greater Armenia is now called Turcomania, the other part is contained in Georgia. Ptolemy <sup>a</sup> reckoneth in it principall Mountaines, the Moschæ, Paryarges, or Pariedris, Vdacespes, Antitaurus, Abos, and the <sup>b</sup> Gordzi, which the Chaldean Paraphrast calleth Kardu; and Q. Curtius, Cordai; Berosus, Cordyai.

On these Hills the Arke rested, whereof we haue spoken in the first booke. <sup>c</sup> Haitbon (if we beleue him of his owne Countrey, where he was of royall linage) calleth this Mountaine Arath, little differing from the Scripture-appellation Ararat, and addeth, That although, in regard of abundance of Snow, alway possessing the top thereof, none be able to goe vp thither, yet there alway appeareth in the toppe a certaine blacke thing, which the vulgar people esteeme to be the Arke. Perhaps it may be some cloud or mist which grosse vapours doe often cause on the tops of high hilles. For before Haitbons daies, Beniamin Tudelensis telleth that one Ghamar ben Alchatab had taken thence the remainder of the Arke, and therewith built an Ismaeliticall Mescba. And yet a man may heerein doubt also: for concerning reliques pretending such Antiquitie, Faith can finde no foundation in such ruinous rubbish; and wee haue before shewed out of Berosus and Nicolasus Damascenus of old, and Cartwrights later truels, what may be thought thereof.

Armenia (as Strabo <sup>d</sup> affirmeth) receiued the name of one of Iafons Companions, which followed him in his Nauigation out of Harmania, a Citie of Thessalie, betwene Phææ and Larissa. The wealth of this Region appeared, when Ptolemy appointing Tigranes to bring in to the Romanes fixe thousand Talents of Siluer, hee added voluntarily, beyond that summe, to euery souldiour in the Campe fiftie drammes of Siluer, to euery Centurion a thousand, to euery Deputie of a Countrey, and Chiliarche, a Talent.

Their Religion must at first bee that which Noah and his Familie professed; after by time corrupted. Heere ( <sup>e</sup> saith our Berosus ) Noah instructed his posteritie in diuine and humane Sciences, and committed many naturall secrets vnto writing, which the Seythian Armenians commend to their Priests onely; none else being suffered to see, or reade, or teach them. He left also Rituell Bookes, or Ceremoniall, of the which he was tearmed Saga, that is, Priest or Bishop. He taught them also Astronomie, and the distinction of yeares and moneths: For which, they esteemed him partaker of diuine Nature, and surnamed him Olybama and Arfa, that is, the Heauen and the Sunne, and dedicated to him many Cities; some (saith he) remaining at this day, which beare these names. And when he went from thence to gouerne Cytim, which now (as he affirmeth) they call Italy, the Armenians were much affected to him, and after his death accounted him the Soule of the heavenly bodies, and bestowed on him diuine honors. Thus Armenia, where he began, and Italy, where he ended, doe worship him, and ascribe to him Names, Heauen, Sunne, Chaos, the Seede of the World, the Father of the greater and lesse Gods, the Soule of the World, mouing Heauen, and the Creatures, and Man; the God of Peace, Iustice, Holinesse, putting away hurtfull things, and preserving good. And for this cause both Nations signifie him in their writings with the course of the Sunne, and motion of the Moone, and a Scepter of Dominion, persecuting and chasing away the wicked from among the societie of men, and with the chastitie of the bodie, and sanctimonie of the minde, the two keys of Religion and Happinesse. They called also <sup>f</sup> Tidea, the mother of all, after her death, Aretia, that is, the Earth, and Etha, that is, the Fire, because shee had bene Queene of the Holy Rites, and had taught maidens to keepe the holy euerlasting fire from euer going out.

Noah, before hee went out of Armenia, had taught men Husbandrie, more studying at Religion and Manners then Wealth and Dainties, which prouoke to vnlawfull things, and had lately procured the wrath of God. And first of all men hee found out and planted Vines, and was therefore called Iannus, which to the Aramæans soundeth as much as the Author of Wine. Thus saith Berosus lib. 3. and in the fourth Booke hee addeth, That Nymbros (the first Saturne of Babylon) with his sonne Iupiter Belus, stole away those Rituell or Ceremoniall bookes of Iupiter Sagu, and came with his people into the Land Sennaar, where hee appointed a Citie, and layd the the foundation of a great Tower a hundred one and thirtie yeeres after the Flood; but neither finished this, nor founded the other. Old Tanais when he went hence, left Scythia, with his mother Araxa, and some inhabitants, to people Armenia, being the first King thereof; Sabarius Saga being consecrated High Priest, from Armenia vnto the Bactrians: all which space (saith hee) in our Age is called Scythia Saga. In his fifth booke hee reporteth, That Iupiter Belus, possessed with ambition of subduing the whole world, closely endeouored to make (or take) away Sabarius Saga, who, being not able otherwise to escape his treacherie, fled away secretly. But Ninus the sonne of Belus, pursued his fathers intent against Sabarius, who substituted his sonne Barzanes in his place, and fledde into Sarmatia, and after from thence into Italie, to his father Lammas. Barzanes was subdued by Ninus. But to come to an Authour of better credite, Strabo saith, The Armenians and Medes haue in veneration all the Temples of the Persians; but the Armenians especially esteeme the Temples of Tanais, as erecting them in other places, so in Acilefina. They dedicate vnto them men-servants and women-servants: the most nyppe of that Nation there (dedicating shall I say? or) prostituting their daughters; where after long prostitution with their Goddesse, they are giuen in marriage, none refusing such matches. How much can the shadow, how little can the substance of Religion perswade men to? The Image of Tanais, or Anaitis, was set vp in her Temple, all of solid golde; and when Antoninus warred against the Parthians, this Temple was robbed. The same went, That he which first had layed sacrilegious hands on the spoyles, was smitten blind, and so diseased, that he died thereof. But when Augustus, being entertained of an auncient warriour at Bononia, asked him of the truth of this report, he answered, Thou now, O Emperour, drinkest that blood; for I am the man, and whatsoever I haue came by that bootie. This Goddesse is supposed to be the same with Diana. A Region of Armenia bare the same name Anaitis.

How bloudie Rites the Armenians sometimes vied, appeareth by the Historie of the River Araxes, before called Halmus, borrowing this later name of a King there reigning; to whom, in warres betwixt him and the Persians, the Oracle prescribed the sacrifice of his two faire daughters. Pietie forbad what pietie commaunded; and while the King would be an vmpire betweene Nature and the Oracle (which is the vsall euent in arbitrement) he satisfied neyther. That the Oracle might be fulfilled, he sacrificed two of noble birth, of notable beautie; that Nature might not be wronged, he wronged Iustice (the true touch-stone of true pietie) he spared his owne, and offered the daughters of Misakus: but so he lost both his daughters by Misakus emerging sword, and himselfe in this River by himselfe drowned. Bacchus loued Alphesbea, an Armenian Damsell, and while Tygris, then (if you belecue the Scorie) called Sollax, was too coole a mediator betweene the two hot louers, he swamme on a Tygers backe. Hence the fable of his Metamorphosis into a Tygre; hence the name left to the River. Armenia was subdued to the Persians by Cyrus: one part thereof payed to the Persians twentie thousand Colis for yearly tribute. Sariaster, sonne to Tigranes the Armenian King, conspired against his father: the Conspirators staled their bloudie faith with a bloudie ceremonie; they let themselves bloud in the right hands, and then dranke it. Wonder, that in such a treacherie (as immediately before the same Author affirmeth of Mithridates his sonne) that any man would helpe, or that he durst importune the Gods: no wonder, that so bloudie a scale was annexed to such euidence.

The Temple of Boris (mentioned by Strabo) may happily be some Monument of Ninus deposed, by corruption of the word Lubur, as before said, in Iosephus out of Nicomachus Damascenus calling it Boris, with losse of the first syllable. Iamblicus accuseth the Armenians of Sooth-saying, and Fortune-telling, by viewing the inwards of Pigeons, Whelpes, and Children. His wordes are in Sar. 6.

The Mountaines * of Armenia pay tribute vnto many Seas: by Phasis and Lycus vnto the Pontike Sea; Cyrus and Araxes vnto the Caspian; Euphrates and Tygris vnto the Red or Persian Sea: these two last are famous for their yearely ouerflowings, the former of them arising amidst three other seas, yet by the incroaching violence of the beetle-browed Hills enforced to a farre longer, more intricate, and tedious way, before he can repose his wearied waues: the other, for his swiftnesse, bearing the name of Tygris, which with the Medes signifieth an Arrow. Solinus, cap. 40. saith, That it passeth through the Lake Arethusa, neyther mingling waters nor fishes, quite of another colour from the Lake: it diueth vnder Taurus *, and bringeth with it much drosse on the other side of the Mountaine, and is againe hidden, and againe restored, and at last carrieth Euphrates into the Sea. The Armenians, besides their naturall Lords, haue been subiect to the Persians; after that, to the Macedonians, and againe to the Persian; after to Antiochus Captaines: then, to the Romanes and Parthians, tossed betwixt the Grecians and Saracens; subdued after successiue to the Tartarians, Persians, and Turkes. Of these present Armenians Mr. Cortwright preporreth, That they are a people very industrious in all kinde of labour: their women very skilfull and active in shooting and managing any sort of weapon, like the auncient Amazons. Their families are great, the father and all his posteritie dwelling together vnder one Rooft, hauing their substance in common: and when the father dieth, the eldest sonne doth gouerne the rest; all submitting themselves vnder his Regiment: after his death, not his sonne, but the next brother succeedeth, and so after all the brethren are dead, to the eldest sonne. In diet and clothing they are all alike. Of their two Patriarches, and their Christian profession, we are to speake in fitter place.

The Turcomanians (later inhabitants) are as other the Scythians or Tartarians, (from whence they are deriued) the euish, wandring vp and downe in Tents without certaine habitations, like as the Cardi also their Southerly neighbours, their cattell and their robberies being their greatest wealth. Of their Religion (except of such as after their manner be Christians, which we must deferre till a fitter time) we can finde little to say, more then is said already in our Turkish Historie. This we may here deplore of the vnhappie site of Armenia, which though it repeopled the world, yet is it least beholding to her viperous offspring: a mappe of the worldes miseries, through so many ages. For being hemmed alway with mightie neighbours on both sides, it selfe is made the bloudie Lists of their ambitious encounters, alway loosing whosoever wonne, alway the gauntlet of the Challenger, the Crowne of the Conquerour. This (to let passe elder times) the Romanes and Parthians, Greeke Emperours and Saracens, Turkes and Tartarians, Turkes and Mamalukes, Turkes and Persians, do more then enough prove. Ptolemy placeth to the North of Armenia, Colchis, washed by the Pontike Sea; Albania by the Caspian; and betwixt these two Iberia, now (together with some part of Armenia) called Georgia, eyther for the honour of their Patron S. George, or haply because they descended of those Georgi, which Plinius nameth among the Caspian inhabitants. Strabo * recordeth foure kindes of people in this Iberia: of the first sort chosen two kings, the one precedent in age and nobilitie, the other a Leader in Warre, and Law-giuer in Peace: the second sort, are the Priests: the third, Husbandmen and Souldiers: the fourth, the vulgar seruile people. These haue all things common by Families, but he is Ruler which is eldest; a thing obserued of the Armenian Christians (as before is said) euen at this day. Constantinus Porphyrogenitus * the Emperour writeth, That the Iberians boast and glorie of their descent from the wife of Iriah, which

David defiled, and of the children gotten betweene them. Thus would they seeme to be of kin to David and the Virgin Mariæ: and for that cause they marrie in their own kindred. They came (they say) from Ierusalem, being warned by Vision to depart thence, and seated themselves in these parts. There departed from Ierusalem David, and his brother Spandiates, who obtained (say they) such a fauour from God, that no member of his could be wounded in warre, except his heart, which hee therefore diligently armed; whereby he became dreadfull to the Persians, whom he subdued, and placed the Iberians in these their habitations. In the time of Heraclius they ayded him against the Persians, which after that became an easie prey to the Saracens. Of the Roman conquests & exploits in Armenia, Colchis, Iberia, Albania, I list not here to relate.

Albania (now Zuirla) lyeth North and East betwixt Iberia and the Sea, of which Strabo affirmeth, that they need not the Sea, who make no better vse of the land: for they bestow not the least labour in husbandrie, and yet the earth voluntarily and liberally yeeldeth her store: and where it is once sowed, it may twice or thrice be reaped. The men were so simple, that they neyther had vse of money, nor did they number above an hundred; ignorant of weights, measures, war, ciuilitie, husbandrie: there were in vse amongst them fixe and twentie languages. They had Spiders which would procure death vnto men smiling, and some also which did men to die weeping.

They worshipped the Sunne, Iupiter, and the Moone, whose Temple was neere to Iberia. The Priest, which ruled it, was next in honour to the King: he performeth the holy Rites, ruleth the holy Region, which is large and full of people: of the sacred Serpents, many, being inspired, doe diuine or prophetic. He which is most rauished with the spirit, wandreth alone through the woods: him the Priest taketh, and bindeth with a sacred chaine, allowing him sumptuous nourishment the space of a yeare, and after bringeth him to be slain with other sacrifices to the Goddesse. The Rites are thus: One which is skilfull of this businesse, holding that sacred speare wherewith they vse to slay the mon, stepping forth, thrusteth it into his heart: in his falling they obserue certaine tokens of diuination: then doe they bring out the bodie into some place, where they all go ouer it. The Albanians honoured olde-age in all men, death in none, accounting it lawefull to mention a dead man; with whom they also buried his wealth. Plinio out of Isgonus affirmeth, that a people called Albani (not these I thinke, if any) were hoary haired from their childhood, and saw as well by night as by day.

Myrrelia (sometime Colchis) adioyneth to the Euxine Sea, in which country Strabo mentioneth the Temple of Leucothea, builded by Phryxus: where was also an Oracle, and where a Ramme might not be slaine. This Temple was sometimes very rich, but spoiled by Pharnax, and after of Mithridates. This countrey the Poets haue made famous by the fables of Phryxus, and Iason. Phryxus the sonne of Athamas, Prince of Thebes, and of Nephela, with his sister Helle fled from their cruell stepdam Ino, vpon the backe of a golden Ramme, from which Helle falling into the water, gaue name thunto, of her called Hellespont: Phryxus comming safe into Colchis, sacrificed to Iupiter, and hanged vp the fleece of his Ramme in the groue of Mars; which custome was yearlye praetised of his posteritie. Iason after by command of Pelias (seeking by a barbarous enemye, or a dangerous navigation to destroy him) with fourescore and nineteene other companions in the ship, called Argo, fetched this fleece from hence by the helpe of Medea: and the ship and the Ramme filled heauen with new Constellations. This fable had ground of Historie, howsoeuer by fictions obscured. For the Rivers in Colchis are reported to carrie gold downe with their streams and sands, which the people take with boords bored full of holes, and with fleeces of wooll. Spaine hath of late yeilded many such Argonauts, with longer voyages, seeking the golden Indus Fleece, which their Indian conquest may make the ensigne of their Order more fitly, than their Burgundian inheritance. Suidas applyeth this Fleece and Ramme, to books of Alchymie, written in parchments made of Rammes skinner, which Delrio accounteth an Art of Naturall Magicke, and possible, howsoeuer these Colchians, as well as the Armenians, Egyptians, Persians, and Chaldeans were infamous for that other, which becaltheth Demillib: and Medea is most renowned for that science, the ignorance wherof is the best learning.

Herodotus is of opinion that Sesostris left some of his Armie here at the River Phas, perswaded hereunto by the agreement of the Colchians and Egyptians in the same ceremonie of Circumcision, and in the like workes of Hempe. Vadianus citeth out of Valerius Flaccus the like testimonie. Plinius in his sixth booke, and fifth chapter, repeateth of Dioscurias a Citie of Colchis, whilome so famous, that Timosthenes affirmeth that three hundred nations of differing languages lived in it, and afterwards the Roman affaires were there managed by an hundred and thirtie Interpreters. * Cornelius Tacitus saith, that they accounted it vnlawfull to offer a Ramme in Sacrifice, because of Phryxus his Ramme, vncertaine, whether it were a beast, or the ensigne of his shippe. They report themselves the issue of the Theffalians.

The present Mengrelians are rude and barbarous, defending themselves from the Turks by their rough Hills and ragged poverie, so inhumane, that they sell their own children to the Turkes. I reade not of any other Religion at this day amongst them but Christian, such as it is: Some adde these also to the Georgians. The wiues of diuers of these people, reported to be exercised in armes and martiall feats, happily gaue occasion to that fable or historie of the Amazons.

Busbequius saith, that Colchos is a very fertile Countrey, but the people idle and carelesse: they plant their Vines at the foote of great Trees, which marriage groweth very fruitfull, the husbands armes being kindly embraced, and plentifully laden. They haue no money, but in stead of buying and selling they vse exchange. If they haue any of the more precious mettals, they are consecrated to the vse of their Temples, whence the King can borrow them vnder pretence of publike good. The King hath all his tributes paid in the fruits of the earth, whereby his Pallace becommeth a publike store-house to all commers. When Merchants come, they giue him a present, and he feastereth them: the more wine any man drinketh the more welcom he is. They are much giuen to belly-cheare, dauncing, and loose Sonnets, of loue and dalliance. They much caroll the name of Rowland or Orlando, which name it seemeth passed in them with the Christian armies, which conquered the Holy Land. No maruell if Cane and Bacchus lead in Venus betwixt them; which so ruleth in these partes, that the husband bringing home a guest, commends him to his wife & sister, with charge to yield him content and delight, esteeming it a credite, that their wiues can please and be acceptable. Their Virgins become mothers very soone; most of them at ten years old can bring witnesses in their armes (little bigger then a great frogge; which yet after grow tall & square men) to proue that there is neuer a maid the lesse for them. Swearing they hold an excellent qualitie, and to be a fashion-monger in oathes, gloriouly steale cunningly wins great reputation, as of another Mercurius; and they which cannot doe it, are holden dullards and blockes. When they goe into a Church, they giue meane respect to the other Images: Saint George is so worshipped, that his bodie hooves are kissed of them. Dadianus the King of Colchos or Mengrelia, came a suiter to Selymus while Busbequius was there. Betwixt them and the Iberians, their neighbours, is much discord. And thus much of their present condition.

Hailon the Armenian, extending the confines of Georgia to the great Sea, lieth in this Kingdome is a thing monstrous and wonderfull, which I would not haue spoken nor beleued, had I not seene it with mine owne eyes. In these parts there is a Pounte called Hailon, conuaying in circuit three dayes iourney; and so farre is it covered with an obscure darkenes, that none can see any thing, nor dare any enter into it. The inhabitants thereabout affirm, that they haue often heard the voyce of men howling, cockes crowing, neighing of horses, run by the passage of a Riuer, it appeareth to haue signes of habitation. This is reported by the Armenian histories to haue come to passe by the hand of God, punishing his Christian seruants (by Sauvours a Persian Idolater, Lord of this place, appointed as a reward for punishing with outward darkenes the inward former blindness and rage of those persecuting Idolaters. Thus Hailon becometh a Church (for so Ortelius nameth him) but this darkenes seemeth more innocent, and to haue bin the cause of that proverb, Cimmeria tenebra.

The Georgians (gift in with two mightie aduersaries, the Persian and the Turke) haue endured much grievance from them both: and, in the late warres, especially from the

the Turke, who hath taken and fortified many of their principall places of importance, Gori, Clisca, Lori, Tomanis, Teflis, the chiefe Citie of Georgia, vnto which from Derbent there yet remains the foundation of a high and thicke wall built by Alexander. Ortelius esteemeth Derbent to be Caucasiaporta, which Pliny<sup>d</sup> calleth a mightie worke of nature, &c. Westward from hence is entrance into the Circassian countrey, extending it selfe on Mentis five hundred miles, and within land two hundred: Christians they are in profession: from hence the Soldans of Egypt had their slaves, of which were raised their Mamalukes. Their chiefe Cities are Locoppa and Crochuco: at the mouth of Tanais, the Turke hath fortified Asaph. They liue in great part on robberies. In old time in this tract was Phanagoria, and therein the Temple of Zeus surnamed Apaturia, because, that when the Giants assaulted her, she implored the aide of Heracles, who slew them all one after another. Cimmerium a towne at these straits, gaue name thereunto, of Cimmerius Bosphorus. But little can be said of these in particular, more then generally may be said of the Scythians, to whom they are reckoned.

Georgius Interichus<sup>f</sup> hath written a tractate of these Zychi, or Circassi, called of themselves Adiga; expressing their vnchristian Christianitie, and barbarous manner of liuing; which I hold fittest in our discouerie of the diuers professions of Christian Religion to relate.

Some s adde vnto Armenia in their moderne Mappes and Discoueries, besides the Turcomani, a people that came thither out of Tartaria, the Curdi, both still retaining the Tartarian and Arabian manner of life in tents, without Cities, Townes, or houses. Their religion halteth betwixt diuers religions of the Turkes, Persians, and Christians of the Iacobite and Nestorian Sects. In heart, they are neither fast to God nor man; dissembling with the Persian and Turke; and better skilled in robbetrie, murder, and faithlesse treacherie (their daily practise) then mysteries of faith and religion. They are also Lords of Bitlis, and some other Cities and holds in those parts. They are called Courdines by Sir Ant. Sherley; who saith they know no other fruits of the earth but what belonged to the sustenance of their cattell, vpon the milke, butter, and flesh of which they liue, ruled by certaine Princes of their owne, which giue partly an obedience to the Turke, partly to the Persian, as they are neere the confines of the one or the other. Yet in that simplicitie of liuing, through ambition warres grow daily among them, euen to the extirpation of a whole Nation. As wee found freshly when we passed by one of those Princes called Haderbeague, all whose people were deuoured by the sword, or carried away captiue by Cohatbeague; and himselfe remained onely with some twenty soules in a rocke. Ten thousand of these Courdines, subiect to the Turke, abandoned their Countrey, and requested some waste land to be giuen them by Abas the present Persian, which gaue them entertainment: one occasion of quarrell betwixt him and the Turke. They are supposed to be a remnant of the ancient Parchians, and neuer goe abroad without their armes, bowes, arrowes, scimitars and bucklers, euen when age seemeth to haue fastened one foot in the graue. They adore<sup>h</sup> and worship the Deuill, that he may not hurt them, nor their cattell: they are cruell to all sorts of Christians: their Countrey is therefore called Terra Diaboli. One of their Townes is named Mannscute, a mile from which is an Hospitall dedicated to Saint John Baptist, much frequented as well by Turkes, as Christians, whom superstition hath perswaded, that whosoever wil bestow kidde, sheepe, or money, to releuee the poore of that place, shall both prosper in his journey, and obtaine the forgiueneffe of his sinnes.

Armenia extending it selfe (if Iustine have measured rightly) eleven hundred miles, on the East encountreth Media, in which lieth our next perambulation. It received the name of Medas, the sonne of Isapher, not of Medus the sonne of Medea and Iafon. It is limited to the North, with the Caspian sea; on the South, with Persia; on the East, with Parthia. Ecbatana, the chiefe Citie, built (as Pliny affirmeth) by Selenus, (indeed farre more ancient, and by him happily reedified) is distant from the Caspian Straits twentie miles. These Straits are a narrow way made by hand thorow the hilles, scarce wide enough for a cart to passe, eight miles in length, the rockes manifesting their indignation at this interruption, by obscure frownes, and salt<sup>d</sup> teares continually streaming from them, which I know not by what sudden horror, are presently congealed into ice; also all the Summer time with armies of Serpents keeping the passages. Well may this be the house of Envy: so fitly doth that fable of the Poet agree with the nature of this place.

Of Ecbatana we read in the Historie of Iudith, that Arpachshad built the wallies of hewen stones, seuentie cubits high, and fiftie cubits broad, &c. Herodotus affirmeth, that after the Assyrians had raigned in Asia five hundred and twenty yeeres, the Medes rebelled, and chose Deioces to be their King, and at his command builded him this roiall Citie, and a Pallace of great beautie (the timber whereof was Cedar, ioined with plates of siluer and gold; it was seuen furlongs in compasse) his successours are there reckoned, Phraortes, Cyaxares, Astinges. Iustine reporteth that Arbaces or Arbaces, Lieutenent of the Medes vnder Sardanapalus, rebelled against him for his effeminate life, and translated the Empire from the Assyrians, with whom it had continued threene hundred yeeres, to the Medes. Diodorus Siculus addeth in this conspiracie, vnto this Arbaces the Mede, Belesus, whom some call Phul Beloch the Babylonian, who shared the State betwixt them; the Babylonian possessing Babylonia and Assyria; and Arbaces, Media and Persia. Of this more is said before.

In the time of Ninus, Farnus (saith Diodorus) was King of Media, who, encountering with Ninus in battell, was there taken, with his wife and seuen sonnes: all which the bloudie Conquerour commanded to be crucified. And thus remained Medus hand-maid to the Assyrians, till the time of Sardanapalus; but not without some disquiet. For in Semiramis time the Medes rebelled, and destroied Niniue. But Semiramis inuaded their countrey with a mighty army: and comming to the hill Bagistam, sacred to Iupiter, there pitched her tents; and in the plaine fields made a garden, containing twelue furlongs. Beyond the garden she cut a rocke seventeene furlongs high, grauing therein her owne Image, and an hundred others, bringing her gifts. Some tell this otherwise, that shee pourtraied her owne Image in that huge quantitie, and appointed an hundred Priests continually to attend the same with offerings and diuine worship. At Chaona a Citie of Media, she espying another huge rocke in the plaine, caused another garden to be made in the midst thereof, with sumptuous houses of pleasure therein, whence shee might behold all her armie, and there gaue her selfe a long space to rest and voluptuousnesse, making choice of the likeliest Gallants in her Campe for her bed-fellowes, all whom shee after did to death. Thence to Ecbatana she made the way shorter, and more passeable, casting downe hilles and exalting the vallies valleyes into a plaine, still bearing her name. At Ecbatana <sup>m</sup> she built a Pallace, and brought water thither from the hill Orontes, by a laborious and costly channell. And thus did she not onely subdue the rebellious Medes, but made a conquest of Nature in ostentation of her puissance. The same <sup>n</sup> Author telleth, that multitudes of Sparrowes, which eat vp their seeds, forced the inhabitants to leaue their soile; as did Mice cause some parts of Italie, and Frogges (rained out of the clouds) the Assariote, and (as wee haue obserued) the Fleas chased away the inhabitants of Myus. How great is the Creator, that of the smallest of his creatures can muster armies to the conquest of them which swell in conceit of their owne greatnesse? Wee like Giants by our wickednesse defie the Heauens, and defile the Earth, saying (by our workes) Who is the Almighty, that we should serue him? when as yet this Lord of Hosts need not tame vs with legions of Angels (one could destroy Senacheribs host) nor set the Heauens in their courses to fight his battailes (as against the Cananites) nor arraunge the Elements with an ouer-whelming Chaos to confound vs, by a Sodomiticall fire, or sirie pestilence, or deluge of waters, or deuouring of the earth: nor needs he Lions to challenge a part of this glorie to their strength and prowesse: Frogges, and Lice, and Flies shall be Pharaohs challengers, conquerours, iaylers: And how many Nations in Africa haue the insulting triumphing Grasshoppers exiled from their natie dwellings? Proud man, well may the basest of thy basest seruants thus make thee to see thy basenesse; and by rebelling against thee, argue thy rebellions against their and thy Creator.

But that we be not too farre transported with this nor eniust passion; let vs returne to our Prouince of Media; which Arbaces <sup>q</sup> deliuered from Assyrian seruitude, and subiected it together with the Easterne Empire to himselfe, under whose posteritie it continued three hundred and two and twentie yeeres. Ashyages, the last, was by Cyrus his Nephew, conquered, according to two dreatmes, which had fore-signified this vnto him. In the first he dreamed, that he saw so much hyrne streaming from his daughter Mandane (his only childe) that all Asia was drowned therewith: in the other, a Vine grew from her, which shadowed all Asia. His Magi <sup>r</sup> told him, that hereby was foretold his nephewes greatnesse, with the losse of his kingdome. To preuent this, he wedded his daughter to Cambyses a Persian: and when she was deliuered of a childe, he committed it to Harpagus (one of his trusty Counsellors) to be made away. He fearing reuenge from the daughter, if she should after succeed her father, deliuereth the Infant to Mitradates the Kings Heard-man, commanding him in Ashyages name, to expose it on the mountaine. Hee returning home, found his wife newly deliuered of a dead childe, which, by her entreaty, was laid forth in stead thereof. Her name was Spaco, which in the Median language signifieth a Bitch: whence the fable grew, that Cyrus being so exposed, was nourished by a Bitch. This Infant growing vp, and called by the Heard-mans name, after ten yeeres was knowne by this occasion. <sup>1</sup> A company of boyes playing together, chose this stripling for their King, who vsed his childish royaltie with more then childish discipline. For hee ordained diuers officers, some of them to be his guard, some builders, messengers, &c. as hee thought fit. Amongst whom was a sonne of one Artembares, a man of great estimation, who for neglecting his office, was by this yong kingling seuerely chastised. Hee complained thereof to his father, and the father brought the childe to the King, accusing the indignitie of the fact, that his Heard-mans sonne should deale so malapertly and cruelly, shewing his beaten shoulders to Ashyages. The Heard-man and his supposed sonne were sent for, that Artembares might be satisfied: where the yong King gaue so good account of that his fact, that Ashyages much amazed, tooke the Heard-man aside, and with busie enquirie learned of him all the truth of this matter: wherewith enraged against Harpagus, who ought himselfe to haue done that dismall execution, but dissembeling the same, he told him that he would doe sacrifice for the childes safetie, and bade him send his childe to beare Cyrus companie, inuiting him also to suppe with him, where he feasted him with the flesh of his owne sonne, whose head, fingers, and toes, were set before him at the last seruice. Harpagus bare it as patiently as he could, till fitter occasion of reuenge offered it selfe, which thus fell out. The Magi told Ashyages that that in this childish kingdome of Cyrus, the danger of his dreame was already passed, and that he needed not feare any further danger. Wherefore he was sent into Persia to his parents. After he was now a man, Harpagus, hauing secretly solicited the Medes to rebellion against their cruell Soueraigne, acquainted Cyrus with his proiect, to that end enclosing a letter in a Hares belly, which he sent to Cyrus by one of his handmen: which was with such industrie and successe prosecuted, that Astyages lost his Scepter, and Cyrus translated the Empire to the Persians. For Harpagus being made Generall of the armie of the Medes, reuolted to Cyrus with all such as he had made acquainted with his treason. And when the Medes after rebelled in the time of Darius, they were forced againe to subiection. The Magi were by Astyages command crucified: and he himselfe re-enforcing his power, and bidding battell to Cyrus the second time, was taken alive, and by his nephew set over the Hyrcans.

The Magi had large and fertill possessions (thus reporteth * Ammianus) assigned them in Media. Their Science called Magia, is by Plato termed Machagistia, which mysticall word signifieth the purest worship of the Gods: to which Science Zoroaster of Bactria in old times added many things out of the mysteries of the Chaldees. But because the Persians had from hence their Empire and this religion, by whose armes they were made knowne to the world: there shall bee fitter place to speake of these Magi, when we treat of the Persian Rites. In this Region was made the oile Mithicum, wherein their arrowes were steeped, which being shot out of a looser bow (for a swifter shot extinguished it) did burne the flesh in which it did stick, and if water were applied to it, the fire there of encreased; Nor could any remedy cure the same, but hurling dust thereon. It was composed of Naphtha. The Medes made league with this ceremonie. They wounded the souldiers of each partie, either licked others blood. The North parts of Media were barren, and therefore they lived on Apples, dried and stamped together: of roasted Almons they made bread, and wine of the roots of herbs. This and Venison was their food. In one plaine of Media were pastured fiftie thousand Mares, belonging to the King: the herbe whereon they principally fed, is still called Medica. The race of horses, called Nisai, were heere bred, and hence dispersed all ouer the East.

Among the Medes, none might be King by the law of the Countrey, except he were in stature and strength eminent. All the Medes (saith Bardanes a famous Chaldean) nourish dogges with great care, to which they cast men ready to die (while they are yet breathing) to be deuoured of them.

The Medes worshipped the fire, with barbarous honours done thereto. Their Kings held such Maiestic, that none might laugh or spit before them: They were seldom seene of their people: They had alway Musicians attending them. Their wives and children accompanied them in their battailes.

Media hath beene divided into Media Maior, and Atropatia: the former containeth Tauris; supposed by Ortelius to be the forenamed Ecbatana (yet now wanting walles altogether) containing in circuit fixteene miles, and of people two hundred thousand; subdiuided to the Turke 1585. and before by Selim and Soliman; but since recovered by the Persian, Saltania famous for the fairest Moschee in the East. Caspian, to which the Persian hath removed the royall seat from Tauris. The lake of Van three hundred miles long, and an hundred and fiftie broad (after Strabo, Manlianus Lacus) of salt water the greatest next to Meotic. Gyllius affirmeth, that eight great riuers runne into it, without any apparent issue to the sea.

Arropatia is now called Seruan; the chiefe Citie is Sümächla, or Shamaki, in which the Sophi not long since<sup>b</sup> built a Turret of flint and free-stone, and in a ranke of flints therein did set the heads of the Nobilitie and Gentry of the Countrey, for a terror to the rest: the quarrell was pretended for Religion, intended for Soueraigntie.

Their ancient Religion<sup>i</sup> differed not much from the Persian, and such also is it still. Their Kings had many wiues, which custome extended after to the Villages and mountaines, in so much that they might not haue lesse then seuen. The women<sup>l</sup> also esteemed it a credit to haue many husbands, and a miserable calamitie to haue lesse then five. Cyrus subdued them to the Persians, Alexander to the Macedons. What should we speake of the Parthians? who made Ecbatana their seate royall in the summer time: and of the Saracens, Tartars, Persians and Turkes, who haue successiue-ly vexed these Countreies?

Not farre from Shamaki, saith Master Ienkinson<sup>m</sup>, was an old Castle, called Gullistone (now beaten downe by the Sophi) and not farre from thence a Nunrie of sumptuous building, wherein was buried a Kings daughter, named Ameleck Channa: who slew her selfe with a knife, for that her father would haue forced her (shee professing chastitie) to haue married a Tartar King: vpon which occasion the maidens euery yeare resort thither to bewaile her death.

There is also a high hill called Quiquifs; vpon the top whereof (they<sup>n</sup> say) dwelt a Giant named Arnosse, hauing on his head two great hornes, and eares and eyes like a Horse, and a taile like a Cow, who kept a passage thereby, till one Haucoir Hamsha (a holy man) bound him with his woman Lamsache and his sonne After; who is therefore had in Saint-like reputation.

Gilan, also anciently Gela, is reckoned to Media. Into these Cities of Media the Israelites were transported, together with their Religion by Salmaneser the Assyrian: God in his manifold wisdom so punishing their sinnes, and withall dispersing some sparkes of diuine truth.

PArthia is placed by Pliny<sup>a</sup> in the rootes of the hilles: hauing on the East the Arians; on the West, the Medes; on the South, Carmania; on the North, Hyrcania, rounded with deserts. He affirmeth that the Kingdomes of the Parthians were eightene. Eleuen of them neere to the Caspian sea; and the other seuen neere the red sea. The word Parthian signifieth with the Scythians an exile. Their chiefe Citie was Hecatompylos, now (as some<sup>b</sup> affirme) Hispaham, for the excellencie thereof called of the Persians, Halfe the World. These Scythian exiles in the times of the Assyrians, Medes, Persians, and Macedonians, were an obscure people, the prey of euery Conquerour, which after seemed to diuide the world with the Romans. Their speech was mixt of the Median and Scythian: their armies consisted most part of seruants, which they held in great respect, instructing them in feats of armes. In an armie of fiftie thousand, wherewith they encountered Antony, there were only eight hundred free-men. The Parthians<sup>c</sup> had no vse of gold or siluer, but in their armor. They had many wiues, wherof they were so ielalous, that they forbade them the sight of other men. They performed all buisnes priuate and publike on horse-backe; this being the distinction of free-men from seruants. Their burial was in the bellies of birds, or dogs. Their naked bones were after couered with earth: they were exceedingly superstitious in the worship of their gods: a stout, vnquiet, seditious, vnfaithfull people. Asfages, first a famous theefe, after, the Founder of that Kingdome, left no lesse memorie of himselfe amongst the Parthians, then Cyrus among the Persians, or Alexander among the Macedonians. The day wherein he ouerthrew Selenus, was solemnely obserued euery yeare amongst them, as the beginning of their libertie. Of him they called all their Kings Arfaces; the Roman Emperours are named Casars. They <sup>d</sup> called themselves the brethren of the Sunne and Moone, which are in those places worshipped. This Arfaces was worshipped after his death. They were no lesse bloudie to their brethren, when they came to the Crowne, then the Ottomans are at this day. Phrabartes <sup>e</sup> slew thirty of his brethren, and before them, his father, and after, his sonne, rather then he would endure a possibilitie of a Competitor. About <sup>f</sup> 224. yeares after Christ, Artabanus the last Persian King being slaine by Artaxires or Artaxares the Persian, the Empire returned to the Persians, who were thereof depriued by the Saracens; and they againe by the Tartars: and now for the greatest part vnder the Sophi: they had their cup-quarrels, struing who should draw deepest: which custome we need not goe into Parthia to seeke. Strabo mentioneth among the Parthians a Colledge or Senate of Magi and Wise-men. Their ancient religious Rites I finde not particularly related.

The Parthian affaires are thus by some <sup>g</sup> related. After Alexanders death, none of the Macedonians vouchsafing so meane a Prouince, Stragonor a forreiner obtained it: after which the Macedonians, contending in ciuill quarrels for the Soueraigntie, Parthia wauered in vncertaintie, till in the time of Selenus the nephew of Antiochus, Theodotus, Deputie of Cachia, entituled himselfe King: so giuing example of rebellion to the Easterne Nations, which Arfaces among the Parthians easily followed. He combining himselfe with Theodotus, and after his death, with his sonne, strengthened himselfe in his new erected government of two Cities. But Selenus taking armes against him, was by him ouerthrowne in battell: which day first gaue light to the Parthian greatnesse, not vnworthily obserued therefore of their posteritie with solemnities. For Selenus being by more important affaires called home, the Parthians had leasure to establish their hopes. Athenaus reporteth that Arfaces tooke him prisoner, and after gentle vsage he sent him home.

After this first, came a second Arfaces, who encountered with Antiochus the sonne of Selenus, comming against him with an armie of an hundred thousand foot-men, and twentie thousand horse. The issue was, they parted friends in mutuall league. Priapatius or Pampatius was their third King, to whom Phraates his sonne succeeded; and next, his brother Mithradates, who subdued the Medes and Helimæans, enlarging the Parthian Empire, from Mount Caucasus to Euphrates. He tooke Demetrius King of Syria prisoner: and died in his old age. His sonne Phraates was the fourth: on whom Antiochus warred, and the Parthian opposed against him his brother Demetrius, till then detained prisoner. But while he warred against the Scythians, by treason of his owne subiects he was slaine; and Artabanus his vncle placed in his roome. Hee also soone after died of a wound receiued in the field: and his sonne Mithridates succeeded, whom the Parthian Senate expelled and deposed. But others reckon betweene Artabanus and Mithridates, Pacornus, and his sonne Phraates. So vncertaine is the Parthian Historie; for which cause also <sup>h</sup> Scaliger blameth Onuphrius for being too peremptorie in such vncertainties.

Next in order is reckoned Orodes or Herodes, who besieged his said brother Mithradates in Babylon, and tooke both it and him, and caused him to be slaine in his sight. Against him Crassus the Roman Consul (moued with couetousnes, <sup>i</sup> hatefull to God and man, saith Florus) led the Roman Legions to winne the Parthian gold: And by the way, <sup>k</sup> passing thorow Iudæa, spoiled the sacred Treasure which Pompey spared, amounting to two thousand talents, and robbed the Temple of eight thousand talents besides. Hee also carried away a beame of solid gold, weighing three hundred Alina (euery Alina is two pound and a halfe Roman) deliuered vnto him by Eleazarus the Treasurer, vpon condition to take nothing else. But Crassus violated the oath which he had giuen to Eleazarus, and carried all hee liked. Many dismall <sup>l</sup> prelages prohibited Crassus this expedition, as the curses of the Tribune, whom Dion, Plutarch, and Appian call Ateius Capito. Those curses were denounced with inuocation of some vnkowne gods. Also the Roman ensignes were drowned, with sudden tempests pestis in Euphrates: and when<sup>m</sup> he had sacrificed to Vannu, his sonne stumbled and fell, and Crassus with him. He rejected the Legats of the Parthian, alledging the former league with Pompey. Thus posting to his destruction, one Mazatru (as Florus calls him; or as Plutarch; Ariamnes; Dion, and Appianus name him Augartu) encountered him, not with armes, but with artes and wiles, professing great hostilitie to the Parthians. Crassus following his aduice, led his army into by-waies and deserts, til being brought into the Parthian snares, his new guide forsooke him, and the couetous Consul, with his sonne were slaine, and eleven Roman Legions taken or left in the place. His head and periured right hand were sent by Surina the Parthian Generall (who was said to haue then in the field with him twelve hundred Concubines; and a thousand Camels laden with his owne furniture) vnto King Orodes: who contumeliously, (if contumelie and meric can ioyne societie) vsed the same, powring into his iawes, sometimes greedie of that metall, molten gold. Orodes enuying Surina the glory of this victorie, slew him, and committed the remnants of that warre to be pursued by his sonne Pacorus, adioyning to him in that exploit Osaces. In the ciuill warres they tooke part with Pompey against Caesar. Pacorus being receiued into societie of the Kingdom with his father, inuaded Iudæa, and placing Antigonu in the Kingdome, captiued Hircannu. But whiles he aspired to greater hopes, he lost himselfe and his armie, in which were twentie thousand horse-men, in a battell with Ventidamu; who by a wily Stratageme, counterfeiting flight and feare, and suffering the Parthians to come vp to their tents, that they had now no space for their artowes, effected this ouerthrow.

Pacorus his head reduced the Cities of Syria to the Roman subiection, without further warre. This newes made his father madde, who before boasting of the conquest of Asia by Pacorus, now in many dayes did neither speake nor eate: but when he once did open his mouth, all his speech was Pacorus, who still seemed present vnto him. In this extaticall moode, Phraates, one of his thirtie sonnes, which he had by so many Concubines, slew him, and after them his brethren, as before is said, with a sonne also of his owne. This crueltie caused many Parthians to betake themselues to voluntarie exile, among which Monases prouoked<sup>a</sup> Antonius to warre vpon this Tyrant. He did so, but with bad successe, of fixteene Legions scarce bringing the third part backe againe. Phraates, impotent and vncapable of so glorious aduentures, grew into such insolencies, that the people exiled him, and placed Tiridates in his roome; who was soon after displaced by the Scythians, and Phraates restored to his place. Tiridates fled to Augustus (then warring in Spaine) for refuge and aide, carrying with him the sonne of Phraates, whom Caesar sent backe againe to his father without any price, maintaining neither partie against the other, but allowing liberall prouision to Tiridates.

But after this, Augustus going into the East, the Parthian fearing ill measure, redelivered all the Roman captiues, and ensignes, and gaue hostages also, his two sonnes, with their wiues and children, and resigned Armenia to the Romans. Phraatax his son slew him, with greatest iniustice repaying that which was most iust, and due to his former parricide. This Phraatax, vsing incestuous acquaintance with his mother Thermusa (an Italian, whom Augustus had bestowed on Phraates, and by whose helpe hee was slaine) was killed in an vprore, leauing his sonne Orodes his successor. He also in a conspiracie was killed: and Vonon substituted, whom the Parthians not long enduring, forced to seeke helpe of the Romans, where he was perfidiously slaine.

naspates succeeded: and soone after Vologases, who left here his sonne of the same name, deprived by his brother Artabanus. He being vniustly dealt with by the Romans trecherie, draue them to sue for peace: which, after that Antoninus the author of the breach was dead, was easily obtained by Macrinus his successor. But Artabanus a Persian preuailed better, in a third battell overthrowing him, and reducing the Kings dome after such a world of yeares to the Persian name. Some reckon this 472. yeares from Asaces, and 228. after Christ. Scaliger reckoneth the time of the Parthian Dynastie 479. yeares. The number of their Kings after this computation is nine and twentie. They which list to see further of their warres with the Romans, may read the Roman Authors which haue written the same: the summe whereof is here presented to your view.

Cornelius Tacitus tells a merry tale (for I thinke these tragedies haue wearied you) and pertinent to our purpose, of a good fellow-like Heracles, whom the Parthians worshipped. This kind hearted god warneth his Priests in a dreame, that neere to his Temple they should see horses readie furnished for hunting, which they doe, lading them with quiuers full of arrowes. These after much running vp and downe the Forrest, returne home at night blowing and breathlesse, their quiuers being emptied. And Heracles (no nigard of his vision) acquainteth the Priests at night by another vision with all his disport, what woods he hath ranged, and the places of his game. They searching the places, finde the slaine beasts;

Better fellowship, certaine, had their Heracles, then their Kings, when they invited any to their feasts. For the King had his table alone and lofty, the guests sit below on the ground, and, like dogges, feed on that which the King casteth to them. And many times vpon occasion of the Kings displeasure, they are haled thence and scourged, and yet they then, prostrate on the ground, adore their striker. They worshipped the Sunne at his rising. Bardanes in Eusebius, saith of them, that to kill his wife, or sonne, or daughter, or brother, or sister (yet vnmarried) was not prohibited by the law to any Parthian, nor any way subiect to punishment. The Parthian ensigne was a Dragon; the royall ensigne a bow: their stile was, King of Kings; they ware double crowne. They had an oyntment made of a certaine composition, which no private man might vse. Nor might any else drinke of the waters of Chonspes and Eulan. None might come to the King without a present. The Magi were in great authoritie with them. Their Rites were mixt of the Persian and Scythian. Nothing was more severely punished then adulterie. A seruant might not be made free, nor might be suffered (except in the warres) to ride, or a free-man to goe on foot. Their fight was more dangerous in flying, then in standing or giuing the onser.

They account them the most happie which are slaine in battell. They which die a naturall death are vbraided with cowardise. Their fight Lucan describeth:

Et melior cessisse loco, quam pellere, miles:
Illi a terra dolis, nec Mariem cominus unquam
Ansa pati virtus, sed longè tendere nervos.*

That is,

Light skirmish, fleeing warre, and scattered bands,
And better souldiers when they runne away,
Then to beare off an enemy that stands.
Their craftie caltrops on the ground they lay:
Nor dares their courage come to right-downe blowes,
But fighteth further off most trusting to their bowes.

Many Cities amongst them, and two thousand Villages are said to haue beene overwhelmed with Earth-quakes. They are said to be of spare diet, to eate no flesh, but that which they take in hunting: to feed with their swords girt to them, to eat Locusts: to be false lyers and perfidious: to haue store of wiues and strumpets. Their countrey is now called Arach; in it is made great quantitie of silkes. Isidorus Characenus<sup>d</sup> hath set down the seuerall countries, with their dimensions, how many Schani each of them containeth, with their chiefe Cities, and their waies and distances; which giueth great light to Geography, and the knowledge of the Parthian greatnesse. Schani is accounted threescore furlongs.

Hyrcania (now called Straua or Diargument) hath on the West, Media; on the East Margiana; on the South, Parthia; on the North, the Sea, which hereof is called the Hyrcane, otherwise Caspian. Famous it hath beene, and is, for store of woods and Tygers. There are also other wilde beasts. Here in the Citie Nabarca was an Oracle, which gaue answers by dreames.

Some Riuer in this countrey haue so steepe a fall into the Sea, that vnder the waters the people resort to sacrifice or banquet: the streame shooting violently ouer their heads, without wetting them. Ionius writeth, That the ayre is vnwholsome by reason of the Fennes. Straua the chiefe Citie aboundeth in trafficke for Silke. The Ilands before it in the Sea, were no lesse refuge to the inhabitants in the Tamberlaine-tempest, then to the Italians in the time of Attila, those places where now Venice standeth. Their Religion, as their State, both in times past and present, hath followed the Persian, of whom we are next to speake.

It is reported<sup>f</sup> of the Tappiri, inhabiting neere to Hyrcania, That their custome was to bestow their wiues on other men, when they had borne them two or three children: so did Cato his wife Martia, on Hortensius: and such, saith Vertomannus, is the custome at this day of the Indians in Calechut, to exchange wiues in token of friendship.

They had wine in such estimation, that they annointed their bodies therewith. The Caspj shut vp their parents, after they are come to the age of seuentie years, and there in respect of pietie (what more could the impious doe?) starue them to death. Some say, That after that age they place them in some desert, & a farre off obserue the euent. If the fowles seize on them with their talents, and teare them out of their coffins, they account it a great happinesse: not so, if dogs or wilde beasts prey thereon. But if nothing meddle therewith, it is accounted a miserable and lamentable case. The Derbices account all faults (though neuer so small) worthy of the utmost punishment. The Earth was their Goddesse: to their holies they admitted nothing female, nor to their tables. They killed such as were aboue seuentie yeares old, calling to that bloody banquet their neighbours, esteeming such miserable, as by disease were intercepted and taken away. Olde womens flesh they eate not; but strangled, and then buried them: they likewise buried such as died before that age.

CHAP. IIII.

Of Persia, and the Persian State, vntill the Mahometan conquest.

Persia, if we take it strictly, is thus bounded by<sup>a</sup> Ptolomey: It hath on the North, Media; on the East, Carmania; on the West, Sufiana; on the South, part of the Persian Gulfe. But this name is sometimes stretched as farre, as that wide and spacious Kingdome; all that Empire being often called in Authors, Persia, and differing in the bounds and limits, according to the enlarging or contracting of that Monarchie. It is supposed, that the Persians descended of Elam, the sodne of<sup>a</sup> Shem; whose name remained vnto a Region called Elamais, mentioned by<sup>b</sup> Ptolomey, placed in the North partes of Media. Pliny mentioneth<sup>c</sup> the Elamites, on the South next to the Sea, which name Ierome<sup>d</sup> in his daies gaue to one of that nation, frater quidam Elamita, &c. Xenophon also nameth the Tribe of the Elamites. Moses telleth of the reigne and power of Chederlaomer King of Elam,<sup>e</sup> in that morning of the world extended to the borders of Canaan. Herodotus reportes, that they were call'd of the Greeks Cephene; of the neighboring nations, Artes, Suidas affirms that they were call'd of the inhabitants Magog, & Magnesai.

Other names are by Ortelius <sup>h</sup> added, Chorſori, Achamenij, Panchaia, &c. It was called Persia of Persens the ſonne of Danae, or of Perſes the ſonne of Andromeda; or (as others) of Perſes the ſonne of Medea.

From the time of Cbeordaomer, whom Abram with his houſhold-armie ouerthrew, vntill the time of Cyrus, little mention is made of them: he freed them from the Median ſeruitude, and erected firſt that mightie Perſian Monarchie. Bizarus <sup>i</sup> (which hath written twelue bookes of the Perſian affaires) ſuppoſeth that in that time of their ſubiection to the Affyrians and Medes, they had Gouvernours, and lawes, of their own:
 onely owing a tributarie ſubiection to the other, as their ſupreme Lords. This he collecteth out of Xenophon. Cyrus was by name foretold by Eſay <sup>k</sup>, and the re-building of Ieruſalem, and the Temple, by his authoritie, before that Babylonian Monarchie was erected which deſtroyed them. God after revealed to Nebuchadnezzar and Dan- iel by dreames, this Perſian both riſing and fall. And by dreames did he make way va-to the effecting of his decree; as appeareth in Herodotus, Infine and others. For Aſi- ages <sup>l</sup> dreaming that he ſaw a Vine growing out of the wombe of his daughter Man- dane, which couered all Aſia (interpreted by his Wizards, of the ſubuerſion of his Kingdome by his daughters future iſſue) married her, as before is ſaid, to Cambyſes, a Perſian, deſcended of the ſtock of Persens ſonne of Iupiter, and Danae, and the ſon of Achamenes, * that ſo in that remote Region, meanes might faile vnto any aſpiring deſignes. The Chaldzans report, as Alphans recordeth out of Megaſthenes, that Ne- buchodonosor hauing conquered all Libya, and Aſia, as farre as Armenia, at his returne, rauiſhed with diuine furie, cried out, That a Perſian Mule ſhould come, and ſubdue the Babylonians. This agrees ſomewhat both with the dreame, and the madneſſe recorded of that King by Daniel, Chap. 2. and 4. The Oracle of Delphos made like anſwer to Craſus, That the Lydians ſhould then flee, when a Mule ſhould gouerne the Medes. He was termed a Mule, * becauſe of his more noble parentage by the mother, then the father, and their diuerſitie of Nation. Strabo <sup>m</sup> thinkes he was called Cyrus of a River in Perſia, being before called Agradatus. Plutarch <sup>n</sup> ſaith, he was called Cyrus of the Sun, which with the Perſians hath that name. Polyanius <sup>o</sup> calleth his wife Nitetis, daughter of Aprias King of Egypt. Suidas ſaith it was Bardane, and that ſhe was daughter of Cyaxares, otherwiſe called Darius Medus. He conquered the Median Empire firſt; and after added two others, the Lydian and Babylonian. Craſus the Lydian conſulting with the Oracle about the ſucceſſe of his warre, receiued anſwer:

Κροῖς ὁ ἄλλω διαβὰς μεγάλης ἀρχῆς καταλύσει,

That is,

This he interpreted of the ouerthrowe of Cyrus, but proued it in himſelfe; Craſus his ſonne had beene mute, till (now ſeeing the ſword of the enimie readie to giue the firall ſtroake vnto his father) violence of ſudden paſſion brake open thoſe barres and ſtoppes which Nature had ſet before as impediments to his ſpeech, * and by his firſt moſt fortunate-infortunate language, cried to the bloudie ſouldiers to ſpare his father. After his many great exploits, he warred vpon Thamyris the Scythian Queen, where he loſt his life. I know not how, Diuine Prouidence ſeemeth to haue ſet thoſe Scythian ſtints to the Perſian proceedings; thoſe great Monarches, both in the elder and our later world, euer finding thoſe Northerne windes croſſing, and in ſome di-ſmall ſucceſſe prohibiting their ambition that way..

Cyrus was of ſo firme memorie, that he could call all the ſouldiers ( ſome ſay but all that had any place of command) by their proper names. He ordained, that his ſouldiers ſhould in the firſt ioyning with the enimie ſing certaine Hymnes to Caſtor & Pollux, that by this means they ſhould not be ſurpriſed with ſudden feare. He gaue leaue to the Iewes to return and re-people their country, and to re-build the Temple. A.M. 3419.
Ezra calleth this the firſt yeare of Cyrus; not the firſt of his raigne, but of his  Eaſtern
Monarchie, as in his Ediſt himſelfe proclaymeth; The Lord God of heauen hath giuen me all the Kingdomes of the earth. For after he had overcome Darius Medus (whom Ber- ſus calleth Nabonnius) in battell, and forced him to keepe himſelfe in Borſippa: hee beſieged

besieged and obtained Babylon, where spending som time for the settling of his affairs, he after that forced Darius to yeelde; and returning to Babylon, made a conquest of Sufiana. All which atchieued, the ninth yeare after the taking of Babylon, the seuentieth of the Iewish Captiuitie, the nine and twentieth of his raigne, and the first of that his Babylonian Empire, he made the Decree aboue mentioned, and died the second yeare after. It is probable also, that the Persians who held Cyrus in such veneration, began their Era, or new Computation, from this time of his settled Empire: an honor giuen after by the Easterne world to Alexander in like manner. The Babylonian Kingdome was thus diuided and giuen to the Medes and Persians; first to Darius, by bloud<sup>Dan. 5. 28.</sup> and descent a Mede, and after, by conquest to Cyrus a Persian.

We haue large Fragments of Ctesias (who was present in the battell betweene Alexander and Cyrus, as was Xenophon also, who hath written the same at large) collected and reserued by Photius, who saith, hee had read foure and twentie bookes of this Ctesias his Perfica, in which he much differeth from the reports of Herodotus; professing, that he had cyther seene those things which he writeth, or receiued them of the Persians themselves. He affirmeth that Astygas (so he calleth Astyages) was nothing of kinne to Cyrus, but being by him conquered, was first imprisoned, and after enlarged and kindly intreated; Cyrus taking his daughter Amytis (her husband Spytama being slaine) to his wife. He subdued the Bactrians, and tooke Amorges King of the Sace prisoner. But his wife Sparethra with an armie of three hundred thousand men, and two hundred thousand women, came against Cyrus, and taking him and Parmyses the brother of Amytis prisoners, in exchange of them redeemed her husband. Amorges after this helped Cyrus in his warres against Crasus, who (the Citie being taken, and his sonne, which had bene giuen in hostage, slaine before his face) fledde into Apollos Temple, whence by magical illusions he made an escape; and being taken againe and bound faster, his hands with thunder and lightning were loosed, whereupon Cyrus freed him, and gaue him the Citie Barene, neere to Ecbatana. Cyrus after that warred against the Derbices, who by the help of the Indians and Elephants, ouerthrew Cyrus, who receiued there a wound by an Indian, whereof hee three dayes afterwards died. But by helpe of Amorges the Derbices were overcome, and their King Amorans slaine with his two sonnes. Cyrus before his death made Cambyfes his eldest sonne his heire, and Tanyoxarces his younger, Lord of the Bactrians, Choramnians and Parthians, and set Spytades sonne of Spytama ouer the Derbices. He raigned thirtie yeares.

Cambyfes (Ctesias addeth in his twelfth booke) sent his fathers bodie into Persia. He warred vpon Egypt, and sent Amyrtæus the King with sixe thousand Egyptians Captiues into Susa, hauing slaine fiftie thousand Egyptians, and lost seuen thousand and two Persians. In the meane time Sphendadates one of the Magi, being corrected by Tanyoxarces for some offence, accused him to Cambyfes his brother, who caused him to die with a draught of Bulls blood, deceiuing his mother and his brothers followers, as if he had put the Magus to death for that slaunder. And so neerely did they resemble each other, that Sphendadates was sent to the Bactrians, where five yeares after, the mysterie of this inquitie was detected by Tybethens an Eunuch (by him chastened) vnto Amytis, who, when shee could not obtaine him of Cambyfes to punishment, poysoned her selfe. Cambyfes after hee had reigned eighteene yeares, died at Babylon of a wound which he had receiued in his thigh, by whittling a stick to passe thway the time, hauing receiued before direfull presages of this disaster, in his sacrifice not bleeding, and Roxane bringing him forth a sonne without a head. Bagapates and Artasfyras his chiefe Eunuches procured the Kingdome to the Magus, reigning with the name of Tanyoxarces, till Ixabates detected him, who fleeing into a Temple was drawne thence and slaine. But seuen chiefe men, Onophas, Idernes, Norodabates, Mardonius, Barises, Ataphernes and Darius sonne of Hystaspes, conspired against the Magus, and by the helpe of Artasfyras and Bagapates slew him in his bed-chamber, hauing reigned seuen moneths, ordaining the solemne festiuall Magaphonia in remembrance thereof.

Princes had before agreed) built him a Sepulchre in his life time, in a hill; which when he would haue seene, the Chaldzans forbad him, and his parents curious of that sight, were let downe by the Priests with ropes: but they terrified by the sudden sight of Serpents, let goe their hold, and Darius for that losse of his parents slaine in the fall, cut off the heads of the Priests, in number fortie. Hee marched with eight hundred thousand men into Europe against the Scythians; but returning with losse, died after hee had raigned one and thirtie yeares. But before wee follow Ctesias any further, let vs see what the common report by Herodotus and others hath deliuered of these proceedings: and let the iudicious Reader chuse whom he will embrace. Scaliger and others, rather follow Herodotus, who relateth of Cambyzes, that succeeding his father, he tooke, and after slew Psammenitus King of Egypt. And when hee would haue added Ethiopia to his new Conquests, with the spoyles of the Temple of Ammon, for which purposes he sent two Armies; the one was almost consumed with famine, the beasts and prouisions fayling, and that barren desert denying grasse; the remainder by consuming one another, were (a strange remedie) preferred from consumption, euery tenth man being by lot tithed to the shambles, and more returning in their fellowes mawes, then on their owne legges. The other Armie was quite buried in the sands. At his returne, finding the Egyptians solemnizing the feast of their Idoll Apis, he slew the same (it was a Bull which they worshipped): and after dreaming that Smerdis reigned, he sent, and slew his brother which was so called, in vaine seeking to frustrate this presage, which was fulfilled in another of that name. He fell in loue with his sister; and asking whether it were lawfull for him to marrie her, the Iudges (whose authority with the Persians lasted with their liues) answered, that they had no such lawe, but they had another, that the King of Persia might doe what him liked; whereupon he married her. His crueltie appeared, in that Prexaspes presuming to admonish him of his too much inclination to drunkennesse, he answered, he should see proofe of the contrarie, and presently sending for Prexaspes his sonne, with an Arrow shot him to the heart: the father not daring but to commend his steadie hand and Art in shooting. He died of this owne sword, which falling out of his scabberd as hee mounted his Horse, killed him, not fearing in this countrey of Syria any such disadventure, because the Oracle of Latona in Egypt had tolde him hee should die at Ecbatana; which he vnderstood of Media, and was fulfilled at another Ecbatana (more obscure) in Syria. He caused a Iudge, which had bene corrupted with money, to be slayed, and made of his skinn a couering for the Tribunall. Polyænus tells, That against the Egyptians hee vsed this stratageme; to set their Gods (Dogges, Cates, Sheepe, &c.) in the fore-front of his battaile. He neyther deserued nor obtained that honourable funerall which Cyrus had, who was buried at Pasargadæ, a Tower shadowed with trees, hauing in the vpper part a Chappell furnished with a bed of Golde, a Table, Cuppes, and Vessels of the same metall, with store of Garments and Furniture, set with Iewels. Certaine Magi were appointed to attend it, with daily allowance of a Sheepe, and once a moneth a Horse for sacrifice. His Epitaph was, O man, I am Cyrus, King of Asia, Founder of the Persian Empire; therefore enuie me not a Sepulchre. Alexander opened the same in hope of Gold, but found nothing, sauing a rotten Shield, a Sword, and two Scythian Bowes: he crowned it with Golde, and couering it with his owne apparrell, departed. These things Strabo, Arriannus, and Curtius report.

Next to Cambyzes succeeded, for a small time, one Smerdis, which was slaine as an Vsurper, by the seuen Princes; and Darius, the sonne of Hystaspes, succeeded, designed to that greatnesse by the first neighing of his Horse. For when no male issue royal was left, these Princes agreed, That meeting in a place appointed, he whose horse first neighed, should be acknowledged Emperour. Darius his horse-keeper, the night before, had suffered his Horse there to vse his brutish lust with a Mare; which the place presently causing him to remember, he there (by his lustfull neighing) aduanced his Master to the Scepter. Darius for his couetousnesse (first exadting tribute) was called a Merchant, Cambyzes a Lord, Cyrus a Father of his people. Babylon rebelled, and was recovered by the costly stratageme of Zopyrus, who cut off his nose and eares, and fleeing in that deformed plight to the Babylonians, accused Darius of that cruelty. (Ctesias telleth this of Megabyzus.) They beleevuing, entertained him, and knowing his Nobilitie and Prowesse, committed their Citie to his fidelitie, which he vpon the next opportunitie betraied to his Master: Darius warred against the Scythians, but unfortunately. His Armie was of 700000. men. After Darius his death Xerxes reigned (whom Sealiger proueth to be Assuerus, the husband of Esther.) He made league with the Carthaginians, warred vpon the Grecians with an Armie (as Herodotus numbred) of 1700000. footmen, 80000. horsemen, 20000. Chariot men: Others say, That there were 2317000. footmen in Land-forces, besides 1208. shippes. Ctesias hath only 800000. men besides Chariots, and 1000. saile of shippes. Before the Armie was drawne the sacred Chariot of Insper, by eight white horses; no mortal man might ascend the Seat. He offered to Miserna at Troy 1000. Oxen. He, taking view of his huge Armie, wept, in thinking, that of all that number in 100. yeeres none would be alue. At the passing of the Hellespontike Straits, he (besides other deuotious performed) at the Sunne-rising tooke a golden Viall full of sacred liquor, and cast the same into the Sea, with a golden Bowle and a Persian Sword; vncertaine whether in honour of the Sunne, or in satisfaction to the angrie Hellespont, which a little before, in more then made arrogance, he had caused to be whipped, and hurled fetters therein, with many menacing threats. He wrote letters with like threatnings to Mount Athos, and accordingly pierced his bowels, and made way by force therow that high and huge Mountaine. This Expedition was in the yeere of the World 3470. Leonides, with his Spartans, enlarged his glorie at the Thermopylzan Straits<sup>d</sup>, or narrow passage, which a long time, with a handfull of men, hindred the Persians from passing. Mardonius was slaine, and Xerxes fled out of Greece, after he had taken Athens, and lost great part of his Armie, which in two yeeres space receiued fise ouerthrowes, at Thermopylze, at Artemisium, at Salamis, at Platæe, at Mycale. Xerxes being slaine of Artabazus his kinsman, A. M. 3485. Artaxerxes succeeded, in whose time Egypt rebelled, helped therein by Inarus and the Grecians.

Among other the mad parts of Xerxes, it is reported, That hee fell in loue with a Plane Tree in Lydia, which he adorned with chaines and costly furniture, and appointed a Guardian thereto. Artaxerxes writ to Hyfanes, Gouernour of Hellespontus, That he should giue Hippocrates Cons (who then liued, and whose writings still remaine the Physitians Oracles) as much Gold and other things as he would, and send him vnto him. In his time the Egyptians rebelled, and created Inarus their King, to whom the Athenians sent three hundred Gallies for defence; but by Artabazus and Megabyzus they were subdued. Artaxerxes died A. M. 3525.

After this Artaxerxes, surnamed Long-hand, another Xerxes succeeded and reigned a small time, as did also Sogdianus, or Ogdianus, or (so Ctesias calleth him) Secyndianus, whom Darius Nothus slew, and possessed the Throne. Ctesias nameth him Ochus, and saith that he changed his name to Darius. In the time of this King was the Peloponnesian Warre, which Thucydides hath related. Artaxerxes Mnemon his sonne succeeded A. M. 3545. Hee slew his brother Cyrus; Ctesias was there present with Artaxerxes, whom hee cured of a wound giuen him on the breast by Cyrus, with whom was then present and partaker that great Philosopher, Captaine, and Historian heereof, Xenophon. Artaxerxes was a name giuen (as some write) to all the Persian Kings: it signifieth a great warriour, as Briffon and Drysius obserue. This Mnemon reigned 40. yeeres. After his death succeeded Ochus, and reigned three and twentie yeeres. Next to him was Arses, or Arfames; and last of all Darius, whom Alexander ouerthrew the second time at Arbela, A. M. 3619. and conquered that Persian Monarchie to the Macedonians. Of the Macedonian successors of Alexander (so much as concerneth this place) is before handled in our Syrian relation. They were deprived of these parts by Arfaxes, of whom and all his Parthian followers, euen now yee haue read in the Chapter of Parthia.

bours of Scaliger, Iunius, and many others, both Rabbines, and Greekes, and Latines, in whose streams Elephants may swimme, and the greatest Students may finde enough to busie their studious braines: for me, it is sufficient to taste, or at least to enter so farre as a Lambe may safely wade, without perill of drowning. The Hebrewes, through ignorance of the Olympiades, and humane Authors (where they are destitute of their owne) are most absurd, some reckoning but foure Persian Kings in all, till Alexanders time: some<sup>h</sup> account five: and some<sup>i</sup> three. Against these, Pererius and Temporarij * most sharply (and not vnworthily) inueigh, as also against their<sup>k</sup> Chronicles, which ascribe to the Persians, from the first yeere of Darius the Mede, but two and fiftie yeeres. Iosephus better seene in Ethnike Authors dissenteth from them. As for Metasthenes of Annius, wee haue before shewed him to be counterfet, and the rest of his brethren, to be either the bastards of Annius, or Changelings, which hee hath nursed, and would father vpon those Authors, whose names they beare. Vines * call them Portentosa, & vel solo auditu horrenda, monstrous reports, dregges, frivolous pamphlets of vncertaine Authors; which, if any be in loue with, he may enioy without him his corruall. <sup>l</sup> Goropius bestowes much paines in the vncasing of them; and learned men<sup>m</sup> doe now generally distaste them. Iosephus cites Metasthenes in quatuor Indicorum, the fourth Booke of his Indian Historie; from whence Petrus Comestor alledgeth the same testimonie, with deprauiing the word Indicorum, and making it Indiciorum. Annius addes, not onely the corrupting of the name Metasthenes for Metasthenes, but a Historie vnder his<sup>o</sup> name, de Indicio Temporum & Annalium Persarum, wherein no maruell if he proceed in the Storie as he began in the Title. Beroaldus p in the Persian Chronologie saineth diuers names to the Persian Kings; as Assuerus, Artaxerxes, Darius Assyrius, Artaxerxes Pius, Liuey, and other moderne Writers out of the Greeke Olympiads and Histories, haue giuen truer account of the Persian Times and Government, beginning with the fise and fiftieth Olympiad, and continuing the same to the third yeere of the hundred and twelfth.

Scaliger and Caluissius (as you haue seene before) doe a little differ from this account of M. Liuey, which he liuely proueth by conference of other Histories, both Humane and Ecclesiasticall, Clemens, Eusebius, Herodotus, Diodorus, Polybius, Xenophon, Thucydides, Dionysius Halicarnassensis, Liuey, and others. As much adoe is made about the beginning and ending of Daniels weekes, and the time of the building and finishing the second Temple, both which are much illustrated by the right knowledge of the Persian Chronologie. Iunius q, Liuey r, and some others begin the account of the threescore and ten weekes, and reckon the building of the second Temple, in the second yeere of Darius Nothus *, to whose reasons I referre the Reader, and returne to our Persian affaires. How this Persian Empire agreed to the dreame of Nabuchodonosor and the Visions of Daniel, Broughton t, Keusnerus, and others haue written; it were too tedious heere to relate. Artaxerxes (others call him, perhaps more truly, Artaxares) recovered the Persian Name and Empire fise hundred thirty eight yeeres, as Bizarus, Lib. 4. reckoneth, after Alexander the Great had extinguished them, and in the yeere of our Lord 236. Others say it was in the yeere of Christ 233. and in the yeere of the World 4182. and 563. after Alexanders Conquest: others otherwise. The Catalogue of the Persian Kings in that their second Dynastie, you may reade before, Lib. 1. r. 13.

OF THE SECOND PERSIAN DYNASTIE.

A Artaxares being a man of haughtie spirit, fought three battailes with Artabanus the Parthian, and at the third time depriued him of Life and Scepter together. He proceeded to subdue the neighbouring Barbarians; and passing ouer Tigris, disturbed the Romane Province of Mesopotamia, deuouring in hope, and threatening in tearmes, all those Asian Prouinces, sometimes subiect to the Persians, before the Macedonian deluge. Alexander Senerus (sonne of Mamma) the Emperor writ to him, to stay his course: But Pikes, not Pens, were like to preuaile with Artaxares, who brought into the Field seuen hundred Elephants, and eightene hundred Chariots, and many thousands sands of horsemen, but with much bloodshed was forced to leaue the honour of the day to the Romanes. Herodianus seemeth to write harder fortunes of the Romanes in this warre. But Lampridius, Entropius, Orosius, and Zosimus write, That Seuerus obtained the victorie, and tooke Ctesiphon and Babylon, and subdued also Arabia. Agathias affirmeth, That Artaxares was called Magnus.

Valerianus was ouerthrowne by Sapores, the successor of Artaxares, in Mesopotamia, and there taken, and was made a foot-stoole for Sapores, on whose necke he vsed to tread, when hee tooke horse; and at last was slayed aliue, and sprinkled with Salt. Zosimus saith, That he was trecherously taken at a meeting for conference: and Trebellius Pollio ascribeth it to the treason of his guide. This cruell Tyrant afflicted the Roman Provinces, to Cilicia and Cappadocia, filling with dead bodies the broken spaces betwene the Hills, feeding (as it were) those deformed gaping iawes with cruell banquets of mans flesh. Odenatus Palmirinus brought some light to the Romans in this darkened and dreadfull Eclipse of their Sunne, and recovered the Roman Territories. His wife Zenobia after his death, like another Semiramis, proued a fortunate Generall and Warriour against the Persians, and also against the Romans, from whom she withheld Syria, till Valerius Aurelianus carried her to Rome, being by vnexpected accident surpris'd. As for Valerianus, it was the iust iudgement of God for his cruell persecution of the Christians, whom he had at first fauoured, till one of the Egyptian Priests had perswaded him to this and other wickednesse, as humane sacrifices, and such like. Euseb. l. 7. c. 9. He was taken of Sapores, An. Dom. 260. after Caluissius computation, Tertullianus hath two yeeres lesse.

In the time of Probus the Persians sued for peace, and obtained it; hee procuring such peace in the East (saith Vopiscus) that a rebellious Mouse was not heard to peepe. Cornelius his successor warred against the Persians, and hauing entred their Countrey as farre as Ctesiphon, was slaine with a Thunderbolt (no Romane Emperour, by I know not what secret destinie, from the time of Crassus, passing those parts, without vnfortunate successe.) This was An. Dom. 283.

Diocletian sent Galerius against Narses the Persian, sonne to Varranes, or Varranes, the second: (for after Sapores, Hormisdas his sonne had reigned a yeere; Varranes the first, three yeeres; Varranes the second, fixteene; and a third of that name onely some moneths, as Agathias reckoneth.) But not farre from Carthæ (satall to the Romans) Galerius Caesar lost almost all his Armie, and therefore found homely welcome in his returne, Diocletian suffering him to lacquey (in his Purple Robes) some miles after his chariot. Indignation supplying his former defects, hee recovered his credit with the ouerthrow of the Persians; Narses fled, leauing his wiues, sisters, and children to the Conquerour. A League was made, with returne of Armenia, Mesopotamia, and Assyria to the Romans.

Misdates the Persian began his raigne An. Dom. 301. To him An. 309. succeeded his sonne Sapores, and reigned (which I thinke was neuer read of any) longer then hee liued in view of the world, beginning his raigne before his birth, which he continued threescore and ten yeeres. For Misdates dying without issue male, and leauing his wife great with childe, the Princes consulted with the Magi, whether this future birth would be a male; which they affirmed, obseruing their predictions by a Mare, then ready to foale: and the Princes set on the Crowne, or Royall Ensigne, on the mothers belly, acknowledging him for their King. This Sapores, in a letter to Constantinus the Emperour, intituled himselfe King of Kings, partaker of the Starrs, brother of the Sunne and Moone: he demanded all that had before belonged to the Persians, to be restored. Betwixt them grew a bloudie warre, as Ammianus relateth. Sapores tooke Singara and Bezabde, An. Dom. 359. but was repelled into Persia by Constantinus. Iulian his successour seeking to subdue the Persian, lost himselfe. The best part of himselfe he had lost before in Apostasie, which plucked this destruction vpon him, An. 362. It is vncertaine whether diuine or humane hand executed this iustice on him. Iovinian was presently saluted Emperour, but forced to agree on dishonourable conditions with the Persians, leauing the Rabdicens, Carduens, Rhesens, Zalens, and Nisibis to the Persian dominion. And a little after, in the raigne of Valens, the league was broken by Sapo-

res, who wonne Cresiphon : Valens intending this warre, was by the Gothes overthrowne, and burnt aliue, before he could effect any thing, An. 377. When Theodosius raigned, the peace was renewed.

After Sapores succeeded Artaxerxes, and after him Sapores, his sonne, both which raigned nine yeeres. Then followed Varanes Cermasat eleuen yeeres, to whom succeeded Isdigerdes, who held peace with the Romans. Procopius writes, That Arcadius the Emperour on his death-bed, An. 407. ordained in his last Will, this Isdigerdes the Tutor and Protector to his sonne and heire Theodosius, which he faithfully performed. Agathias also acknowledgeth it a currant report, a Maruthas was in credit with this King. He was a Christian Bishop, and by his praiers had cured him of a grievous sickness, which the Magi with their Fierie superstition, and all their labour, could not effect. The Magi conspiring against Maruthas, watched opportunitie, that when the King should come (after the Persian wont) to worship the Fire, a man (whom they had hidden before within the earth for that purpose) cried aloud, That the King should goe forth, as being accounted of their God impious, who so loued a Christian Bishop. Heereupon the King bethought him of sending him away. But Maruthas suspecting the knauerie, counselled the King to cause the earth to be digged vp ; for the Fire, saith he, cannot speake. The King going into the Chappell or Sanctuarie, and hearing this voice againe, followed Maruthas his counsell, and found out their packing, and punished the authors, allowing Maruthas to build a Church, wherefoeuer he pleased, in Persia. And whiles the Magi yet added to their treacheries, he not only punished their persons, but distasted their Religion, and purposed to become a Christian, but by death was preuented, which happened An. 421. Varanes, or Varanes his sonne, followed not his steps, but both brake league with the Romans, and persecuted the Christians. Narser his Generall, with his forces, were defeated, Azames wasted, Nisibis besieged by the Imperials : The Saracens, which aided the Persian, stricken with a strange furie and amazement, drowned themselves in Euphrates. It is said, a hundred thousand men perished. Theodosius then Emperour knew these things by Palladius b, who in three daies did ride from Constantinople hither, and backe againe in as many, vsing to flie in this manner to any the remotest parts of the Empire, with such admirable, and almost miraculous expedition, with his celeritie making the spacious Empire seeme but narrow and strait. Varanes sent an Armie of choicest pert souldiours which were among them, for their excellencie, called Immortall, but the Roman swords soone proued them mortall. Thus succeeded that warre which he had begun for despight to the Christian Religion and Profession. Hee was forced to seeke peace, and ended or mitigated his persecution. To him succeeded, An. 441. Isdigerdes, who raigned seuateene yeeres ; and after him Perozes, who raigned foure and twenty yeeres : after him, his brother Obalus (Bizarus calls him Bleses) ruled foure yeeres. Cabades his successor renewed the Warres with the Romans : and no maruell, for he was cruell to his owne people, and warred euen against Nature : for he ordained (as some report) That women should be common, any wedlock-bands notwithstanding. Whereupon his Nobles conspired against him, deprived and imprisoned him. Bleses was enthronized (Scaliger hath Zamaspes) who foure yeeres after resigned the State vnto Cabades againe, who hauing before raigned eleuen yeeres, added thereto thirtie more. Nicephorus c tels, That hee became friend to the Christians, and permitted free libertie of that Religion vpon this occasion. Betweene Persia and India was a Castle, called Tzundadaer, wherein Cabades had heard, that much money and iewels were kept. Cabades vsed all meanes to obtaine it, but in vaine ; so strongly was it (as the storie saith) garded with Deuils. Hee therefore vsed all the Persian Exorcismes to dispossesse them ; and when they preuailed not, hee sought to effect it by the Iewes, but with the former successe. At last hee made vse of the Christians, who expelled the spirits, and deliuered the Castle vnto him.

It is reported, that he slew Zeliobes, King of the Hunnes, for playing on both hands, and comming to helpe him in his warres against the Romans, hauing before sworn to assist the Emperour. About these times were the Manichees d destroyed in Persia, for corrupting his sonne Phatursas with their infectious leauen. Hee therefore slew their chief chiefe Prelate Indagarns, and many thousand Manichees, all in one day, hauing assembled them with a wile, professing, that he would make that his son King. He assembled also the chiefe of the Magi, Glouazes, and Boaxanes a Christian Bishop, for the greater solemnity, with like deuotion as Iehou sacrificed to Baal, with the presence and assistance of Iehonadab, 2. King. 10. Calusius saith, this was done An. 523. Cabades died An. 531.

His sonne Cosroes the Great succeeded and raigned eight and forty yeares. He about the thirteenth yeare of Iustinians Empire, An. 539. inuaded the Roman Dominions, tooke Surus, burnt Berrra, destroyed Antiochia, and with lesse successe besieged Ecclesia. Agathius preferreth this Cosroes for his great exploits before Cyrus and Xerxes. Yet was his end ignoble, and vnworthie his high spirit. For Mauritius, in the time of Tiberius, entred into the Persian dominions, and burnt some villages neere to the place where Cosroes then was for his recreation, and saw this burning spectacle: wherewith indignation and Griefe mustering greater multitudes of fearefull, vnquiet, enraged thoughtes in his heart, then Mauritius had souldiers in his Armie, vnable to beare such vnwonted sights of hostile flames in his Countries, and such vnwonted sights of inward perturbations, euen greatnesse of spirit made way to Pusillanimitie, and being weakened with colluctation of contrarie passions, a Feauer, taking that occasion and advantage, apprehends him, and soone after kills him.

Some say, his sonne Ormisdas raigned seuen yeares with his father. Hee succeeded and raigned eight yeares. He was exceeding cruell by reason of a prophetic that his subjects should dispossesse him, which caused him to dispossesse thousands of them of their liues: and made him so odious, that they easily after apprehended the occasion to fulfill that subtil diuellish Oracle. Against him Mauritius performed, worthie attempts, which made way vnto him for the Roman Empire. And then also he had good successe against the Persians, by the valour of Philippicus his General: insomuch, that the Persians moued with these and other discontents, by incitement of Varamus deposed Ormisdas, killed his wife and sonne before his eyes; which hauing remained to performe vnto him that their last, vn-couth, vnnaturall seruice, were presently after put out, with burning needles thrust into them, himselfe first imprisoned, and after beaten to death with clubs, by Cosroes his sonne. That Varamus had, a little before, beene sent as General against the Roman Armie: which his seruice being found vnseruiceable, and the Romans preuailing, he was not only deprived of his place, but, to his further disgrace, was, by the Kings commandement, clothed in womans attire: which indignities he repayed not in words alone (in his letters stiling Ormisdas, The Daughter of Cosroes) but with those vnnaturall and disloyall practises: which he continued also against Cosroes, sonne and heire of Ormisdas, forcing him to flee to Mauritius the Emperour for succour. For Varamus did not approue his succession, but writ vnto him to relinquish his royaltie, for feare of succeeding in his fathers fortunes. In that letter he stileth himselfe, Friend of the Gods, Enemie of Tyrants, Wise, Religious, Vnblameable, Happie, Proud, &c. Cosroes giueth him an answer, wherein he thus writeth, CHOSROES King of Kings, Lord of Lords, Ruler of Nations, Prince of Peace, Salvation of men, amongst the gods a man good and eternall, amongst men a god most illustrious, most glorious Conquerour, rising with the Sunne, gining eyes (Starres) to the night, Noble from his Ancestrie, &c. But for all these great Titles, he was compelled to flee, as is said, and write in a lower stile to Mauritius.

Trophilactus Simocatta, speaking of the Abares a Scythian Nation dwelling neere Maz, saith, that they were descended of the Hunnes, and that Bocolabrus (which word signifieth one that is a Priest and Magus, for their Priests were their Diuiners) hauing offended Chagan, the Prince of these Abares, fled vnto their originall Nation, dwelling in the East, neere to the Persians, commonly called Turkes. This I meant to shew the Turkish originall, and their common descent with the Hunnes (with whose posterity in Hungary they now hold such continuall dissensions) by the testimony of an Author which writ his History a thousand yeares since. In his third Book and sixt Chapter, he saith, the Hunnes which dwell in the North-East, whom the Persians called Turkes, were subdued by King Hormisdas; & wheras before the Persians had vsed to pay them forty thousand peeces of gold to buy their peace, they now forced these Hunnes to pay pay so much for tribute to the Persians. The Persian gold bred such surquedrie and excesse amongst the Turkes, that they had their beds, tables, horse-furniture and mours of solide gold: which prodigalitie made them couetous, and to demand larger contribution from the Persians; hence arose those warres, and that thraldome of the Turkish Nation. This Author, first of all other to my knowledge, mentioneth the Turkish warres, which since haue yeelded matter for Authors more then enough.

These Turkes are <sup>a</sup> said to helpe Varamis in his rebellion; but both he and they receiued discomfiture by Narses the Roman Generall, and six thousand were taken and slaine. The Turkes being asked why they helped Varamis, answered, That they were forced thereto by famine: they were also marked with a black Crosse, which (they said) they learned of the Christians, thereby to expell hunger. Cosroes thus recovered the Kingdome by aide of the Empire, which Varamis had vsurped to himselfe.

He <sup>b</sup> was deeply scene in the Chaldzan mysteries, and being by a Roman Gouernour reproofed for some excesse, in those times when he so much needed their helpe, answered, That the times did aduantage him to those reproofoes: but know (saith he) that calamities shall also befall the Romans; and the Babylonian Nation shall rule them three weekes of yeares. After that, in the fift weeke, the Romans shall subdue the Persians: which being come to passe, a day shall come that shall haue no night, and the expected end of the Empire shall be at hand; in which time corruption shall be abolished, and men shall liue according to Diuine Ordinance. This, either false or vncertaine Prophecie (according to that Deepest of Satan) he recited, but what effect answerable hth followed, I know not. <sup>c</sup> In his time the Saracens, confederate with the Romans, spoiled the Countries of Babylonia.

cap. 1.

This Cosroes reigned nine and thirtie yeares, He held peace with the Romans while Mauritius liued; but when Phocas cruelly and treacherously had slaine him, a world of euils at once assaulted the Empire. The Germans, Gaules, Italians, Hunnes, and Persians, by their Armies afflicted the publike State; and the Roman Bishop then began to aspire to an vniuersall Soueraigntie, which that Murderer first entitled him vnto. The Armie which was yet red with the bloud of Mauritius, by the Persians sword was punished, and died in their owne bloud: who hauing overthrowne the Romans in two battailes, possessed Mesopotamia, Syria, Egypt, Palæstina, and Phœnicia. He entered Ierusalem, slew and captiued many Christians <sup>d</sup>, and carried thence the Crosse. Against the Iberians, Armenians, Cappadocians, Galatians, Paphlagonians, euen vnto Chæcedon, he preuailed. Thus did God punish that Murderer, and besides (to pay him a his owne coyne) Priscus, Heraclo, and Heraclius conspired against this Conspirer, and murdered the Murderer, and hauing cut off his Priuities, and his Head, buked him into the sea, and destroyed his Issue.

d Bizeri, lib. 6.

Heraclius succeeded, who repressed Cosroes, vnto whose power Carthage, with Africa, was now also subiected, which he had inuaded, conducting his Armies through Egypt. Heraclius sends an Embassage to him, which receiued this answer, That he would neuer lay downe Armes till the Crucified God were abolished, and the Persian Mithra worshipped. This encouraged Heraclius, seeing now Christ himselfe was a partie; vnder whose Banners he could not but finde happie euents of Warre. Cosroes had slaine in Palæstina fourescore and ten thousand Christians, and the Iewes also had brought many of them to the slaughter. Heraclius encountered with Oshanes, and slew thirtie thousand Persians. By a stratagem he wonne Sarbatius, a great Commander, to his part. In another battaile he had lost the Field, but Thunders and terrible Tempests were sent (as Smectemuriana Copia) to assist the souldiers of their Lord, and vshered Destruction to the Persian Campe, whiles the Romans killed them, being both blinded with Lightnings, and amazed with inward terrours and outward Tempests. Hee had before chased Cosroes, and taken Thebarma (a Persian Citie) wherein was a Temple of the Fire, which by fire he consumed. And in the yeare 626. Cosroes now at his wits end, or rather quite beyond them, appointed Medarjes his sonne to be his successor and heire apparent: wherewith Siroes, his elder sonne, being discontented, conspired to betray his father and brother to Heraclius: and soone after caused them both to be slain at Ctesiphon. Peace was concluded with the Romans, & their Prouinces restored.

Only

Onely Arabia was by Mahomet holden, as a Seminarie of a greater mischief, vnder which the world with grieve and amazement still groneth. Lope Obregon in a large Spanish booke, of the confutation of the Alcoran, which he saith he gathered out of the Moores writings, tells that Mahomet serued Heraclius in his warres against Cosroes, with more then ten thousand horse-men; Ubequar, Homar, Hozmen, and Hali, being chiefe Commanders vnder him, and being after the victorie denied pay, conquered a great part of Persia to himselfe. And when Siroes successor to Cosroes, withstood him; he gaue him the overthrow, and therefore the Persians chose a new King to repress these Arabians: and that after this, Heraclius sending for the Crosse which he had recovered from the Persians, from Ierusalem to Constantinople, (this Palladium being gone) he wanne Ierusalem and the Countries about. Other prodigious miracles he saith into his storie, and describes a Throne which Cosroes had made in a tower of siluer garnished with precious stones, vnder the same on one side the Sunne, on the other the Moone, and iust with it the crosse which he had taken from Ierusalem; and that he would be adored for King and Lord of the world. But I will not ingage my selfe farre for this Historian.

Siroes, Adeser, Barazas, and Baram the daughter of Cosroes, in their order of succession in that disordered and turbulent estate, had scarce two yeares allowed to them all: to whom succeeded Ormizda lexdegird, who about the yeare 632. was ouerthrowne and slaine by the Saracens: and that Persian Kingdome (then weakened by ciuill dissensions) was subdued to Saracenicall seruitude; and that second Persian Dynastie (continued as Scaliger reckoneth in eight and twentie successions, the space of foure hundred and two yeares) had an end. From thence vnto this time their Religion is Saracenicall: their State governed by the Califas; and such Commanders or Sultans as they placed ouer them, till their Sultans warring with the Califa for Soueraigntie, procured aide from the Turkes: who dispossessed them of their Kingdome presently after they had disburthened them of their enemies: The Turkes were displaced and chased away by the Tartars. Of these both Saracens and Turkes you haue the history in the former booke, and therefore needlesse heere to be related: Of the Tartars shall follow in their order. Now let vs a little looke back to the Greatnes, and other things most remarkable in the Persian Kings.

CHAP. V.

THe time of the first Dynastie, howsoever Dionysius Halicarnass. contracteth it to two hundred yeares, and Cedrenus to two hundred and foure-teene: yet Quintus Curtius (who writ the overthrow of the same by Alexander, in the time of Claudius, vnder whom, if Brissotius hath gathered truly, he was Proconsul of Africa) and Hierom, and Clemens Alexand. and others little disagree from that our former account of 231: In which space the greatnes of their Kings appropriated the title of the Great King vnto themselves, as Dionysius in his Observations, and Brissotius out of Dio Chrysostomus, Aristides, Isocrates and others haue obserued: so Artaxerxes Ezra 7. 12. calleth himselfe King of Kings, which the Parthian after annexed to his stile. The Kingdome was hereditarie both in Persia and Parthia, the eldest sonne begotten in wedlocke, succeeding. In long expeditions the heire apparent was nominated. They vsed to be inaugurated or crowned (after our phrase) at Pasargade, by their Priests, which Plutarch thus describeth. The designed King goeth into a Chappell of the Goddesse of War (it may be thought Minerva) and there putting off his former habit, puts on that which Cyrus wore before he was King: then doth he eat a lump of Figs, & Turpentine, and drinks a cup of sowre milke: their other ceremonies are not knowne. On his head was set a Cidaris or Tiara; this was a kind of Cap or Turbant, not like a felt of wooll, but of diuers peeces of cloth sowed together, Trisia pilea suza de lacernis; the Kings differing from the comon sort, because his ascended straight with a sharp top not bowed any way; to the other Persians it was deadly to wear a Tiara, except the top bowed (in token of subiection) to their forehead. Onely the posteritie of those, which with Darius Histaspis slew the usurping Magus, might wear them bending to the middle of their head, and not hanging downe to their browes, as the other. The Kings Tiara was properly called Cidaris, and was set on by the Surenas, which was an hereditarie dignitie, next to the King. About this Cidaris he wore a Diadem, which some Authors <sup>a</sup> confound, and make to be the same; others otherwise: it was a purple band, or of blew colour, distinguished with white, which was wreathed about the Tiara. The right or strait Tiara, which was purple and white band, was the note of royaltie, as the Crowne in these parts. The Diadem <sup>b</sup> in other Countries was a white band wreathed about the forehead. The King was placed also in a golden Throne, and (if he pleased) changed his former name, as Codomannus to Darius. His subiects adored him as a god (so did the Greekes interpret it, and Mordecai, which refused this ceremonie to Haman) prostrating themselves on the ground with a kind of veneration; turning their hands behind their back, if they had any sute to the King. Sperchies and Bulis Lacedemonians, and Comus the Athenian refused this Rite: Ismerius <sup>c</sup> the Theban dissembled it with taking up his ring, which for that purpose he let slip from his finger, when he came before the King. Timagoras <sup>d</sup> was put to death by the Athenians for doing it. In the time of Apollonius <sup>e</sup>, none might come to the presence of the King, which had not before done like adoration to his Image. They also when they came into the presence of the King, held their hands within their sleeves; for default herein, Cyrus Junior slew Anisius and Mitram, as Xenophon writeth. Likewise for the greater Maieستie they seldom were seene of the people, and then neuer on foot: neither might any enter the Palace without licence of the King, signifying his attendance first by a messenger: this honour was reserved to the Princes which slew Smerdis, which might enter at all times, but when the King was in bed with his wife; which Intaphernes (one of the seven) committing, therefore lost his head. Yea the Scripture <sup>h</sup> noteth the danger hereof in Haman, the Kings greatest fauorite, and Ester the Queene, neither of which had liberty of entrance without the Kings call or admission. It was a capitall offence to sit on the Kings Throne, to wear the Kings garment, or in hunting to strike any beast before the King had stricken. The King (as before is noted of Cambyses) was not subiect to any law: the people were held in much slavery, if that may be so called which is voluntary. In this affection they which were <sup>i</sup> scourged at the Kings command, were thankful to him, for that they were had in remembrance with him. Their obedience appeared, when Xerxes <sup>k</sup> being in a ship in danger, many at his word leaped into the sea to lighten the ship. Yea they would be their owne executioners when they had offended the King. None might salute him without a present. His birth-day was obserued a sacred and solemn festival. His death was bewailed with a silence of lawes and sutes five daies, and with extinguishing <sup>m</sup> that fire, which euery one obserued in his house, as his household deity. The Kings abode was according to the season: seven moneths saith Zonaras <sup>n</sup> in Babylon, three in Susa, and two in Ecbatana. Eliau therefore compares them to Cranes, & Aristides to the Scythian Nomades: alway by this shifting, enioying a temperate season. Susa or Sushan, was so called of the abundance of Lillies, which in that language are so named, saith Stephanus: a Region so defended by high mountains from the Northerne blasts, that in the Summer the vehement heat parched their <sup>o</sup> Barly (in Straboes report, and therefore they covered the roofes of their houses with earth two cubits deepe) and it killed the snakes as they crossed the waies. It was situate on Chosfes and entertained the Kings Court in Winter, as Ecbatana in Summer the chiefe Citie of the Medes. Sometimes it also removed to Pasargade; and sometimes to Persepolis, the richest Citie, if Diodorus <sup>p</sup> be beleued, vnder the Sun, wherein was a Tower enuironed with a threefold wall, the first of which was sixteene cubits high, and made with battlements, the second twice as much, the third square, and sixty cubits in height of hard stone with brazen gates: on the East thereof was a hill of foure acres, wherein were the Sepulchres of the Kings. Alexander in reuenge of the burning of Athens, and by instigation of wine, and Thais his Concubine (Mars, Bacchus, Venus, three heauy, vnruely, tyrannicall enemies, conspiring) burned this sometime-Treasure-house of Persia.

 Iosa (you reade the wordes of Aristotle in his booke de Mundo, hereby manifested to be his, or at least as auncient in that he writeth of the Persian State flourishing before Alexander in his time had subuerted it) some, he saith, were called the Kings eares, others his eyes, and others had other offices, by which the King learned whatsoever was any where done, and therefore holden as a God: And besides his Posts which brought news, by fires or Beacons, he might in one day learne the State of that huge Empire, extended from the Hellespont to India. The Pallace-roofe admirably shined with the brightnesse of Iuorie, Siluer, Amber, and Golde. His Throne was of Golde, borne vp with foure Pillars, beset with gemmes. His bed was also of Golde (which was propounded the reward to Zorobabel and his companions Exra 3. 3.) yea, Herodotus tells of a Tabernacle of Golde, of a Plane tree, and a Vine of golde giuen to Darius by Pistius the Bithynian. This Vine Athenens reporteth, was adorned with jewels and hung ouer the Kings bed, the Grape-clusters being all precious stones: in a Parlour at his beds feete were 3000. Talents of golde, in another at the head, called the Kings bolster, were 5000. Talents. Gardens were<sup>b</sup> adioyning, which they called Para-dises: some very large, wherein were kept wilde beasts, as Lions, Beares, Bores, for the Kings game, with spacious woods and plaines, inclosed in walls. Tully out of Xenophon relateth the industrie of Cyrus, which with his owne hand had measured, planted, ordered, and husbanded one of those pleasant Paradises. Alexander enriched them with trees and plants out of Greece. The Persian Kings dranke the water of Choaspes only, which to that purpose was boyled, and carried with them in siluer vessels wheresoeuer they went. The Parthian Kings dranke of this<sup>c</sup> and of the Riuer Eulæus (a Riuer rising in Media, which after it hath buried it selfe, againe recovering the light, compassed the Tower of Sufa, and the religious Temple of Diana. Daniel calls it Flai; it seemeth to be or to becom the same with Choaspes; & so doth Ptolemy confound them) they dranke also only Chalybonian wine, made at Damascus in Syria, and their bread was made of the wheat of Affos in Phrygia. Their sumptuous feasting<sup>d</sup> appeareth in the Scripture, beyond what is read in any storie of any King: in which was somewhat of euery Nation subiect to him, set before him: his Salt was brought out of Egypt.
 Amongst the baggage and stufte of Darius, which Parmenio tooke at Damascus, were found two hundred seuentie seuen Cookes, nine and twentie Scullians, thirteen which had charge of white-meates, seuentene which were to minister water, seuentie which belonged to the wine-celler, forrie which looked to the oyntments, & sixtie six which made Crowns. How many, may we thinke, were there in his settled Court? His dining-room was full of musical women, whereof one began the song, the rest followed: three hundred of these creatures singing, playing, dancing, spent the night in his bed-chamber. He<sup>e</sup> which could deuise any new pleasure, was highly rewarded; for which purpose Xerxes promised largely to such Epicurean-Masters by an open Proclamation.
 The King vsually sate alone, sometimes his mother and wife were admitted: ocher guests sate where he might see, but not be scene of them: yea, they had slauish sawce to their sweet meats, being narrowly watched by the Eunuches, whether they cast any libell looks towards any of the Kings women. Yet the Parthian guests had more stouid entertainment, as euen now we shewed. Concerning the multitudes of their women, and curiositie of their lusts, the booke of Ester yeeldes ample testimonie. Cicer addeth, that they bestowed for the maintenance of their wines tobies; and dresses; one Caine for their haire, another for their necke, yea, the reuenues of whole countries on such excesses. Socrates in Platos Alcibiades telleth of an Embassadour into Persia; which was almost a whole day in travelling through a Region, called the Queenes Girde, another called the Queenes Head-sire, and so for euery other part of her Wardrobe.

The Kings children (especially the eldest sonne) were presently after their birth committed to Eunuches, which besides education did compose and order their lims:
 as soon years of age they learned to ride and to hunt, hauing skillfull instructors for that purpose: at foureene years they were committed to the discipline of the Royal Admirall, which were foure choisely learned; the first in Prudence, which taught the

Magia of Zoroastres, and the institution of a King: the second, in Justice; who taught to speake and deale truly: the third, in Temperance, wherein he instructed his new disciple: as the fourth in Fortitude. The Persian King had one, whose office was to salute the King with these words; Arise, O King, and thinke on such things as Mesormades would haue thee. Almost euery day he performed his holy Rites, for which cause were slaine<sup>b</sup> euery day 1000. sacrifices, amongst which were Oxen, Asses, Harts, the Magi being present. Before their sacrifices they discoursed of pietie: and when they went to this their deuotion, there were men on both sides the way set in ranks; with officers called Mastigophori, who suffered none but great Personages to enter. First were led Bulls, foure and foure together, which were sacrificed to Iupiter. After them were led Horses to be offered to the Sunne. Then followed a Chariot drawne with white Horses, hauing a golden beame, and crowned, sacred to Iupiter: after that, the Chariot of the Sunne like the former. Then a third Chariot, the Horses covered with Scarlet; after which followed men carrying fire, and next, the King in his Chariot, before which went 4000. Target-men, and 2000. Speare-men about it: There followed 300. with Darts on horse-backe: two hundred horses with golden bridles: and after them three thousand Persians, and in the last place the Medes, Armenians, Hircanians, Scythians indeed, which writes this in his Institution of Cyrus, intends rather the frame of a iust Empire, then the truth of history, yet professeth to relate no other rites & customs then which the Persians embraced: neither doth he in these things disagree from Herodotus & Ctesias. The Kings Chariot was drawne with white horses, the drowning of one of which was the cause of drying the riuer Gyndes. For Cyrus enraged for the loss of his white Palfrey, diuided the riuer by force of men into 320. rills; so that it wilded and lost it selfe in those many by-waies: an argument what Diuision can doe. These horses were of the Nisæan race in Media. When the King descended from his Chariot, a golden stöole was set him to step on: one alway attending his Chariot with such a stöole. While he rode in his Chariot, he spent the time in whistling with a knife, not reading or any graue meditation, and therefore was vnlearned. When he went on progresse into Media, he enioyned the countrey to spend three daies before to hunt Scorpions, which there abounded; allowing rewards therfore. They vsed by themselves or their Legats to visit their officers in the Prouinces, and to punish or preferre them according to their merits. In iudgements they not only considered the crimes & accusations, but the counterpoise also of their vertues: and the clemency<sup>1</sup> of Artaxerxes (in their irreuocable law) appeared in cutting off the Tyars of condemned persons, instead of their heads. As often as the King entered into Persopolis, euery Matron was to haue a piece of golde giuen her: the men also were rewarded with multiplied children: but especial rewards were bestowed on them which were called Orosanges, which had deferved well of the King, whose names & facts were therefore recorded, as we reade of Mordecai, & his recompence. Themistocles receiued of the kings bounty the Citie Megnesia, to finde him bread (which region was worth 30. Talents yearly) Lampfacum for wine, Myus for cates. The chiefe gift giuen to any was a mill of gold. The kings birthday was a solemne feast called Tylos, that is perfect, for the magnificence thereof in which he gaue gifts to the people: yea, he might not denie any petition then made to him. The king nourished so many Indian dogs for hunting, that foure great villages in the plaine of Babylon were assigned to their sustenance. Artaxerxes caused Megabyas (as Ctesias writeth) to be beheaded for striking a Lion with his dart, which was ready to assault the king, because he therein transgressed the Law, and preuented the kings trial of his valour. The reuenues of the tributes were 14560. Euboike talents: the silver and gold were melted and kept in earthen vessels, which were broken when they came to vie the same. Besides this, the subiect prouinces yeelded to the mainenance of the king other things: as Armenia, horses; Babylonia, foure moneths victuals, and the rest of Asia the other eight; and other regions their peculiar commodities. The kings ordinarie guard night & day guarded the Pallace, the most of them Persians: another band of 10000. choice horse-men were wholly Persian, and were called Immortal: one thousand of the best of them, called Doryphori and Melophori, were chosen into the Kings guard. They receiued no money but allowance of victuall for their wages. Curtius mentioneth a guard next the Kings person, called the Kings kinsmen, which were 1000. But it were too tedious to recite the Homotimi, Megistanes, and other his court-officers and attendants, the Sarena which was the chiefe Magistrate, & others, wherof Brissinus hath written. As their liues were burthened with voluptuousnesse, so they prepared for their deaths (that they might descend suddenly into the grave, as Iob saith of the prosperitie of some wicked, without any hands, to use Danids phrase, of a lingring death) certaine poysons, tempered of the excrements of the Dircarus an Indian bird, which in short time, without sense of griefe deprived them of life. After the kings death they extinguished the sacred fire, which rite Alexander obserued in Hephestions funeral: in Persopolis were erected vnto them stately monuments, with Tides and Epitaphs inscribed.

I might here terrifie the delicate & already-wearied reader with representation of their Martial marching, discipline, numbers, armors, & the like; of which Brissinus hath written a whole booke. Yet because we haue thus far waded in matters of the Persian magnificence; let vs take a little view of the Heire, successor to that Greatnes, Great Alexander in state entering Babylon; thus by Curtius related. Many came forth to meete him: the wayes were all strowed with flowers & garlands, on both sides were erected filles of Altars, laden with Frankincense and all kind of odors. There followed him for presents droues of horses and cattell; Lions and Leopards in grates were carried before him. The Magi after their manner of procession singing, had the next place; after them the Chaldeans, & the Babylonian both diuiners and artificers, with muscicall instruments. Then the horse-men, furnished beyond magnificence in excesse of prodigalitie. The king with his armie followed, and last of all the townsmen. He that will compare with this relation, that which in the booke of the Romish Ceremonies is written of the Popes strait Tiara, enuironed with a triple crown: the veneration performed to him by all, even Emperors kissing his feet, holding his bridle & stirrop, putting their shoulders vnder his chaire when he lists to ride on mens shoulders, holding water to his handes, and bearing the first dish to his Table: the change of his name at his election: his Palaces alwayes white, like the Niszan, led before him; one of which carrieth his God vnder a Canopie: his Seals, Processions, and other rites; shall see some hence borrowed, most exceeding the Persian Excesse. Once, all Religion with them seemeth turned into state and Ceremonie, the soule being fled, and this (bodily exercise) body of exercise, in exercise of the body, onely left.

CHAP. VI.

Of the Persian Magi.

THe name of Magi is sometimes applied (say some) to all the Persians, or else to a particular nation amongst them: sometime it signifieth the most excellent in Philosophie, & knowledg of nature, or in sanctity & holines of life. Thus Suidas calls the Persian Magi, Philosophi, and Philothei, studious of knowledge, of nature, & of God. Sometimes it signified such as we now call Magicians, practisers of wicked Arts. Among the Persians this name was ancient & honorable, saith Pencerus, applied only to the Priests; which liued in high reputation for dignity & authority, being also Philosophers, as the Chaldeans were. To these was committed the custodie of religion, of ancient monuments, of later histories, of publicke records, & the explanation of the Persian wisdom, whose account appereth in the former chap. where, after Cambyses death, one of them is reported to succeed in the Throne. Now whereas the Ethnikes had a tradition of two Genii, which attend every man, one good, the other euill; proceeding (in likelihood) from diuine truth, concerning good & euill Angels, which are either ministering spirits for mans good, or tempters vnto euill: curious men hence took occasion to deuise new arts, which were called Yajna and Yajna; by the one calling vpon the good Demon or Genius; by the other, on the euill; which euill PORE could easily turn himselfe into an Angel of light, to delude blinde people, being indeed, as in our White & Blacke wittles at this day, worse when an Angel, then when a Diuel. Hereof were diuers kinds; Necromancie, which invocated the spirits of the dead; of which smoaky Soote, the Heathens Diuine Poets, and

and our poetickall Divines in the tales of Hell and Purgatorie, ſtrive who ſhall have the blackeſt tincture. They had alſo their Leconomancie, which was obſerved in a Baſon of water, wherein certaine plates of golde and ſilver were put with Jewels, marked with their juggling Characters, and thence after pronuntiation of their wordes were answers whiſpered; Gaſtromancie procured answers by pictures, or representations in glaſſe-velleſs of water, after the due Rites. Catoptromancie received thoſe reſemblances in cleare glaſſes; Cryſtallomancie in Cryſtall; Daltylomancie was a divination with Rings (which perhaps Gygis uſed) conſecrated by certaine poſitions of the heavens, and diuelliſh enchantments. Onymancie with Oyle and Soore daubed on the Naile of an vndeſiled childe, and held vp againſt the Sunne; Hydromancie with water; Aeromancie with ayre. But what ſhould I adde the many more names of this Antieſe Art, vnworthy the naming? Tibi nomina mille, Mille nocendi artes; Infinitely diuerſified are theſe blinde by-ways of darkeneſſe and miſchiefe. Delrio hath other diuiſions of Magike, which from the efficient he diuideth into Naturall, Artificiall, and Diaboliſh; from the end, into Good and Bad: and this bad (which is by explicite or implicite compact with Diuels) into Magia ſpecialis, Diuina, Maleficium, & Nugatoria. Zoroaſter is ſuppoſed Author both of the good and bad vnto the Perſians. Naturall Magike is by Delrio deuided into that which worketh wonders (nor miracles) and that which diuineth. But I am wearie of this Magickall ſearch. Leauē we them in their Mazes, Circles, Labyrinths of Errour: and let vs take view of the Perſian Magi, from whence Plinie denieth the firſt originals of Magickall Vanities; which are (ſaith hee) compounded of three Arts, that exerciſe moſt imperious power ouer the mindes of men, Phyſicke, and that offering her ſelfe more ſublimare and pure, in the ſacred name and rites of Religion, beautified alſo with the addition of Mathematicall Sciences: (a three-fold cord not eaſily broken, like a three-headed Cerberus, or triple crowned Prelate holding the world in feare or loue thereof.) Zoroaſtres (who liued as Endoxus reſtified ſixe thouſand yeeres before Plato) firſt inuented it in Perſia. Hermippus affirmeth, that Agonax taught him; Apollonius and Zaratrus among the Medes; Marmaridius the Babylonian, Hippocritus the Arabian, and Zarmecendus the Aſſyrian, haue becom famous for their practice and writings of this Art. Pythagoras, Empedocles, Democritus, Plato ſayled farre to learne it, vnder taking long exiles, rather then pilgrimages or peregrinations, to that end. He impiously addeth Mofes and Iochabell (it may be he meant Ieſhua) to this impious number. The Scripture tells of Iannes, and Jambres, and Simeon Magnus famous in this infamie. Hierome ſaith, they were the Philoſophers of the Chaldeans, and that the Kings did all things after the direction of their Art, which (they are *Plinie*s wordes) in the Eaſt ruleth the Kings of Kings. Porphyrius affirmeth, that they which were wiſe in diuine myſteries, and performed them were called of the Perſians Magi: the ſame ſaith Picus, that Philoloſophers were amongſt the Greekes. The like Philolaus, and Proclus, and Arnobius of Hoſthanes Magnus. They were ſtudious in phyſics, inſtituted ſacrifices, and myſteries, as the Indian Brachmanes, and Græcians Theologiſts, acknowledged Angels, Paradifes, the ſoule, immortalitie. Patrius alſo addeth to their Philoſophie and Theologie, Aſtronomie and Phyſicke, and all knowledge of Nature. It is like that in the Perſian Magi concurred both a certaine ſtocke or kindred, which were all ſo called (as is ſaid) and the Philoſophicall inquiſition of Nature, & the Prieſtly function, and alſo ſome eyther implicite or explicite ſocietie with Diuels. The ſame they were, at leaſt in profeſſion and reputation, that the Philoſophers with the Greekes, the Prieſts in Egypt, Gymnoſophiſtes in India, Chaldeans in Babylon, Druides in Gallia and in this our Iſle, the Italian Aruſpices, & other religious perſons (the Teachers of their Theologie & Philoſophie) in other places. As for thoſe Magi mentioned in the Goſpell, ſome ſuppoſe them to come from Ethiopia; ſome from Arabia; ſome from Meſopotamia; ſome from Chaldea; and ſome from Perſia; and ſome from the uers of theſe regions. Whenceſoeuer they came, they had a brighter Starre to guide them with diuiner light, then thoſe Magickall brandes of helliſh fire could yield.

Plato commendeth this Magia, and callit Mahegistiia, and ſay ſay ſay the working of the Gods; and ſaith, that the Kings of Perſia learned it, as a knowledge of diuine myſteries, wherein by the worlds Common-wealth, they were inſtructed to gouerne

their owne. Others, as they were led by differing affection, doe as much discommend them. And truly (as in the Chaldean, and Aegyptian Priests) their searching out the mysteries of Nature cannot but deserue commendation, but their abusing this naturall Philosophie to ynnaturall conspiracie with deuils, cannot but bee detested of those which are not themselves detested of God. And either from this deuillish conspiracie, or ouer-curious vanitie, did arise their predictions of future euents : in which respect the Ethnikes had them in high reputation. Ammianus Marcellinus saith, that Zoroaster added much to this Art from the Chaldean mysteries, and Hythæses, the father of Darius, from the Brachmanes, which he in his Indian trauels had found in a woodie solitarieesse, and learned of them the motions of the Starres, and pure rites of sacrifices: which he taught the Magi, and they, together with the skill of diuination, deliuered to their posteritie by tradition : and that progenie is alway consecrated to diuine seruices, and keepe continually burning certaine fire which first came from heauen; a small portion whereof was wont to be carried before the Kings of Asia. There were but a few of them at the first : and it was vnlawfull to touch the sacrifice, or approach to the Altar, before the Magus with a certaine set speech had powred on his sacred preparatiue liquors. Afterwards being increased in number they grew into an entire Nation, and inhabited vnwalled townes, being gouerned by their owne lawes, and honoured for religion. Cicero writeth, that the Magi did assemble together in Fana, into certaine Temples or consecrated places, to consult about their diuinations. They professed to Cyrus 30. yeeres raigne. They dranke the hearbe Theangelic, and vsed also the hearbe Aglaophon or Marmaritis when they would diuine. They diuined by the notes and markes of the body : they foretold the euents of prodigies. They might not teach any but Persians the mysteries of their science, without the Kings leaue. And yet Plinius saith, that Plato, Democritus, Empedocles, and Pythagoras, vnderooke trailes rather then trauels, to learne the same, which after their returne they taught. Apollonius also for the same cause went into Persia and India : whose Philosophie plainly appeareth by the historie of his life to be soiled with magicall impuritie. And although some commend one sort of Magia, as being their Theologie and Philosophie, yet seeing their Philosophie was corrupted with curiofitie, and their Theologie with superstitious Idolatrie, it could not be free from some kinde of implicate forcerie, as the examples of those which were most eminent therein, doe shew. Such an one Pafes was, who by enchantments would make shewes and resemblances of sumptuous feasts, with many attendants : and had a Magicall<sup>n</sup> or enchanted halfe-penny, which would returne to him againe, when hee had bought any thing therewith. Yea howsoeuer, Patricius would not excuse only, but highly commend the Oracles (as he termeth them) of Zoroaster, yet doth he cite out of him, that Barbarous names must not be changed. For all things haue their names of God, which haue an vnspokeable power in holy things : which words seeme to incline to Charmes, which are commonly in barbarous vnsignificant termes. Other things which he with great paines hath gathered out of the Platonikes, stamped with Zoroasters name, are many of them diuine, being interpreted in the best sense. For they are for the most part obscure, and many exceeding the sense of such weake readers as I confesse my selfe. Some I haue heere expressed. In all the world shineth the Trinitie, of which the beginning is Vnitie. The Father perfected all things, and deliuered them to the Second Minde, which all mankind calleth the First : He remaineth in the paternall profunditie. It is the Minde of the Minde which is framer of the fierie world. All the world is of fire, and water, and earth, and aire. He fastned a great company of not-wandering starres, and 7. wandering creatures, ioining fire to fire, the earth in the mids, and the water in the receptacles of the earth, and the aire about them. Let the immortall soule lift her eies vpwards, not downwards into this darke world, which is vnstable, madde, crooked, alway encompassing a blinde depth, hating the light, of which the vulgar is carried. Seeke Paradise. The soule of man will after some sort bring God into it selfe : hauing nothing mortall. it is wholly rauished of God. It resoundeth the harmonie, vnder which is the mortall bodie, extending the fierie minde to the worke of pietie. I desire not sacrifices and inwards, these are plaies, see these things if thou wilt open the sacred paradise

" of pietie, where vertue, and wisdom, and the good law, are gathered together. If these things are harsh, what would those obscurities be in his Theologie, wherein he first placeth One beginning, then a paternall profunditie of three Trinities, every of which hath the Father, the Power, the Minde. Next in order is the Intelligible Spirit, and after it Synochus, Empyreus, and Aetherealis, and Materialis; and after these the Telesarcha: after which the Fontani Patres, Hecate: and such a rabble of names follow, that the recitall would seeme to coniure the reader into some magicall maze or circle. They which are curious of those inextricable labyrinths, may resort to Pfellus, Patricius, and the Platonikes; which ascribe these things to the Assyrians and Chaldeans, as they doe Zoroaster also. Delrio and Patricius finde six of these Zoroaster mentioned in authors, (Goropius after his wont, paradoxicall, none at all) the first of which was inuenter of this Magike, a Chaldean, supposed to lue in the time of Abraham. Berosus first, and after Julianus a Magician, both Chaldeans, communicated these mysteries to the Greekes: and diuers of those heretikes * in the prime age of the Christian Church were not a little sowed with this magicall leauen, as appeared by Irenaeus, Epiphanius, Augustine, and others that write against them. Basilides his Araxus (the mysticall characters of which name make 365, the number of daies in the yeere, and of heauens after his opinion) is supposed the same with Mithra the Persian deitie, and hence to haue deriued his magicall descent: which we may note of others, if this belonged not to another labour.

The Magi had one chiefe amongst them in their Societie, called by Saxones, * Princeps Magorum. Cicero p affirmeth that none might be Kings in Persia, before they had learned the discipline of the Magi; neither was it any more lawfull for euery one to be a Magus, then to be a King: Such was their estimation in Persia. Suidas q tels that they vsed carnall company with their mothers: and when they are dead he cast forth vnburied, to be a prey to the Birds. Hieronymus maketh Zoroaster author of incestuous copulations of all sorts *, and of the not-burying rite, but either to burie or cast forth the carcase. (yea authors write that he himselfe desired and obtained to be consumed with fire from heauen.) Nothing seemed to them more vnluckie, and signe of former leaudnesse, then that no bird or beast would prey on their dead. And the souldiours which sickened in their armies, were laid forth yet breathing, with bread, water, and a staffe to driue away the beasts and fowles, which yet when their strength failed them, easily deuoured both the meat and keeper. If any recouered, and returned home, the people shunned him as a ghost, nor would suffer him to follow his former trade of life, till he were expiated by the Magi, and as yet were restored againe to life. The Romans in pietie, passing thorow some part of Persia, where they found a carcase in the field, buried it; but the night following, in a vision, a graue old man in habite of a Philosopher, reproued that fact, willing them to leaue the naked body to the dogges and birds, and the mother earth (saith he) will not receiue those which haue polluted their mothers. Which in the morning they found verified, the earth hauing vomited vp that carcase, which there lay on the top of the graue. The Magi heereby appear to haue had intercourse with the deuill: as by their predictions also, of Sylla, Orbius, Sapores, and others, mentioned by Paterculus, Helianus, Agathias, and other Historians. Thus were the Magi buried in the bowels of beasts and birds. Tullie saith that the other Persians were wrapped in wax, and so preserved. The Ossians and Astrampsychi are by Suidas reckoned successours of the Magi. Hierome citeth out of Eubulus three kindes of the Magi: the most learned of them liued onely on meale and beebes. Pausanias l reporteth, that in Lydia, in the Cities Hierocessarea, and Hypaxo, hee saw Temples hauing Persian surnames, and in euery of those Temples a Chappell and Altar, whereon were Ashes not like in colour to the ordinarie fort. The Magus entering into the roome, laieth drie wood on the Altar, after that hee hath set his mitre on his head, and then at the name of a certaine God, singeth barbarous hymnes (which the Greekes vnderstand not) out of the booke: which being done, the heape is fired, and the flame breakes forth. Diogenes Laertius r relateth, that these Magi spent their time in the seruice of their Gods, offering vnto them prayers and sacrifices, as if none but they might be heard: they disputed of the substance and generation of the Gods, whom whom they reckoned to be the Fire, Water, and Earth. They reprehended Images, especially such as made a differing sex of Male, and Female, among the Gods. They disallowed of Iustice. To burne their dead bodies, they held it impious: but to lie with their owne mothers, or daughters, they accounted lawfull. They practised diuination, and fore-tellings, affirming that the Gods appeared to them, that the aire was full of soimes<sup>a</sup> or shapes, which subcilly and as it were by evaporation, infuse themselves into the eies. They forbade outward ornaments, and the vse of Gold. Their garments were white, the ground their bed, Hearbes, Cheese, and Bread, their food. Aristotle saith, that they held two beginnings, a good spirit and an euill, calling the one Iupiter and Oromazes: the other Pluto and Arimanius. (Empedocles<sup>u</sup> translated this plant into Philosophie, and long after, <sup>x</sup> Manes a Persian heretike into diuinitie.) Theopompus addeth these opinions of theirs; That men should againe be restored to life, and become immortall, and that all things consisted by their praiers; Hecateus, that the Gods were begotten: Clearchus, that the Gymnosophista descended from the Magi. Thus saith Diogenes.

Plutarch in his Treatise de Osir. & Isid. citeth, approueth and applieth the opinion of the Magi vnto many others, which they conceiued touching their two beginnings, Arimanius and Oromazes: For whereas they saw such a mixture of euill in euery good, (which made Salomon to brand them all with the title of vanitie) they gathering that good could not be either cause or effect of euill, found out this remedie worse then the disease, to hold two Authors of all things, calling* Oromazes a God; and Arimanius, the fountaine of euill, a deuill; the one cause of light: the other of darknesse. Betwixt these two they placed Mithras as Mediator or Intercessor. Zoroastres was author of this opinion. To the first of these was praise and vowes offered: to the later mournfull deuotions. For, rubbing a certaine hearbe called Omomis, they call on Dis Pater & Orens, then they wash it with the blood of a flaine Wolfe, and carry it into a shadowie place, where they powre it out. They assigne plants partly to the good, partly to the bad God: as they doe also quicke creatures; the earthly creatures to the good, the watery to the bad, and therefore esteeme him happie that hath killed most of them. Oromazes, say they, begotten of pure light, and Arimanius the childe of darknesse, were one against another. The first created six Gods, Beneuolence, Truth, Politie, Wisdom, Riches, Honest delight: the later as many contrary. When Oromazes had diuice enlarged himselfe, hee was as farre beyond the Sunne, as the Sunne is from the earth, and formed the starres: Of which, one hee fixed as a Gardian and watch-man, the dogge-starre: hee made other foure and twentie Gods, which he closed in an Egge. Arimanius did as much, but his foure and twentie brake their shell; and so became good things and euill mingled. But a satall time shall come, when Arimanius the Author of plague and famine shall perish, and then shall be one societie of all mankind in happinesse, vsing but one language. Theopompus saith, according to their opinion, that one of these Gods shall raigne three thousand yeeres, the other being discomfited; and other three thousand they shall fight and labour to destroy one another: at last Dis Pater shall be destroyed, and men shall be happie. This opinion of the Magi, the Chaldeans haue applied to their Astronomie; in the seuen Planets, making two good; two bad, three indifferent: The Grecians, to their Iupiter, Dis Pater & Harmonia: Empedocles to his Friendship and Discord: Aristotle to his Forma & Priuation: Pythagoras to his One and Two: Plato to his Idem & Alterum: Manes to his deuillish heresie, as before is said. Dio Chrysostomus telleth of Zoroaster the author of this science, that enflamed with the loue of vertue, he forsooke the world, and went apart into a mountaine. And afterwards leauing that habitation, he seemed (to those to whom he would shew himselfe, which was only to the Magi) to shine with a fire which came downe from heauen vpon him. This perhaps was borrowed and peruered from the shining face of Moses.

Only Persians, saith<sup>a</sup> Gramay, were chosen into their number. The name Magi, is among Authors applied also to the Chaldeans, which in Babylon professed the same Arts and superstitions; the disciples (saith<sup>b</sup> Lucian) of Zoroastres, of whose cunning in charmes you may reade in his Necromantia, a pleasant discourse: Mithrobarzanes a Chaldean

Their meate was Acornes, their drinke Milke, Mulse, and the wine of Chaoapi, their lodging on the wide field on the grasse. After all this hee brought him about midnight to Tygris, where washing him, hee purifieth him with a Torus, and the hearbe squilla, and other things, &c. which howsoever Lucian saith with scoffing humour, yet I have inserted, as somewhat expressing their superstitions observed in charming and diuinations.

CHAP. VII.

Of the religions and other rites of the Persians.

c. Herodotus
lib. 1.

LEaving these Magi, let vs take view of the Persian religious rites which Herodotus thus describeth. The Persians neither erect Images, nor Altars, nor Temples, and impute it to madnesse in such as doe otherwise, as I thinke, because they are not of the Greekes opinion, that the Gods haue arisen from men. Their custome is, ascending vp the highest hilles, to offer sacrifices to Iupiter, calling the whole circle of heauen Iupiter. They sacrifice to the Sunne, and Moone, and Earth, to the Fire, and Water, and Winds: to these onely haue they accustomed to sacrifice from the beginning. They sacrifice also to Urania, which they haue learned of the Assyrians, and Arabians. The Assyrians call Venus, Mylitta; the Arabians, Aluta; the Persians, Motra.

Their rites in sacrificing are these. Being to sacrifice, they neither set vp Altar, nor kindle fire, nor vse vestments, pipes, cakes, or libaments: but he which intendeth sacrifice, placing the sacrifice in a cleane place, calleth vpon that God, wearing the Tiara, and girded about with myrtle. The sacrificer praieth not for himselfe alone, but generally for all Persians, and especially for the King. And after that the sacrifice is cut into small peeces, hee streweth vnder the sodden flesh, small hearbes, chiefly squilla, and setting the flesh in order thereon, the Magus standing by, singeth some hymne (of the generation of the Gods) which they hold to be a most effectuall incharment. Without one of their Magi no sacrifice is accounted lawfull. After all this, the sacrificer vseth the flesh at his pleasure.

Of all daies every man accounteth his owne birth-day to bee most solemnly observed: and then maketh greatest chere. The richer sort then set whole Beeves, Camels, Horses, Asses, baked in an oven or fornace, on the Table: the poorer, smaller beasts. The Persians are small eaters: but in their drinking consult of the weightiest matters. Of which they deliberate fasting, but pronounce sentence after they are well drinke. To vomit or make water openly, is vnlawfull to them. Those that are equal, salute when they meet each other with a mutuall kisse; which is fastened on the cheekes onely, if they be of vnequall degree. They hold themselves the best of all men, their neighbours so much better, how much neerer them they dwell. They are much addicted to Venerie with both sexes. Next vnto Martiall valour, they repute excellent the procreation of many Children; the King allowing annuall presents to him who hath begotten most Children, and therefore they vse many women. The childe commeth not in his fathers sight till he be fve yeeres old, but liueth with the women, that if hee die before, his father should thence conceive no griefe. From that time till hee bee twentie, hee learneth three things, to ride, to shoote, to speake truth. For to lie is with them the most shamefull thing; the second, to be in debt. For one fault onely no man ought to be punished, Whatsoever is not meet to be done, ought not to be spoken. A Leprous person, if he be a Citizen, may not enter into the Citie, nor haue any Societie with men: for this disease is sent (say they) for some offence against the Sunne: if hee bee a forrenner, they banish him out of their Region, and for the same cause carrie into that Region white Pigeons. In a Re-

nor they neither spit, nor make water, nor wash, but haue them in very religious veneration. They might not cast any carcasfe or pollution therein. These things, saith Herodotus, I can affirme of the Persians out of mine owne knowledge: that which followeth I doe not so well know; that they burie not their dead bodies before they be torne of some fowle, or dog: but I well know that their Magi do wrap them vp in wax, and then burie them. These Magi differ both from other men, and from the Egyptian Priests in this, that these pollute themselves with the death of nothing but their sacrifices, but the Magi with their owne hands kill any thing: except a man and a dog; yet, they esteeme it some great exploit, if they haue killed very many Anes or Serpents, or other things which creepe or flie. Thus saith Herodotus. Strabo nameth Anaitis, Anahit, and Anadansu, Gods of the Persians: When the Persian Emperours had overthrowne the Saca, they encompassed with a wall a certaine rocke situate in a field, and erecting a Temple of the foresaid Gods, there instituted yearely solemnities, named Saca, which of the inhabitants of Zela are yet celebrated (so they call the place.) That towne in great part belongs to them which are called Sacred servants, to which Pompey added a great Countrey. Some report that Cyrus, hauing overcome the Saca, attributing this victorie to diuine power, consecrated that day to his Countrey-Goddesse, naming it Saca, and wherefoeuer the Temple of that Goddesse is, there also are celebrated those Sacra feasts, in manner of the Bacchanals, day and night, the men and women drinking themselves drunken. Strabo in the end of the same eleuenth booke mentioneth their Temples, and amongst others the Temples of Tanaus, which before in Herodotus is denied to be the vse of the Persians: Cicero blameth the Magi, for procuring Xerxes to burne all the Temples of Greece, because they included their Gods in walles, and to whom the whole world was a Temple and house. Their deuotion to the Sun and Moone, made them spare Delos, sacred to Apollo or the Sun, and the Temple of Diana or the Moone at Ephesus, as an Interpreter of Arctophanes hath glossed. Some hold that Xerxes burnt the Grecian Temples for reuenge of the burning of Sardis, and the Temple of Cybele by the Athenians, and not for hatred of all Temples. The Greekes would not permit the Temples so burned to be re-edified, that those ruinous places might be places of argument to reuenge to all posteritie. The Romans, as Isocrates testifieth, cursed them which should repaire them. Strabo thus reporteth of the Persians: They haue neither Images nor Altars: they sacrifice in an high place, they thinke heauen to be Iupiter: they worship the Sunne, whom they call Mithra, the Moone also and Venus, and the Fire, and the Earth, and the Windes, and the water: they sacrifice in a cleane place, and present their sacrifice crowned: and when is the Magus, ruler of this busines, hath diuided the flesh in peeces to every one, they go their wayes, leauing no part thereof to the Gods, who (say they) are satisfied with the soule of their sacrifice. Some, as it is reported, lay a part of the Numbles on the fire. They sacrifice especially to the Fire, and to the Water, laying on the fire drie stickes, the barkes pulled off, and laying thereon fat Tallow, and powring on the same, Oyle, they kinde the same, nor blowing with their breath, but fanning, or otherwise enforcing the winde thereto. If any bloweth the fire, or cast any dead thing or durt therein, he is punished with death. They performe their Water-ceremonies in this sort: Comming to a Lake, or Riuer, or fountaine, they make a ditch, and there slay a sacrifice, with great heed that none of the next water be touched with the blood: after, laying the flesh on Myrtle and Lawrell, the Magi burne the same with small twigs, and making certaine prayers, sprinkle oyle mixed with milke and hony, not in the fire or water, but on the earth. They are a long while muttering their prayers, holding a bundle of small Tamarisks twigs. That which in one place Strabo saith they worshipped Mars only, is a fault of the negligent writers, as Casaubon hath obserued in his Notes. Iulius Firmicus in his Treatise of the mysteries and errors of prophane religions to Constantine and Con- stantius Emperours, speaketh of the Assyrians and Persians: that the Assyrians ascribed the principality of the elements to the aire, the Image whereof they worshipped, stiling it with the name of Iuno, or Venus the Virgin, whom the Quires of their Priests worshipped with effeminate voices & gestures, their skin polished, and attire fashioned like women. Yea their Priests became impure Ganymedes, and sustained the Sodomiticall lusts of others in the Temples, not shaming, but glorying of such deuotions, & compo-ling themselves to all delicate, lasciuious, filthy behaviour: and thus wantonly dressed with much minstrellicall vpon their Goddesses to infuse into them a diuining and propheticall spirit. Easily may that Impure spirit finde accesse and intertainment in such impure bodies. But the Persians and all the Magi prefer the Fire. These diuide Iupiter into two powers, metamorphosing his nature into both sexes. They make the woman with a three-formed countenance, wound about with monstrous Serpents (fit enigmata for the Diuels worship): and worship a man which had driuen away kine, applying his heels to the power of the Fire; him they call Mithra, whose blinde deuotions were done in places answerable, namely in hidden caues.

In Cappadocia, where is very great store of the Magi, which (of the Fire) are called Pyraibi, and many Temples of the Persian gods, they slay not the sacrifice with a knife, but a club or mallet, wherewith they beat it. The Pyraibia are great inclosed places, in the midst whereof there is an Altar: Thereon the Magi keep much ashes, and a fire continually burning, whither they every day resort, and make their prayers about an houres space, holding a bundle of twigges before the fire, hauing their heads couered with a kind of labelled Mitre, hanging downe on both sides, that the strings couer their lips. These things are done in the Temples of Anaitis and Amannus. For there are their Temples, and there the Image of Amannus is caried in procession. These things we haue seene. It seemeth, that whereas Herodotus reporteth they had no temples, Altars, nor Images: and Strabo so often mentioneth their Temples, and heere the Altar and Image of Amannus; that in Herodotus daies they had none: which grew afterwards in vices, a forren rite brought in among the Persians after the Macedonians had conquered them, or else that there were differing Sects among their Magi, some (as these in Cappadocia) embracing Altars, Images, and Temples, some refusing some or all of these. For otherwise Strabo disagreeeth not only from Herodotus, but from himselfe, before denying them the vse of Altars and Images, and heere affirming it of the Cappadocian Magi (in other things) of the Persian Religion. Perhaps the burning of the Græcian Temples purchased to them that conceit with the vulgar: we know they honored the Temple and Altar at Ierusalem. And lesse matters set on the Friers last, make seely Papists beleene now, that Protestants haue no Churches nor Religion, nor scarcely the shape of men. Hesychius saith that Mithra or the Sunne was the chiefe god with the Persians: and therefore the most religious and inuiolable oath of the King was By Mithra, Iulius Firmicus <sup>a</sup> testifieth (as before is said) that the Persians prefer the Fire before all the other Elements, and that they call the same Mithra. (The reason is, because they held, as in the beginning of this worke we noted out of Zoroaster, that the Sunne and all the Stars are celestiall fires.) They performed their deuotions to the same in dark caues, where they could not see the brightnes of that light. This Hierome calls Mithra den: and Tertullian affirmeth that Mithra Knights or Souldiers were initiated in the same. To whatsoeuer god they sacrificed, they first called vpon the Fire, and poured on their prayers thereto. To this Fire they dedicated certaine Chappels or Oratories, where in to keepe it alway burning, these were called Pyraia: of which Claudian, penitentialium Ignem Sacratum rapere adytis. They supposed that it came downe from heauen. They worshipped al πυρὸς, whatsoeuer <sup>b</sup> had any resemblance of fire, as the Carbuncle stone. They obserued differing ceremonies in their Fire and Water-deuotions. To the Fire <sup>c</sup> they vsed these set words when they added fewell thereto, Lord Fire, eat. They offered wine in a cup, which they called Condy. The costly sacrifices of their Kings we haue already mentioned. Plutarch <sup>d</sup> tells that Artaxerxes married his owne daughter Astossa, (Heracides addeth his other daughter Amestris). And when Astossa was leproous, his loue notwithstanding continued, and hee besought Iuno for her, touching the ground with his hands, replenishing the way betweene the Temple and Pallace (which was sixteene furlongs) with offerings of gold, silver, purple, horses.

We may further adde (from Grammay <sup>e</sup> his Collections out of diuers Authors, and from others, concerning the Persian Religion) that they sometime obserued the Græcian Deities, calling Iupiter, Bel; Hercules, Sandes; Venus, Anaitis. To Iupiter was sacred a Chariot with a Beame of gold. The Sunne they worshipped (by the name of Mithra, and Eldisim) at Sunne-rising: and adored also the painted Image thereof. They accounted the Horse the Sunnes peculiar beast, and offered vnto him white horses.

In Over <sup>b</sup> Darius his Tabernacle, the Image of the Sunne, enclosed in Cristall, shone forth so that it might be scene of all. The order also of Darius his march, when he warred against Alexander, had in the first place their Fire, which they called Sacred and Eternal, carried on silver Altars. Next hereunto the Magi, singing their country-Hymnes, followed by 365. yong men, (so many as their yeare had daies) clothed in bright red, then came Jupiters Chariot, drawne by white horses: after whom followed a horse of exceeding greatnes, consecrated to the Sun. Their riders had white garments, and golden rods. Likewise, both sides of the Kings Chariot were adorned with Images of gold and silver: two being most eminent among them; the one, of Peace, the other, of Warre.

That souldier, which was initiated in Mithraes hallowed orders, was first proued by 80. severall kinds of punishruent: and if he continued stedfast, he was washed, putting on his head a crowne, with a sword interposed. Chast virgins were ballowed the Sun Priests or Nuns. They worshipped Diana, whom they called Nanusca (as some will haue it) in that history of <sup>a</sup> Antiochus. They solemnized certain feasts, the chiefe whereof was that of Mabon. Another holy day they called the Destruction of vices, in which the Magi killed venemous things, and offered; and the seruants lorded it fise daies together, ruling both the family and their masters. Magaphonia they celebrated in memory of the Magi slaine by Darius Histaspis, and his Colleagues. Of their holy-day seen before is spoken: in which (some report, that) the seruants changed offices & garments with the masters. Minutus Felix obiecteth against them their incestuous copulation with their Mothers. Arnobius derideth their worshipping of Rivers. The Christian Fathers and Heathen Authors are plentifull in the narration of the Persian vanities. Eusebius citeth a saying of Bardesanes Cyrus; Among the Persians there was a law to marrie their sisters, daughters, and mothers: which custome the Persians obserued also in other Countries, and therefore other Nations hating them, called them Magussai; of which are many in Egypt, Phrygia, and Galatia, whose posterity succeedeth them in the same wicked doeneff. This name Magussai is deriued of Magi.

But of all other things this was most commendable & admissible which the Persians obserued for learning and practise of vertue, if we may giue like credit to <sup>b</sup> Xenophon here in, as <sup>c</sup> others haue done. They had a kinde of publike Schoole, called the Free or Liberal Market, not for the sale of merchandize (which kinde of markets the ancient Persians wanted) but the learning of ingenuous, liberal, & vertuous conditions. This was diuided into foure parts, one for children till 17. yeares of age, the second for youthe to 27. the third for men till fifty, the fourth for old men. In this liberal Market or Colledge was a Pallace, & Iudgment-place. Early in the morning the children resort hither: here also were the striplings, and the riper-aged men, daily: the old men often. The striplings boarded and lodged there (except they were married) and presented themselves to the Magistrates in armor. Each Court had 12. Prefects, according to the nuber of the Persian Tribes. To the children are old graue men appointed, likewise to the youthe men of riper age, as masters of manners. The children come not in the fathers sight till fise yeares of age, or as Valerius Maximus hath, till seuen, and especially learne truth: they were bere taught by these Prefects the rules of Iustice, not by bare rules, but by examples (for which cause also, Augustus would haue the Senators children present in the Court). Yea a good part of the day was to this end spent by those Prefects, in hearing and deciding such cases as fel out amongst these their schollers, about thefts, reproches, or other wrongs. Next to Truth and Iustice, they learned Sobriety, Abstinence, Continence, & Temperance, wherein they were well furthered by the examples of their Masters: neither might they eat but in their presence and with their leaue, and that not of the choicest fare, but bread and cresses, whereto they added drinke from the next river. They planted in them a hatred of vices, especially of lying, and in the next place of debt, which cannot but be attended with much disquiet: and therefore wisely did Augustus command to buy him the pillow of a Roman Gentleman, that died incredibly indebted, as if there had therein rested some sleeping power, whereon one so much indebted could take any rest. Ingratitude was as little gratefull as the former, and by the Persian lawes, ingratefull persons were subiect to accusation and punishment, as not Xenophon only, but <sup>d</sup> Marcellinus also hath marked, howsoeuer Seneca findes such a law only amongst the Macedonians, which perhaps was hence borrowed. They hated such as forooke their friends and country-men in need, Their awfull respect to their parents such, that they might not sit in the mothers presence without her leave: the father had tyrannicall power ouer his children, for life and death. That which was vnto them vnlawfull in deed, was not permitted in obscene and filthy words to be spoken. There were the Noble mens children brought vp neere the Pallace gates: and in the Provinces neere the gates of the Deputies or Gouernours.

For bodily exercise, they learned to shoot, to cast darts, to ride and manage horses, & to fight on horse-back. And this was their education till 17. yeares of age: in which time they were of the second ranke of Springalls & youths; & for ten yeares after did not repaire home at nights, but lay & abode in this Court or Colledge. When the King went on hunting, halfe of them attended him in armour. Their diet was the same, but somewhat larger, as is before related of the children: and in hunting, if it continued two daies, had but one daies allowance. They vsed to runne long races, of 30. or 40. miles long; they exercised the sling, leaping, & wrestling, the King propounding rewards to the Victor. The help of these were vsed by the Magistrates against robbers, murderers, and the like wicked persons: as also of the Men, which was the third order, the Society of Magistrates; and the souldiery of the Persians, till they were 30. yeares old: after what more, at which age they were freed from musters & forren employments; home were employed in publike & priuat iudgements. None might attaine this hono- in Age, but by those degrees before expressed: nor might any haue that education but the children of nobles, which were able to beare the charge. It was vnlawfull amongst the Persians to laugh in loud manner openly, or openly or by the way to doe the ments of nature by seege, urine, or vomit: or to make water standing.

But this ancient Persian discipline and sobriety, with wealth and softness, afterwards corrupted, especially in drinking; to repress which, the Kings made an Est. 1. that none should be compelled to forget their health, in remembring of health or other Bacchanal deuises, wherof would God we had lesse cause to complaine. There of Harlots were also added to their drinkings, which when the Emperour Alexander King of Macedon, to demand Earth and Water (which was the Persian custome when they exacted full subiection and possession) extended to Maitron, Alexander his sonne sent yong men armed in womens habit amongst them, which quenched these hot flames of lust with their blood. Hence haply it was, that Assuerus would needs make shew of Vashti the Queene in his magnificent feast, which occasioned his deprivation and Esters succession. Amidst their cups they consulted of war and warlike affaires; but decreed not till afterwards. The Persians vsed bankettings vnder i- ras hangings, before the time of Attalus, from whom the Romans first borrowed the vse of them; of his aula or hall hanged therewith, calling them aulae. But the walls of the richer Persians were hangd with them, the floors spread with costly carpers, their tables furnished with rich plate, their bodies shining with curious & costly ornaments, their kitchens stored with garlike, as a preseruatiue against Serpents & venemous creatures, their chambers swarming with Concupines, yea mothers, daughters, and sisters wedded and bedded with them: their second seruices called in Scripture The banquet wine, when after the belly full farced with meats, with which they drank water, they had other tables set with wine, on which they gaue a new onset, as a fresh enemy: these and the like excesses wold glut our Reader. To bring him to their mourning rites in which they shaued themselues, their horses, & mules; their sackcloth, & not entring the court, their covering the face of such as incurred the Kings anger, as wee reade of Haman: their executions, with slaying, crucifying, burning, burying alive, stoning, cutting slender, &c. This pertaineth to their religion, their diuination by lots, as before Haman they, perhaps the Magi, cast Phur, that is, a lot from day to day, & from month to month: see which would be the most lucky and fatall time for his mischievous plot against the Jewes. Their mariages they celebrated in the Spring: & on their marriage day the husbands eat nothing but an apple, or the marrow of a Camel. The Persians are accounted authors of making Eunuches, which Petronius Arbitr & M. Seneca ascribe to the curiosiety of their lust, which might thus be longer serued of them. They vsed in election to vncouer or put off the Tiara. Here I might lade you with the Persian wardrobe, the length and variety of their garments; & I might tell you of their earrings and jewels paintings of their faces long haire: of their kissing salutations if they were equal, and of the knee of the superiour by the inferiour, and adoration of the chiefe: of their women womanly detestation in the eagerest degree of hatred and indignation, the singeing of wooll: of their inhumane crueltie to the kindred of those which had committed some grievous crime, to punish all for the offence of one. The Persians made banquets to their Gods, and gaue them the first fruits thereof. But it is time to leaue their Gods and them; and let me obtaine pardon, that this great Monarchie, sometime stretching from India to Ethiopia in twelue Provinces, hath stretched so far, and commanded me so long attendance in this Discourse. Let me now looke vpon the Mahumetan face thereof.

CHAP. VIII.

Of the alterations of the State and Religion in Persia, under the Saracens.

THE Saracens (as is already shewed) a people bred, as it were, of putrification in that corrupt estate of the world, dispossessed of his state & life Ormisdas the last Persian King. Their Religion had sustained small alteration in Persia before this time, for ought I finde, sauing what the Christian had in these partes preuailed, (which belongeth to another taske.) But from that time that the Saracens were Conquerours, the foules of the Persians haue no lesse benee subiect to those foolish Mahumetan superstitions, then their bodies to cruell slauerie: yea, the name of Persian was drowned in the tide of Saracens. Homar was then Caliph. But when Iezid the sonne of Muamir Priest and King (such are the Caliphs) of the Saracens; Mutar, the Deputie or Governour of Persia, proclaymed himselfe a Prophet, and seized on the State: from him the Persian Sophi deriueth his originall. When Iezid was dead, the Inhabitants of Calis in Arabia proclaymed Hocem the sonne of Ali Caliph: but Abdalam the sonne of Iezid intrapped and slew him; and at his Sepulchre was after erected the Citie Carabala. This Hocem had twelue sonnes, Zeinal, Abadin, Zeinal Muamed, Bagner Muamed, Giasar, Cadeneg, Ciasar Musa, Cazin Musa, Hali Maceras, Alle Muamed, Taqum, Muamed Halmaguin, Alle Hacem, Asquerin, Hacem Muamed Mahadin: This last the Persians say that he is not yet dead, but that he shall come sitting on a Horse, to preach their Law to all Nations: beginning in Massadalle where Ali his grandfather lieth buried. And therefore they haue there alway a Horse prepared ready, which in time of Diuine Service, on a certaine festiuall day, they bring with Lights burning to the Temple, in which Ali is buried, praying him to send his nephew quickly. That day is solemnely celebrated, with so great concourse of people, as a Portugall there present said he had neuer seene the like. The other eleuen brethren were buried in diuers places. To returne to Mutar, Abdimelec one of the following Caliphs, sent Ciasa against him, by whose ouerthrow that new Prophet wan new and greater estimation then before. But another Tytant Abdala Zubir, arising amongst the Saracens, sent his brother Musub against Mutar, who slew Mutar, and was soone after slaine himselfe by Abdimelec, who recouered againe that Prouince of Persia. Abdimelec being dead, in the yeare seuen hundred and two and twentie, Gizid his sonne succeeded, and another Gizid vsurped the Scepter in Persia, but was overthrowne by Masabner the Captaine of Abdimelec sonne.

a Curio Sara. hist. lib. 1. Blondus saith, that Mahumet was present at their first conquest, and that by his command they relinquished their name, & accepted the Saracen. dec. 1. l. 9. So also affirmeth Lope Obregon in conquest of the Alcaron. fol. 44. b. Barr. Al. dec. 2. lib. 10 c. 6.

In the reigne of Marnan, Asmulin tooke on him the protection of Mutars Sect, assuming Ali to be greater then Mahumet: he was Prince of the Corasens in Persia, and by one Catabannus his counsaile incited the seruants, by force or treacherie, to kill their Masters: and these being growne great by their Masters wealth, were diuided into two factions, the Caisini, and the Lamonites. Asmulin Captaine of the Lamonites destroyed the Caisini: and with his Lamonites, and Catabannus invaded Persia, and were there encountred by Iblinus the Lieutenant, with an Armie of an hundred thousand men; but the Lamonites, by the incouragement of Asmulin and Catabannus, (whom they reckoned holy men) discomfited him and his; and after encounter Marnau himselfe with three hundred thousand men, and made him to flee with some thousand into Egypt, where Salin the sonne of Asmusin overthrew him. Thus the Maruanian race being expelled (the reliques whereof settled themselves in Fesse and Spaine) Asmusin, from whom the family of the Sophi descendeth, with Carab reigned over the Saracens.

By this which hath been said, appeareth a continuall difference betwixt the Persians and other Saracens about their Religion; eyther (as some affirme) for that the Persians preferred Ali to Mahumet, or for that (which is more likely) they accounted Ali and not any of the other three (Eubocar, Ofmen, or Homar) to be the true successor of Mahumet. The Sultans or Deputies of Persia, which governed there vnder the Caliph, used that their Schismaticall fancie, as they sawe occasion, to their owne ambitious designs, vnder colour of Religion. Among the rest Muamet or Mahumet is famous, who being hardly beset for the like cause by his Master, the Caliph of Bagader, required ayde (as before is more largely shewed) of the Turkish Nation then wading in part of Armenia, called of them Turcomania, who sent him for his succour three thousand Turkes vnder the leading of Tangrolspix, by whose help Pisafrits the Califa was overthrownt. And after this he obtained both the Sultanship of Persia in the yeare of our Lord, 1020. and also slew Pisafrits; and enjoyed that soueraigntie thenceforth the Califs of Bagader being stripped of their temporalls, but retaining still the places of Patriarchs of their Religion (as some relate) euen to this day. But by the relations of Beniamin Tudalensis, and others, it appeareth that the Caliph of Bagader recovered their state till the Tartar dispossessed both the Turke and them, as we haue already shewed out of Zachutus, in our Historie of the Saracens. The Turkes then possessing the Persian royaltie, and possessed of the Persian superstitions, there reigned one hundred and seuentie yeares, the Tartars then chasing them out of Persia: but after that Changis Can had founded that Empire, Hocota, or Occoda Can his successor, sent out his sonnes diuers wayes with diuers Armies, with intent to subdome the world: Iochi conquered Turquestan and Persia: and not long after Mango Can sent Haslon his brother, who continued and perfected the Tartarian Conquests beyond Phison or Tygris, subduing the whole Kingdome of the Persians, taking Beldack with the great Chalifa, whom hee starued amidst his Treasure; beleagued a Castle of the Assassini, with a siege of seuen and twentie yeares; and then taking the same by composition of the defendants, onely for want of clothing: he wanne Alepp, and the Kingdome of Syria, with Damascus the head Citie thereof: and had intended also the Conquest of the Holy Land from the Saracens, if hee had liued; for this Haslon and Mango the great Can, were both Christians by perswasion of Aithon the Armenian King.

About this time in the North-East parts of Persia (which of this new heresie they called Mulehet) there was an olde man, named Aloudin, a Mahumeran (as all those partes then were) which had inclosed a goodly valley, situate betwene two hills, and furnished it with all varietie, which Nature and Art could yeeld, as fruits, pichure, rills of milke, wine, honey, water, pallaces, and beautifull damosells richly attired, and called it Paradise; to which was no passage, but by an impregnable Castle. And daily preaching the pleasures of this Paradise to the youths which he kept in his Court, sometimes he would minister a sleepe drinke to some of them, and then conueigh them thither; where being entertained with these pleasures foure or fift dayes, they supposed themselves rapt into Paradise. And then being againe cast into a trance by the said drinke, he caused them to be carried forth; and then would examine them of what they had seene, and by this delusion would make them resolute for any enterprize, which he should appoint them; as to murder any Prince, his enemy. For they feared not death, in hope of their Mahumericall Paradise. But this Haslon or Nas, after three yeares siege, destroyed him, and this his Foolish Paradise. Some tell that this Aloudin in the time of Zelim the first. Abaga succeeded him in the gouernment of these partes, Anno 1264. but not in the Christian religion: Taiyod the next, became a Saracen, and called himselfe Mahumet, and at Tauris and other places destroyed the Churches

Churches of the Christians, as Hasan had done of the Saracens; he banished the Christians, and persecuted as many Tartars as he could to Mahometisme. But Arghun the sonne of Abaga rebelled, and taking him, cut him asunder in the middle, succeeding in his place, Anno 1285. After this Regys, whom the Tartars slew, placing in his stead Bajda a Christian, who forbade the preaching of Mahometisme among the Tartars, and reedified the Churches of the Christians: Casim succeeded in his Dominion and Dignation: and after his death Carbagadd, who in his child hood had beene baptizd, and named Nicholas, but when his Christian mother was dead, hee became a Saracen.

This came out of Haishama; in which History appeareth the vicissitude of diverse Religions, sometime Tartarian, sometime Christian, sometime Mahometan, as in the Persons who governed these Countreys under the great Chow or Cane of the Tartars: for also no doubt in a great part of the countreys themselves, which usually are of the longa- tion. This Carbagadda, reigning about 1305, is the last Tartar Prince which ruled in these parts; for as their religion, so also their Empire failed; the Egyptian Soldans possiding in Syria; the Ottoman Turkes, in Asia; and Grimpas, in Persia. This Grimpas was Soldan of the Parthians; and about the year 1350, restored that Persian Kingdome to the Parthians. From him descended the Persian Kings to Malaanchrez, who being taken away by fraude, Alis Cassan succeeded. Yet was not the Persian state so long in Grimpas his posteritie, but that great Tamerlane subdued the same unto himselfe, which his sonne after lost againe. Alis Cassan was succeeded by Alis Cassan (called also Assymbesius) deprived the Sultan of Parthia and Persia of his life and kingdome: his name is by some Malaanchrez; by others, Demir: but Ambrosio Cassan, and Iosapha Barbaro (which both were in Persia with Alis Cassan) call him Tamir. In the year 1478, died Alis Cassan; and his sonne Isach succeeded, whose wife, bearing dishonest affection to one of the Courtiers, sought by the murder of her husband to advance this Courtier to her husbands bed and Empire. And having conveyed venime into a golden Cup, presents her husband the same to drinke, who somewhat suspecting her, caused her to begin; himselfe and his sonne following her both in drinking and dying. And thus was Persia, by the wickednesse of one woman, made the stage of civil warres, whiles the chiefe Nobles sought each to possess himselfe of the state, which at last, after five or sixe yeares warre, befell to Almansor or Elnasirbeg, then being but thirtie yeares olde, who was slaine by Ismael in the year 1499.

This last year 1613, was printed at Paris, a large French volume of the Estates, Emperors and Principalities of the World, in which is an abridgement of the Historie of the Kings of Persia, written by Tarik Mirchand a Persian; and translated by a Portugall, from Cyrus to our times: wherein he relateth of the ancient Persian Dynasties, somewhat otherwise then the Greekes and Latines: to which after Isidore, whom he call- eth Tarik Gerd, he annexeth the succession of the Califs which ruled Persia, in this order, Abubaker, Homay, Osman or Orman, Murtz Aly, Acen, after whom the family which becometh Ben Hamya, of which were successively, Morvya, Texid, Morvya 2. Morvya, Abdel Malik, Oelid, Soleyman, Hamay, Texid 2. Ochon, Oeloyd 2. Texid 3. Ebrahim, Morvya 3. Gamsarukhan, Budukhan, Gamsarukhan, Alypshukhan, who after was called Sultan Hamad, Sultan Abu Said Babader Khan. After whom follow the Mogol Tartars (fifty years being omitted without name) Tymurlang, Mirzah Karak, Ologbek, Mirzah Abdolatif, Mirzah Abdula, Mirzah Sultan Abu Said, who reigned in Mauranahar, Mirzah Sultan Hamad, Mirzah Babur. Then in Karafen, Mirzah Hyadigar, Mirzah Sultan Oem, Babady or Pelty, Arzamon, and his brother Muzapha: These reigned from the years 1388. to 1469. In which meane time there were of the Turcoman Nation which commanded other parts of Persia, first Kana Issuf of the family Karakuyun, who began his raigne anno 1413. to whom succeeded Amir Scandar, Jooscha, Acen Aly, and after him of the family Akoyunly Acenbek, Sultan Ralis, Yacub Bek, Baysangor, Mirza, Rustambek, Hagmet Bek, Abdus Bek, Adorad Bek; which through mutuall quarrells enjoyed the Throne a small space. And in the year 1501. Chah Ismael Sophy, and his line succeeded, and still continue. Howsoever the Chahs are here expressed as Lords of Persia, yet Bernardinus Tudeletensis telleth that Senigar, then King of Persia, had twoscore and fortie Kingdomes subiect to him, and that his Dominion extended foure moneths away, and speaketh as though he were not subiect to the Caliph in his temporallities: M. Polo reckons eight Kingdomes of Persia, Calibin, Curdistan, Lor, Suolistan, Spaan, Siras, Soncais, Timoecim; not reckoning Hirak, the chiefe Citie whereof was Tauris, and diuers other Countreies now, and before his time subiect to the Persians. And by most Historians it appeareth that Persia had before the dayes of Tamrolasp, and till the Tartars conquest, Sultans which yielded small subiection to the Chahs. The historie of Ismael, because it giueth much light both into the state and religion of Persia, is more fully to be reported. After that Mustacen Mumbila, or Abumustacenbila Abdula, the Chaliph of Bagdet, had bene by the Tartars done to death, in the year after Haithonus account 1258. (about the year 1369.) there arose in Persia a Noble man called Sophi, Lord of the Citie Ardouil, reporting himselfe to be of the blood of Alle or Hali, descended from Musa Cazin, or Cyrus one of the twelue sonnes (as is said) of Hocum, thirteene descents distant. This Sophi, or (as our Tarik Mirza aforesaid calls him Cheque Saffy) had issue Cheque Mocha, the father of Cheque Ali, who begate Cheque Ebrahim, and he Sultan Ismejd, father of Cheque Aydar, who begate Ismael. These continued their Hali-bolies. Our Authors mention none from Sophi to Ismejd, whom they make his sonne, calling him Gwinne, otherwise written, Ginn, Gwine, and Ginnet. Minadoi saith, That Sexchiuni, or more distinctly, Scieci Ginn, was Author of the Persian Sect, who vnder the name of a Sofi, and of Siec (that is, a wise man, and an Author of Religion) or rather vnder the pretence of holinesse, began to perswade the people, that the three first successors of Mahomet were vsurpers, only Ali ought to be named lawfull successor, and ought to be called vpon in their prayers, and by all meanes to be honoured. From this time forward the Sepulchre of Abul his sonnes in Cafe grew in great credite, and was visited every year after the same sort that the Turks visit the Sepulchre of the other three: and the kings of Persia vsed that to be crowned, and girt with their sword, & their great Calife there kept his residence. Because this Cafe was neere Babylon, hence grew the common error, that these things were done at Babylon or Bagdet. Iosius also is deceived, where he maketh Arduil or Aiders, author of the Persian faction. Sofi is by Minadoi deriued of Sofisi, a people subdued by Alexander: but Scaliger more fitly Tzophi, which in Arabike signifies man of pure Religion. In this respect there is no lesse contention betweene these and other Muhammedans, then betweene the Samaritans & the Jewes: so that the Persians are a kinde of Catharists or Puritans in their impure Muhammedie. Claude Dore mentioneth another Erymologie, that Sophi significth wooll, and that this profession in token of humillity, wearing nothing on their heads more pretious then wooll, was so called. But the former deriuation is more probable. Nic. Nicolai in his third booke hath also that woollen deriuation: and Geffrey Duckett saith, that Sophi significth a Begger, and that the King is not there in Persia so called, but Shangh; which agrees with their report, which say that Ismael renewed or continued the name Sofi or Sophi; but his successors leauing that, and the name of Siec, haue retained onely the title of Saba, which some write Shangh, some Xa, a royall title communicated by the head of this superstition to those Kings which participate with them therein. Joseph Scaliger saith, that Sa or Seba is the same with Adoniscar among the French, and Don among the Spaniards: The Iewes and Arabians write it ow, and the Greeks ow. It is sometimes set before the name, as in the present King Seba Habas; sometime comes after, as Melixa for Melchior. Barrius begins this pedigree at the father of Guine, or Guini (so he calls him) and not as Mamad, with Guini himself. He addeth, That for the Ensigne, Character, or Cognisance of his Sect, he ordained, that in the midst of their Turbant (which they weare with many folds) there should rise a sharpe top, in manner of a Pyramis, diuided into twelue parts (in remembrance of Adi his twelue sonnes) from the top to the bottome. They vsed the colour red on their heads (saith Mamad) by ordinance of Arduelle, and therefore were called Chafelhai, that is, Red-heads; some write it Gusfelhai, Sophi, as Mirkend affirmeth; was holden in such reputation of holinesse by Tamerlane, that he sought to fix him as a saint; and at his request, set free 30000 slaves, which he had taken in the wars against Balecas; to whom Cheque Sophi gaue apparell and other necessities, and sent them home to their houses: whereby he ovaue great fame and affection: Barrius and others attribute this to Guine, and say that these slaves became his disciples first, and after souldiers to his sonne Aider against the Christian Georgians.

This Aider Erdabil (or after Ionian, Haridur) he taking (as some say) the world; led a streight life in continencie and austeritie, and was theretofore admitted as a Prophet, and referred to out of all parts of Armenia and Persia coming to Tauris to see him: He inuenged against the common opinion concerning Mahomet his successors, Alcoran and Sophi had done, shunning vp heauen to all sauing Husid his followers. For so the Persians vie to say in their prayers; Cursed be Ebnulhar, Oman, and Osman: God be fauourable to Hali, and well pleased with him. Usfunassan moued with his fame, gaue him in marriage his daughter Martha lagor of the Christian Lady Deffina, daughter of Cale Ismael Emperour of Tapezond; both of them by this alliance strengthening themselves against the Turke. Aider had by this Martha, Ismael, whom hee trained vp in the principles of Christian Religion. Iacob, successor of Usfunassan, zealous of the multitude of *Aider*s disciples, and the greatnesse of his fame, caused him to be secretly murdered; persecuting all his professed followers with fire and sword. Ismael then a child, fled into Hircania to one Pyrchales, a friend of his fathers, who afterwards aided him to the recouering of his patrimonie. Boterus saith, that Iacob, after the murder of Aider, committed his two sonnes, Ismael and Solyman, to Amanassan (a Captaine of his) to be conueied to Zalga, a strong mounting place: but he brought them vp liberally with his owne children, and in his last sicknesse, gaue them horse and two hundred ducats, with aduice to repaire to their mother; where taking vpon him the protection of the sect of Hali, and the revenge of his fathers death, his enterprises succeeded prosperously. Giouan Maria Anguillo saith, that Iacob being poisoned 1485, his seignorie was possessed by a kinsman of Iacob; called Eslauer, after whose 3 yeeres raigne succeeded Bayindir two yeeres; after, Rustan three yeeres, who sent Soliman bee against Sechadar the father of Ismael, who made challenge to the State in right of his wife the daughter of Usfunassan, who slew him in the field. Rustan would also haue killed the mother and her sonnes, had not intreatie of his Nobles preuened it: He committed them to ward in the Island of the Armenians in the lake Astumar, whither he sent for them againe after three yeeres, but they for feare fled to Arduuill, and there liued closely for a time. Rustan was slaine by Agmat through his mothers procurement, who loued that Agmat, who abode Sultan five months, and was slaine by *Rustan*s souldiers. And Alkan the kinsman of Usfunassan was Seignior, whom Ismael slew.

A certaine Merchant who abode a long time in Tauris, and trauelled thorow the most part of Persia (skillfull of the Turkish, Persian, and Arabian languages, either seeing himselfe, or learning of them which did see) in the time of Ismael; relates this Historie from what other wise, whom as learning of the Persians themselves the Persian affaires, we may reckon worthy to be followed, saith, that this Sechadar in Arduuill was the head of this Sophian Sect, and had three sons and three daughters by the daughter of Usfunassan. Hee was a zealous enemy against the Christians, oftentimes with his his followers repairing into Circassia, doing the people much dammage, which when in the daies of Sultan Almansur he attempted as before times, he was by Almansur ordered forbidden at Darbent further passage: but seeking to make way by force, hee was by the forces of Almansur taken, and his head, on the top of a lance, presented to Almansur, and by his command, given to the dogges to be eaten; the cause why the Sophians are such enemies vnto dogges, killing all they finde. This newes comming to Almansur, his three sonnes fled, one into Naxos, another to Aleppo, Ismael the third to an Island in the lake of Van, in which is a citie of Christian Armenians, where hee abode some yeeres in the house of an Armenian Priest, being then about thirteene yeere old, who vsed him courteously, and instructed him in the rudiments of Christian Religion. A yeere after he went from Arminig to Chillan, where he kept with a Goldsmith his fathers friend. In this time he had intelligence, by mutuall writing, with his friends at Ardouill: and with this Goldsmith hauing gathered together eightene or twentie men of their Sect secretly to take a strong castle, called Maumutaga, and hidden in ambush two hundred horsemen of his friends in Ardouill, suddenly slaying the guard, and possessing himselfe of the Castle, he entred a Towne not farre from the Castle, killing the inhabitants, and carrying the spoile to the Castle. This Castle was very rich, because it was a principall Hauen of the Caspian Sea; and so strong, that when Almansur had newes hereof, he was dissuaded from sending any power thither to besiege him. Two daies iourney from hence is Sumachi: which with his power, now encreased, hee also tooke, and diuided the spoiles euery where to his souldiers, which with some of this liberalitie came from all parts vnto him. He sent also into Hiberia, three or foure daies iourney from thence, which was then gouerned by seuen great Lords, three of which, Alexander Sbee, Gorgurambec, and Murzambec, with many promises of present spoiles and future exemptions from tribute, hee wonne to his side, receiuing from each of them three thousand horse, so that he was now growne fiftene or sixteene thousand strong. Almansur with thirtie thousand valiant souldiers went to meet him betweene Tauris and Sumachia, and hauing passed a great riuer, ouer which were two Bridges, hee presently caused them to be broken: Ismael arriuing there the next day, with great diligence found a passage thorow the streame, and with his whole forces, in front, in the breake of the day, assailed Almansur his armie, little suspecting such a good morrow, that Almansur with a few companions hardly escaped. The pavilions, horses, and other bootie, Ismael bestowed on his souldiers: and then hasted to Tauris, where entring without resistance, he made great slaughter, killing all the race of Jacob, opening his Sepulchre, and the Graues of other Noblemen, which had bene at the battle of Darbent against his father, and burning their bones; 300. harlots hee caused to be cut asunder in the middle: he killed all the dogges in Tauris, and because his mother had married to one of those Nobles which were in the battle of Darbent, he caused her head to be stricken off in his presence. In this while many Townes, Cities, Castles, and Lords submitted themselves to him, and ware his red-coloured Turbant: but the Castle Alangiachana (whereto were subiect eightene villages of Christians, which vsed yeerely to send to Rome two men from the Patriarch to the Pope, of whose faith they were, speaking Armenian, hauing some bookes, but quite lost the vse of the Italian language) this Castle (I say) held out for Almansur vntill his death.

While Ismael was Sultan in Tauris, the Sultan in Bagadet Murat Can son of Jacob, with an army of 30000. marched against him, and in a plaine meeting with Ismael was there ouerthrowne, not 70. persons escaping to Bagadet with Murat Can: the place bearing witnes of the slaughter, buried vnder many new hills of bones. All these things were done Anno 1499. And while I was in Tauris, many came from Naxos, Caramania, and Turkie to serue him; of whom they were graciously entertained. Anno 1507. our Author being then in Malacia, saw with his eyes, the Sultan Almansur conueied prisoner by Amirbec, who with foure thousand men going from Mosul (sometime Ninive) to Amit, where the Sultan kept, with promise and profession of his succor, being admitted the citie, tooke him, and cast a chaine about his necke, whose head Ismael smot off with his owne hands. He was presented to him by Amirbec in the country of Aladuli, Adul, against whom Ismael was now warring: where taking the citie Cartibirt, he cut off the head of Beccabee sonne of Aladuli Lord thereof with his owne hands. From thence returning to Tauris he had almost done as much to his two brethren, whom he had left Gouvernours in his absence, for transgressing their Commission, but with much intreatie of his Lords, spared their lives, yet confined them to Ardouill, not to depart from thence. The next yeere he pursued Murai Can, who was come to Syras, a Citie not inferiour to Cairo in Egypt, with six and thirtie thousand men, but malecontent, and therefore many of them fleeing vnto Ismael. Whereupon Murai Can sent two Embassadors with fiftie hundred followers, with offer of Vassallage vnto him. Ismael cut them all in peeces, saying, That if Murai Can would be his Vassall, he should come in person, not by Embassage. Murai Can had closely sent Spies to observe the sequele of his businesse, and being heereof by them aduertised, fled: For many of his Nobles had already put on the red Turbant, of whom hee feared to be taken, as Alumus had beene; and therefore with three thousand of his most faithfull hee fled vnto Aleppo: but the Soldan of Cairo not admitting him, hee went to Aladuli, who entertained him honourably, and gaue him his daughter to wife.

Ismael, after great slaughters in Siras and Bagadet, was forced to returne to Spaan with his Armie. For Ieslbas the Tartar had taken all the Countrey of Corasan, and the great Citie of Eri, which is in compasse betwixt fortie and fiftie miles, well peopled, and full of Marchandize: Hee had taken also Straua, Atpixandaran, and Sari, on the Caspian shore; and with intent to beguile Ismael, desired leaue to passe thorow his Countrey to Mecca on Pilgrimage. Ismael with deniall, and other sharpe words, repelled his suit, and abode a yeere in Spaan, to withstand his enterprises. After hee returned to Tauris, where were great Triumphs solemnized in his honour. This Sophi is so loued and feared (saith this Marchant) that they hold him as a God, especially his souldiers: of which, some goe into the warres without Armour, holding it sufficient, that Ismael will succour them: others, because they content themselves to die for Ismael, goe into battaile with naked breast, crying, Schiack, Schiack. i. God, God. And they forget the name of God, alway naming Ismael: they hold, That he shall not die, but liue cuer. And where other Mosulmans say, Lia ylla yllala, Mahamet resullalla, the Persians say, L a ylla yllala, Ismael wellalla; reputing him a God and a Prophet. I haue learned, that Ismael is not contented to be called or worshipped as God. Their custome is to weare red Bonnets, with a certaine thing like a girdle, large below, and straiter vpwards, made with twelue folds, a finger thicke, signifying the twelue Sacraments of their Sect, or those twelue brethren, nephewes of Ali. Ismael was of faire countenance, of reasonable stature; thicke and large in the shoulders, shauen all but the mustaches; left-handed, stronger then any of his Nobles, but giuen to Sodomie. At his second comming to Tauris, he caused to take twelue of the fairest boies in the Citie to serue his lust, and after gaue to each of his Nobles one for the like purpose, and before tooke ten of the best mens sonnes for the same intent.

Thus farre haue wee had commerce with this namelesse Persian Marchant in Ramissu his shoppe, who sometime attended on his Court and Campe. Others adde heereunto, That he sent Embassadors to all the Mahumetan Princes of the East, to receive that redde-Hat Ensigne, together with his Sect; as did his sonne Tammai after him, when Nizzamulucco onely accepted thereof. But it is the common opinion, that the greatest part of the Mahumetans in Soria and of Asia Minor are secretly of that Sect. Ismael after this warred, and wonne, vpon the Zagatai Tartars, and other adjacent Nations, that he left vnto his successors a very great Estate, reaching from the Caspian Sea to the Persian, and betweene the Lake Iorco and Tigris, the Riuer Abbian, and the Kingdome of Cambaya, more then twentie degrees from East to West; and eightene from North to South. Hee ordained a new Lyturgie, and forme of Praier, differing from the ancient. Such was his authoritie, that they would sweare, By the Head of Ismael, and blesse in his name, saying, Ismael grant thee thy desire. Vpon his Coyne, on the ope side, was written, La illabe illalahn Muhamedun resullabe: And on the other, Ismaill balse illalabe, that is, Ismael the Vicar of God.

The Jewes, at the first, had this Ismael in such admiration, that they foolishly reckoned Ismael to be their promised Messias, gratulating themselves, in this conceit, throughout the most part of Europe, celebrating festiuall Solemnities, with mutuall Presents, in testimonie of their ioy; which yet was soone dashed, none hating the Jewes more then Ismael. He lieth buried at Ardoull, in a faire Meskit, with a sumptuous Sepulchre made by himselfe in his life time; where is a faire Stone-Hospitall erected by him for strangers, allowing to all travellers three daies reliefe for horse and man free. Ardoull is in latitude 38. degrees.

The life of Ismael had bene answerable to the bloudie presages in his ominous birth; for he came forth of his mothers wombe with both his hands shut, and full of bloud: for which cause his father would not haue brought him vp, but commended him to be slaine: but they which carried him away, moued with compassion, secretly nourished him three yeeres, and after presented him to his father, who then acknowledged and receiued him with loue and kindnesse: for this his bloudie and warlike spirit dwelt in a louely and amiable body, adorned with all the Ensignes of beauty. He died Anno 1524.

Schiach Thesmet, or Shaugb Tamaz, succeeded, and reigned about fiftie yeeres. He liued deuoutly, and yet (for their Law reconcleth both) very voluptuously, inheriting his fathers Throne, but not his valour, and spending the greatest part of his time amongst his women. So zealous he was of their superstition, that when M. Ienkinson came to his Court with the Queenes Letters to treat with him of Traffique and Commerce for our English Marchants, before his feet touched the ground, a pair of the Sophies owne Shooes or Basinackes (such as himselfe vsed to weare, when he was in the night to pray) were put vpon his feet, lest their holy ground should be polluted with Christian steps. And being admitted into his presence, and asked of his Religion, Whether he were a Gower, that is, an Vnbeleueer, or a Muselman, (so they called then of their owne profession) hauing answered, that he was a Christian, beleueing Christ to be the greatest Prophet: Oh thou vnbeleueer (said he) wee haue no need to haue friendship with the vnbeleueers; and so willed him to depart: which he did, and after him followed a man with a Basinet of Sand, sifting all the way that he had gone with in the said Pallace, euen from the Sophies sight vnto the Court-gate.

In his time Solyman (as in our Turkish Relations before is shewed) much endamaged the Persians, and tooke Babylonia, Tauris, and other parts of their dominions; yet did Tamaz recouer some part thereof againe, and draue Solyman out of Tauris (or Ecbarana, as Minadoi interpreteth) and, by a composition, caused him to reue the Fort of Chars, erected by the Turkes in his frontiers. Hee died the eleuenth of May, 1576. leauing behinde him eleven children: Mahamet the eldest, who had liued a while in Heri (sometime called Aria) and after in Siras (anciently named Persopolis): his second sonne was Ismael, whom for his fiercenesse his father had confined to the Castle Cahaca: the third, Aidere; the rest, Mamut, Solimano, Musli, Emanguli, Alichau, Amet, Abrabim, and Ismael the younger. Hee appointed his second sonne Ismael his successour, esteeming him more worthie then Mahamet Cadabanda (this surname was given him for his diseased eyes) as being giuen to a studious and quiet life, and contenting himselfe, that Abas Mirize (which now reigneth) was confirmed in the Citie of Heri, and honoured with the title of the Visier of the Countrey.

Periaconcona, the daughter of Tamaz, and elder then any of the brethren, being in Commission with other Counsellors of State to see her fathers Will executed, while the Posts ranne with aduertisements to Ismael, was attempted by Aidere with earnest solicitation for the Crowne: whose ambitious desire shee so farre satisfied, that shee caused him to be inuested in Regall apparrell, and settled in the great Gallerie, attending the acclamation of the people; being publickely installed, as though he were elected King. But meane while shee set sure guards of men, deuoted to Ismael, at the gates of the Palace; thus purposing to entertaine him (with dreams of dangerous honours) till Ismael arrived at Casbin. But whiles he (suspecting the deceit) sought to flee, he left his head behinde in the hands of Sabamul his viceroy, which he cast, all-bloudie, in the midst of his conspiring partakers. Ismael soone after came, and receiued with publike applause the desired Soueraignty: and as he had before addicted himselfe to the studie of the Turkish Law: (enough, if it had been knowne, to haue barred his succession) so now, after the Turkish manner, he foundeth his Throne (a foundation too slipperie to stand) in bloud, causing the heads of his eight yonger brethren to be cut off, together with all such as were neere them in bloud or affinitie; and all the fauourites of the late slaine Aidere. Thus is Casbin dyed: in the bloud of her hopefull Gallants, and entertaines her beholders eyes with streames of bloud running from the slaine, which cause another streame of teares to issue from their liuing friends; who filling the ayre with mournfull complaints (which returning answer by echoes, seemed to sympathize their griefe) and in compassion of those dying boister, then gasping their facall breaths, imitating (with true affection, and not affected imitation) the same in deepe and broken sighes: viewing also their owne dangers in the present ruine of their neere and dearest some-time allies and acquaintance: tossed with this varietie of turbulent passions, conceiue, in this confusion of thoughts (that which is euely the daughter and mother also of confusion) Trecherous Disloyaltie to the author of these their sorrows. Ismael posting on to his owne destruction, had now forbidden the deuotions of Aly the Persian Prophet, and enioyned the Turkish Rites of Abubar, and other the followers of Mahomet, by imprisoning, rayling, pulling out the eyes, and killing Aly his obseruants, establishing his Decree, not sparing in this persecution, to torment the tender Ladies (some of them of his owne bloud) nor reuerencing age or profession, depriving euen the Califfe of Casbin (the eye of their blindness) of both his eyes, because hee would not see equitie in this noueltie; and purposing (as the Fame went) to go to Bagdat, there to receiue the Crowne from him whomsoever he should finde the successour of the great Califfe, in the midst of his cruelties he was (with like crueltie) murdered by Periaconconna. The Executioner of her fathers Will is thus made an Executioner of her fathers sonne, hauing brought in the conspirators, apparrelled in womens weeds, to strangle him among his Paramours. This was done the foure and twentieth of Nouember 1577. after he had reigned one year, seven moneths, and sixe dayes. Mahomet Codabanda thought it nowtime for him to looke to his right, which by meanes of Mirize Salmas, the chiefe of the Sultans, he obtained. This Sultan presented him with the head of that Virago Periaconconna upon the top of a Launce, with the disheuelled haire, gassly lookes, and bloudie impressions, yeelding an vncouth (though not vnderseuered) spectacle to the beholders: which (if like the Snake scalpe of Medusa it did not transforme them into stones, yet, as if it had bene the banner of Megara) seemed to display new quarrels, kindling inward hatreds, tumultuous seditions, and ciuill broyles, which exposed them to Amurats forces, who thought it fit time for him to fish with his Turkish Nets in this troubled Persian streame. Of these warres is already spoken. <sup>a</sup> Much losse did the Persians by this meanes sustaine, and much more had followed, had not Emir Hamze, Mahomet eldest sonne, with his valorous attempts, stopped the Turkish proceedings, and, like the Easterne Sunne, with his greater brightnesse disperfed those weaker beames of The Moones Standards of proud Ottoman.

But soone was this Sunne eclipsed, not by the Moones interposition (for that is naturall, if we vnderstand it of the heauenly; and ordinary, if of the earthly and Turkish) but by extraordinary and vnnaturall procurement (as was thought) of his ambitious brother Abas, or of others suspected of his father, effected by a treacherous Eunuch that guarded him, which suddenly stricke him thorow the bodie and slew him: Abas his brother by solemne oath cleared himselfe of this odious imputation. And yet he is no lesse suspected of a more monstrous and vnnaturall treacherie against his owne father, who is thought <sup>b</sup> to bee poysoned by his meanes, that by these bloudie steppes hee might ascend to that Throne which now he enioyeth. But (all this notwithstanding) he hath since so subtilly handled the matter, that he is both beloued of his owne, and feared of his enemies: his subiects sweare and blesse in his name. <sup>c</sup> He hath recouered from the Turke both Tauris, and other Regions of Servania and Georgia, which the Turke had before taken from the Persians. Hee was reported also to haue taken

h Media Gheilan, Massandran, or Hyrcania, Pardia, Aria Candahar, Heri, Corassan, Farfi, or Persia, with the Caramanian desert, and the Kingdome of Lar, and the Turcoman nation are subject to this King: and he hath also subdued and ruined the houses of some great men, which in his fathers dayes would doe what they list.
i Sir Anthony Sherley saith it hath mud-walles.

Bagdat, but (it seemeth) not truly. Iansonius<sup>d</sup> in his Newes 1610. reporteth of divers victories obtained by him against the Turke (which caused publike Falls and applications to be appointed at Constantinople): and of the Persian Embassage, with rich Presents and holy Reliques to the Emperour at Prage. Gotardus Arthus likewise in his Gallobelgicus of the last Mart, relateth of Abas his Embassage to Constantinople about a Peace: but when his Embassadour returned with Articles, whereby the Persian was bound, vnder shew of gifts, to pay an annuall tribute to the Sultan, he therefore put him to death; putting out the eyes also, and curting of the hands of the Turkish Embassadour which was sent with him. Of Bagdat and old Babylon we have spoken elsewhere: let this be here added out of Balbi<sup>f</sup>, that travelling from Felugia to Bagdat, which hee reckoneth a daies journey and a halfe, one whole daies journey thereof, was by one side of the ruines of Babylon, which he left on the left hand.

As for Tauris, in the year 1514. Selim tooke it (as some say) on composition, which he brake, and carried thence three thousand of the best Artificers to Constantinople. Anno 1535. Saliman gaue it for a prey to his souldiers; Anno 1585. Osman spoiled it with vncouth and inhumane cruelties; whatsoever the insulting Conqueror, in the vtmost extent of lawlesse lust, could inflict, or the afflicted condition of the conquered could in the most dejected state of miserie sustaine, was there executed. Abas in recourie hereof vsed the Canon, an Instrument which before they had, to their owne losse, scorned. This Prince is (saith our Author) excellent both of composition of bodie, and disposition of minde, of indifferent stature, sterne countenance, piercing eyes, swart colour, his mustachees on the vpper lippe long, his beard cut close to the chinne. He delights in Hunting and Hawking, Running, Leaping, and trying of Masteries: He is an excellent Horse-man and Archer. In the morning he visiteth his stables of great Horses, and hauing there spent most of the fore-noone, he returns to his Pallace: About three of the clocke in the afternoone he goeth to the Maidan, which is the high street of Hispaan, the Citie of his residence, round about which are scaffolds for the people, to sit and behold the King and his Nobles at their Exercises of Shooting, Running, Playing at Tennis, &c. all on horse-backe. In this place very often, in his owne person, he heareth causes, and pronounceth sentence, executing Iustice severely.

Now that we may mention some of the chiefe Cities of Persia (vnder which name I heere comprehend, as vsually in this Historie, their<sup>h</sup> Dominion, not as it is measured by the Pens of Geographers, but by the Swords of their Princes.) In Sumachia Master Cartwright saith, They saw the ruines of a cruell spectacle, which was a Turret erected with Free-stone and Flints, in the midst whereof were placed the heads of all the Nobilitie and Gentry of the Countrey. A mile from this Towne was a Nunerie, wherein was buried the bodie of Amaleke Canna, the Kings daughter, who slew her selfe with a knife, for that her father would haue forced her to marrie a Tartarian Prince: the Virgins of the Countrey resort hither once a yeare to lament her death. Sechi is foure dayes journey thence, not farre from which is Eres, which, because they yeilded to the Turk, were by Emir-Hamze vtterly destroyed, man, woman, and child. Arafte is the chiefe Citie of Merchandize in all Seruania, especially for raw Silkes, Tauris hath out-liued many deaths, and is very rich by reason of continuall Trade, nourishing almost two hundred thousand people within her compasse; for walls, it hath<sup>i</sup> none. This was sometime the Seat-Royall, and after that, Casbin, which is situate in a fertile Plaine, foure dayes journey in length, wherein are two thousand Villages. The buildings are of Bricke dried in the Sunne, as in Persia is most vsuall: The At-Maidan, or chiefe streer, is foure-square, almost a mile in circuit. Neere to it is Ardouil, of chiefe note for beginning of the Sophian Superstition. Geilan is foure dayes journey from Casbin, and stands neere to the Caspian Sea. Neere to Bachu is a Fountaine of blacke oyle; which serueth all the Country to burne in their houses. Cassan is well feared, and rich in Merchandize, but subject to hear more then other parts of Persia. No person is there permitted to be idle. Hispaan is thought by some to be Hecatompolis: the walls are a dayes journey about on horse-backe; before the greatest, now the Royall Citie of the Persians. It hath a strong Fort, two Seraglio's, the walls whereof glister with red and Marble and Parget of diverse colours, paved all with Mosaicque workes, all things also combining Majestic and Louelineſſe, Magnificence and Beautie. The inhabitants, as the ancient Persians (whose chiefe Citie is sometimes said to be) buy, sell, talk, and performe all their publicke and private affaires on horsebacke. The Gentlemen here grow on foot. Sierax is thought to be Perſopolis, a rich Citie of Trade; and there is the best armour made in all the East, of Iron and Steele, cunningly tempered with the juice of certaine herbes. The Government of this State in Warre and Peace; I leave to a Historian.

AN APPENDIX TO TOUCHING THE PRESENT

Having thus followed the current of Authors in these Relations of Persia: there hath since our former Edition been published the Travells of Sir Anthony Sherley into these parts (with Sir Robert Sherley his brother) penned by himselfe: with some extracts whereof to furnish this Chapter (already tedious) as with a second service after a full stomacke, will (I hope) renew appetite, with the varietie (so farre fetched and so deare bought) howsoever before cloyed with fulnesse: To let passe therefore those wortheie Brethren (Worthies indeed in this kinde, beyond the reach and worth of my blurring praise, and eclipsing commendations) and to come to their Travell and observation. Having passed not without manifold dangers to Aleppo, and thence to Birs, and so downe Euphrates by the way they adventured to see the campe of the Arabie King, of the Arabie inhabiting the deserts of Mesopotamia, a poore King with ten or twelue thousand beggerly subjects, having intentes of blacke haire-cloath, will governe: They came to Bagdat, which is wholly on the other side of Tygris, a stone Suburb in the Peninsular: to which men passe by a bridge of boats, every night destined for feare of the Arabs, or stormers: whence through the bosome of an Italian Merchant, Sir William Speciero, they escaped (for they were not unsuspected) with a Caravan of Persian Pilgrims which came from Mecca. Thirtie daies they were on the way to the Confinis: and fiftene from thence to Casbin, where they stayed a moneth attending the Kings arrivall; being in the meane time well used, vpon conceit that the King would like well of their coming: the people otherwise are ill in themselves, and not good by example of their King, and strict obedience to him: For of the ancient Persians there are few, these being the posteritie of those which have beene here sent by the transplantations of Tamerlane and Ismael (not to mention any more ancient) out of other Countreies.

The King himselfe by our Authors relation, in his vertues and government, is, as if some Philosopher should discourse of what should be, rather then an Historian declare what is: as did Xenophon & sometimes in his Cyrus: Of those imputations of Parricide and ambition, not a word: His order of attaining the Crowne, is thus reported.

The Persian custome being that onely the elder brother ruleth, the rest are made blinde by burning basons, having otherwise all contentments fit for Princes children: when Ismael was dead without issue, his brother (so hee calleth him, contrarie to our former relations) Xa-Cadabent, was called blinde to the Kingdom. He had issue Sultan Hamzire Mirza the eldest, who succeeded him, and this present King called Abas. The eldest in his fathers life-time administr'd all things, which blindnes made the other unfit for: but Abas at twelue yeares of age, vnder the government of Tutors held the Province of Yafde, where the leare of the people made him suspected to his Father, who secretly resolved his death. Abas by his friends hearing it, fled to Corasan a Turke people on the East of Persia, both by their religion and dependance, Turkish, and of themselves otherwise vnquiet, and addicted to spoile. This King honored Abas as his sonne. His father soone after dying, Sultan Hamzire succeeded, who was sent to renew his truce with the Turke, by reason of the rebellion of the Turcomans, whom by force he subdued, beheaded their Princes, and for his securitie slew twentie thousand of the ablest amongst them for the warres. And then wholly bending his thoughts against the Turke, was by treason slaine by his Barbar. His Princes, b This King was a Sanick of the Turke, whereas they on the West side of the River in an huge extent and infinit numbers, route, and rob all: the Turke keeping against them fiftene hundred Janiz. at Damasco, and twelue thousand at Cairo. Old Babylon is North from Bagdat about fve and twentie mile.

authors of this fact, shared his State amongst them, every one making himselfe Lord of that Prouince which he gouerned: vntill their resolutions against Abas, whom also the Turke (which had his hand in the businesse) had vnderaken should be kept still in Corazan. Abas neuerthelesse so wrought, that the King of Corazan dismissed him, with three thousand horsemen, to winne possession of that State, which since had deuoured the Tartars, and is growne terrible to the Turke, being no lesse in Estimation then the Turke hath in Asia; and better both people, gouerned, and deuoted to their Soueraigne. But it was not easily achieved. In Sistan one of the neereft Prouinces, he was encountered with twentie thousand, his troups cut in peeces, himselfe forced to flee to the mountaines, where he liued three months vnknowne amongst the heremmen, stirring vp and downe with ten or twelue followers. Wearie of this life, he determined to shew himselfe in Yasid, his quondam Prouince, which so well succeeded, that numbers came flocking to him, and Ferrat Can also a great Prince (discontent with the present State, no part of which had faulne to him, hauing at that time no continuance in his gouernment, when the King was slaine) resorted to him with his brother and ten thousand followers. They were welcome, but he much more, as a great soldier and a wise Prince. With these forces hee ouerthrew his neereft enemies, which caused those of Shyras, Alphann, Cassian, assisted by the Kings of Gheylan and Mazandran, to gather mighty forces. In the meane time, the Turkes Armed at Tauris, and the Prince of Hamadan, hauing called in a strength of the Cordines, was marching towards Casbin. Thus beset with armies, he leaueth Ferrat Can with Zulpher his brother and five thousand men in Casbin; and himselfe with the rest of his power, marched towards the Can of Hamadan. Now did Ferrat Can (according to former agreement betweene the King and him) professe himselfe altered from the Kings part, and wretched to the Rebels, offering to ioyne his strength with theirs, and to mutine the Kings armie also, which was lodged in the mountaines, in shew to keepe the straits, in deed to expect the euent. Thus the Cans assembled at Casbin, and after long deliberation, concluded that it was needlesse and not safe to call in the Turkes forces, and dispatched a messenger and present to the Bassa of Tauris, to reserue his fauour till a more needfull. Hereof Ferrat sent word closely to the King, and of a banquet which should be at his house a few nights after, where the Principalls of the Armie should meet. Hither Abas bid himselfe a guest, posting thither with five thousand of his best horse, which he disposed in the mountaine, couered with Ferrats troupe, expecting an appointed signe: which being giuen late in the night when the whole company was heauie with wine and sleepe, the King was receiued into the house with three hundred men, where without any vprore he slew seuentie. And at the breake of the day the Kings people made as great shouts and noise, as if all the Armie had bene there: whereat the Alarme being giuen, all betooke them to their armes, repairing to Ferrats lodging to their Princes, whose heads laced vpon a string, were there presented to them out of a Tarras, vpon which the King presently shewed himselfe with Ferrat Can; Zulpher hauing his five thousand men readie in a troupe in the great place. All these things together so amazed them, that they thought the Kings pardon a high ferment, which he freely granted both them, and the succours sent thither by the Kings of Gheylan and Mazandran. The reports hereof made Hamadans Armie to vanish, and the King tooke order presently by new Cans for the gouernment of those parts. He bid his souldiers to Hishphaan, giuing out that the treasures of the Kingdome were there laid vp by the Rebels; a good policie to winne it, which with as much pretended indignation he raised, for failing of his seeming hopes. To satisfie his souldiers hee led them against the Kings of Gheylan and Mazandran, where the entrance by Nature difficult, thorow the vnpassable woods and hilles, were made easie by the assault of those to whom the charge of keeping the Straits was giuen, whose liues Abas had before spared at Casbin. The successe was; the two Kings were slaine, and the souldiers enriched with the spoile of a Countrey exceeding fertile, thus subdued to his Scepter. The people he remoued into other parts of his Dominion, sending the former inhabitants into Gheylan and Mazandran.

Not long after the brother of that King of Corassan, which had bene Tutor to their ſoul being that only of the ſeventie two Synedrall (ſo many ſorts of devils) which ſhall in the Perſian eſtimation have admittance into Paradife, all the reſt (and why not this ſort) ſending to hell.

From this diſſenſion betwixt the Perſians and Arabians, about the ſucceſſion of Maſome (it is Maſome his relation, in which the Perſians call themſelves Sia, which ſignifieth the union of one bodie, but the Arabians call them Kuſſab, that is, Vnionable) and then ſolum Guine proceeded after ſeveral ſorts amongst the Muſlimtans; and amongst the Perſians two, called Camor and Almowet, which follow ſtill the ſaying of the Prophets, but would have all proved to them by natural reaſon, not allowing either of Maſome any further. There is one ſect amongst them, called Alchabibi, which ſeeketh all things to Chavir and on the Starre, hoarſe Divine Providence; There are other called Eſem, which reſpect many things in the Alcoran, and follow the doctrine of Zoro, the Nephew of Hocm, ſecond ſonne of Ali; theſe inhabit on the ſhore of Perſia, ſolum, and in Melinde.

But to come to the common Perſians, and to obſerve out of Burrian the diſcrepancy opinion betwixt them and the Arabians; their Diſſenſion doth theſe differences in ſeventeen Conſiderations. The Perſians ſay, That God is the Author and worker of every good, and that euill cometh from the Devil: The Arabians ſay, That would bring in two Gods, one of good, the other of euill: the Perſians ſay, That God is one, and that the law and creation of men had a beginning: the Arabians anſwer, That all the wordes of the law are prayſes of the workes of God, and therefore eternal himſelf: the Perſians ſay, That the ſoules of the beſt in the other world enter in the preſence of God, becauſe he is a ſpirit of Divinity; only they ſhall ſee him grinning, weeping, and all other good things which he worketh in the creature: the Arabians anſwer, That they ſhall ſee him with their eyes, even as he is: the Perſians ſay, That when Maſome received the law, his ſoule was carried by the Angell Gabriel into the preſence of God: the Arabians affirme it of his bodie alſo: the Perſians ſay, That the children of Ali, or Ali, and Fateme, and their twelve Nephewes, have preeminence above all Prophets: the Arabians graunt it, above all other men, but not above the Prophets: the Perſians ſay, that it is ſufficient to pray thrice a day vnto God; both morning when the Sunne riſeth, which is called Sab; the ſecond (Dur) at noon; the third (Magreb) before Sunne ſet; becauſe theſe three containe all the partes of the day; the Arabians require twice beſides, according to their law, called Haw & Ma. The reſt of their ſeventeen Articles of difference, mine Author hath not expreſſed. Theſe are ſufficient, to ſhew that they not only differ about the ſucceſſors of Maſome, as Minadoi affirmeth, but about Dogmaticall points alſo in their ridiculous Theologic, and interpretation of their law.

Theſe differences have continued of old and long continuance; what hath in better times accrewed hereunto by the Sophian additions of Guine and his followers, is in part touched in the former Chapter. Let vs now take view thereof, as the ſame in the preſent hath infected Perſia and the neighbouring Regions.

There is reſident in Casbin their proſane Prieſt, called Muſtaed-Dini, that is to ſay, the chiefe of the law, who is as the Muſta among the Turkes; and in the other Cities are certaine peculiar heads obediēt to this chiefe Prieſt, who notwithstanding are not choſen or diſplaced at his pleaſure, but by the King himſelfe, who ſhould be a King, but a Prieſt, as Maſome and Malome were; from whom hee challengeth ſucceſſion. And we have ſhewed before that Iſmael was called Haſſi, or Chaliſ, that is, the Vice of God. Howbeit, for avoyding of greater trouble, hee granteeth that ſuore, and putteth quere that burthen from himſelfe vnto others; to whoſe iudgements he alſo ſubmitteth himſelfe, whenſoever there is any Conſultation or Treatie touching the lawe and religion. Under the Muſtaed-Dini are the Califs (ſoith Minadoi) and theſe are they that execute their duty Service in their Moſchies or Temples. The chiefe of theſe Califs is he that putteth the Horſe vpon the Kings head when he is firſt crowned; a ceremony now performed in Casbin; becauſe the Turkes forbode it to be performed in Cas, neere vnto Babylon, according to the ancient worſhip. Other Cities alſo have a Muſtaed-Dini and Califs, although inferiour to them of Casbin. There is Califes seeme to be Vicars (so the word signifieth) of the Most High God. The difference betwene the Turke and Persian (as ordinarily it happeneth in case of Religion) is so hotely pursued on both sides betwixt them, that they neither will sell nor change, nor Merchandise, as some affirme: there can be no certaine Peace, or continuing Truce. And if one alters his Religion, and turns to the other side, he is not received, without a new Circumcision. Baiazet the great Turke burnt two hundred thousand in Constantinople, infected with this sect, together with the inhabitants, and to such a publicke Edict against it. Ismael is said, in like manner of the Turkes, to have caused a Spring to be nourished, which, in despite of the Ottomans, he infused Baiazet, Ismael returning from Amasia, was entertained in the house of one of this Sect, who therefore, after the departure of his Prince, purified his house with washings, perfumes, and other ceremonies; as if it had beene polluted with a Turkish guest: for which cause himselfe was slaine, and his house razed. But let vs take a further view of this sect in these Countries.

Ismael could be contained in selfe in the limits of the Persian Kingdome, but was found further, and received even in the heart of Turkie, and skirts of India. For amongst other the Disciples of Ismael, Chafan Shekife and Schach Celi, afterwards followed Ismael, fleeing the fure of the Persian King, who had slaine their Master, and persecuted his followers, came into Armenia Minor, and there took vp their dwelling at the great Mountaine Ararat, at the foote whereof the broken Rocks haue many darke Caves, the works of Art partly, partly of Nature; which place of the Inhabitants is called Tak-ili, whereof Schach Celi was after called Tschellis. Here these two living themselves wholly to a contemplative life, in a strict austeritie contemning themselves with such things as the earth voluntarily afforded, beganne to grow in knowledge, first of the Herds-men and Shepherds, after, of the Husband-men and Countrey people, admiring their new holinesse. Yea, Baiazet himselfe, their Emperour of the Turkes, moved with zeale of their deuotion, sent them yearly sixe or seuen thousand Aspers. Afterwards becomming Fortune-sellers, and prognosticating things to come, they were by the superstitious people drawne into Villages and Cities, where they preached Hak, according to Ismaels doctrine, enioyning their Disciples the redde Band on their Turbans; of which the Turkes rearme them Gazel, that is, Red-Heads; with which, in short time, the Cities and Townes were filled.

When they were thus multiplied, there met ten thousand of them at a Faite at Tak-ili, or Atalia, where they executed the chiefe Magistrate; and being perswaded by these new Masters, they swore neuer to forsake their Captains, or refuse any labour for their most holy Religion, vowing their soules & bodies in defence thereof. These Captains not having otherwise to maintaine their followers, gave them leave to forage the countrey adioyning, and to liue upon the spoyle of them that would not receive their new doctrine, which they in many troupes, and with many preyes accordingly performed. They entred into Lycania, and the people fled out of the countrey into Lycaonia. These two Prophets set vp Proclamations of blessings to all such as would receive their sect; and of destruction to the gain-sayer. Ismael also, to increase their strength, had sent them some troupes of horse-men. In the Politicke Historie which Chafan hath given vs, in the first booke of his Thurogratia, it is said, that two hundred thousand followed Sach Celi: in this waite Baiazet two nephewes, with the forces of the countrey, encountring them in battell, received the overthrow: Coratun, the sonne of Baiazet, with his Armie durst not assaile them. Thus marched they into Bitunia, where neere unto the River Sangarius, Caragusa Bassa, Viceroy of Asia, affronted them, having before commanded Achmetes, the eldest sonne of Baiazet, to leuit forces in his government of Cappadocia and Pontus, to shunther in at their backes. But Tschellis, after the losse of sixteen thousand men, and all his ensignes, chased him out of the field into Curaie, the seat of the Viceroy, where he besieged and tooke him with his wives and children; and after being pursued by Alis Bassa, with forces out of Eur-ope, he impaled this Caragusa in the way on a sharpe stake fastened in the ground. Here was he forced to fight, and his fellow Chafan Shekife slaine; but Tschellis recouering ring the battell almost lost, left Aliu Bassa alone in the place; the Turkes fleeing before him. Jomtes Bassa was sent against him, when having lost a great part of his strength, he had retired his weakened forces into Antitaurus; out of the Woods and Mountaines, often assailing the Turkes: whence at last he fled into Persia, whence he was sent strait inquisition to be made for these new Sectaries, doing such to death with exquisite torments, as had borne arms in the late rebellion, and burned the rebellious forehead with an hot iron: and after transported them, together with the fiercest kind of kinsmen of such as had bene exterminated, into Europe, where to be dispersed through Macedonia, Epirus, and Peloponnesus, for feare of a second revuolt of Tachellus. The remainder of Tachellus his power, as they fled into Persia, robbed a Caravan of Merchants; for which outrage, coming to Tauris, their Caprines were by Ismaellus command executed, and Tachellus himselfe burnt alive; but yet is this sect closely followed in Asia.

We have now seene the proceedings of this Sophian sect, both in Persia and Turkie, both here kept downe, and there established by force. To wearied on the lower parts of their body, were to these Red-heads scarcely picular. Touching Habib, they have diuers dresses: as that when they doubted of Mahmets successour, a little while since came into a Councell assembled to decide the controuersie, and declared that was Mahmets pleasure, that Mortu Ali, (or Mortu Ali) should be the man. He had a sword wherevith he killed as many as he stroke. At his death he tolde them that while Camell would come for his bodie, which accordingly came, and carried in dead body and the sword, and was therewith taken vp into heauen, if it were so, as they have long looked in Persia. For this cause the King kept a horse ready saddled and kept for him also a daughter of his to be his wife; but she died in the yeare one thousand five hundred seventy and thre. And they say further, that if he come not shortly, they shall be of our beleefe.

They have few bookes, and lesse learning. There is often great contention and animie in great Townes, which of Mortu Ali his sonnes was greatest: sometime there three thousand people being together by the eares about the same; as I have seen (saith Master Ducket) in Shamaky, and Arduil, and Tauris, where I have seene a man coming from fighting, and in a brauerie bringing in his hand foure or five men heads, carrying them by the haire of the crowne. For although they shawe their heads commonly twice a week, yet leaue they a tuft of haire vpon their heads about two foot long, whereof, when I enquired the cause, They answered, that thereby they may be the easilier carried vp into heauen when they are dead. In praying they turne to the South, because Merca lyeth that way from them. When they be on trauell in the way, many of them will as soone as the Sunne riseth, light from their horses, turning themselves to the South, and will lay their gowns before them, with their swords & beads, and so standing upright doe their holy things, many times in their prayers kneeling downe and kissing their beads, or somewhat else that lieth before them.

When they earnestly affirme a matter, they swear by God, Mahmet, and Mortu Ali, and sometime by all at once, saying, Olla Mahmet Ali, and sometime Shangham, basshe, that is, by the Shanghas head. Abu the yong Prince of Persia, charged with imputation of treason, after other Purgatory speeches, swaie by the Creator that spread out the ayre; that founded the earth vpon the deepes; that adorned the heauen with Starres; that powred abroad the water; that made the fire; and brist of nothing brought forth all things: by the head of Ali, and by the Religion of their Prophet Mahmet, that he was cleare. If any Christian will become a Bofarian, one of their superstition, they giue him many gifts: the Gouvernor of the Town appoints him a horse, and one to ride before him on another horse, bearing a sword in his hand, and the Bofarian bearing an arrow in his hand, rideth in the Citie cursing his father and mother. The sword signifieth death, if he reuolt againe. Before the Shanghas set med to fauour our Nation, the people abused them very much, and so hated them, that they would not touch them, reuiling them by the names of Casars and Gamars, that is, Infidels, or Misbelievers. Afterwards they would kisse their hands, and vse them gently and reuerently. Drunkards and riotous persons they hate; for which cause Rushid

Buddies. Their opinions and rites most what agree with the Turkish and Saracenicall. Their Priests are apparelled like other men: they vse euery morning and after-noon to goe up to the toppes of their Churches, and tell there a great tale of Mabomet and Martin. They haue also among them certaine holy men called Sater; accounted therefore holy, because they, or some of their ancestors, haue beene on pilgrimage at Mecca; these must be beleued for this Saint-ship, although they lie neuer so shamefully. These Sater vse to shauē their heads all ouer, sauing on the sides a little about the temples, which they leaue vnshauen, and vse to braide the same as women doe their haire, and weare it as long as it will grow. Isaiah Barboro at Sanenachi lodged in an Hospitall, wherein was a graue vnder a vault of stone, and neere vnto that a man with his beard and haire long; naked, sauing that a little before and behinde he was couered with a skinne, sitting on a peece of a matte on the ground: I (saith he) saluted him, and demanded what he did: he told me he watched his father: I asked who was his father; He, quoth he, that doth good to his neighbour: with this man in this sepulchre I haue liued thirtie yeeres: and will now accompany him after death; and being dead, be buried with him: I haue seene of the world sufficient, and now haue determined to abide there till death.

Another I found at Tauris on All-Soules day, in the which they also vse a commemoration of soules departed, neere to a Sepulchre in a Church-yard; hauing about him many birds, especially Ravens and Crows: I thought it had beene a dead corpse, but was told it was a liuing Saint, at whose call the birds resorted to him, and he gaue them meat.

Another I saw, when Assambei was in Armenia, marching into Persia against Signior Isaia, Lord of Persia and Zagatai, vnto the Citie of Herem; who drew his staffe in the dishes wherein they ate, and said certaine words and brake them all: the Sultan demanded what he had said: they which heard him, answered, that he said he should be victorious, and breake his enemies forces, as he had broken those dishes: whereupon he commanded him to be kept till his returne, and finding the enent according, he vsed him honorably. When the Sultan rode thorow the fields, he was set on a Mule and his hands bound before him, because hee was sometime accustomed to doe some dangerous folly: as his feet there attended on him many of their religious persons, called Darnis. These mad strickes he vsed according to the course of the Moone; sometimes in two or three daies not eating any thing, busied in such fooleries, that they were faine to binde him; He had great allowance for his expenses.

One of those holy men there was, which went naked like to the beasts, preaching their faith: and hauing obtained great reputation, hee caused himselfe to be immured in a wall fortie daies, there to abide without any sustenance: but when this time was expired, and some wondered, one more nose-wise then the rest, smelled the sent of flesh: the Sultan hearing it, committed him and his disciple to the Cadilasher, who by torments caused them to confesse the couinsage; for, thorow a hole which was made in the wall by a caue, he had broth conueied to him, and therefore they were both put to death: In the yeere 1478, Cbozamirsch an Armenian, being in his shop in Tauris, an Azi or Saint of theirs came to him, and willed him to deny his Christian faith: he answered him courteously, and praised him not to trouble him: but when he persisted, he offered him mony; the Saint would not haue the mony, but importuned his first sute: Cbozamirsch said he would not deny his Christian faith (whereupon the other plucked a sword out of a mans scabard which stood by, and with a wound which he gaue the Armenian in the head, killed him, and ranne away. But the Armenians some complaining to the Sultan, procured his apprehension at Meren, two daies journey from Tauris: and, being brought before him, hee with a knife killed him with his owne hands, and caused him to be cast on a dung-hill for the dogges to eat, saying, Is this the way to encrease the faith of Mabomet? But when some of the more zealous people went to one Darniscaffun, which was in guarding of the sepulchre of Assambei the former Sultan, and (as it were) Prior of the Hospitall, and requesting of him, obtained with the bodie to burie it: the Sultan hearing it, sent for him, and said to him, Darest thou countermand my commands? Away and kill him; which was suddenly dispatched. He further to be revenged of the people, committed the Towne to the sacke, which for the space of three or four houres was done. And then he forbade further spoile, and fined the Towne in a great summe of gold. Lastly, he caused the Armenians some to come before him, and with many kinde words comforted him. This long historie I have inserted, to shew the extremitie of blinde zeale, and religious fury in the sects and vocaries of these Persians, if justice should not withstand their rage.

Before is mentioned the commemoration of their dead; which is thus performed over their sepulchres. Thither resort great multitudes of men and women, old and young, which sit on heapes with their Priests, and with their candles lighted: the Priests either reade or pray in their language; and after cause to be brought somewhat to eat in the place: the place contained betweene foure and five miles: the pathes which leade thither are full of poore people, which begge almes. Some of whom offer to say some prayer for their benefactors. The sepulchres haue stones vpon them inscribed with the names of the buried parties: and some haue a Chappell of stone thereon.

At Merdin hee saw a naked man, which came and sat by him, and pulling forth a booke, read thereon, and after drew neere and asked him, whence hee was; he answered, a stranger: I also am a stranger, saith he, of this world, and so are we all; and therefore I haue left it, with purpose to goe thus vnto mine end; with many words besides touching meeknesse, and the deniall of the world. He said, I haue seene a great part thereof, and finde nothing therein that contents me; and therefore haue determined to abandon it altogether. To this Merdin a man cannot passe, but by a way made of stone, continuing a mile: at the head thereof is a gate and way to the Towne; and within the Towne is another hill with a like way of five hundred paces in height. There is an Hospitall for entertainment of all strangers, made by Zangirboi, the brother of Usmaicassan: and if they be of better fort, they are entertained with carpets spread for them, worth an hundred ataas a peece: and victuals for all comers.

We might heere take further view of their stately Temples, their great and populous Cities, and other things worthy obseruation, if that our Turkish History had not related the like also among them, especially touching the persons and places religious. For the rest I referre the Reader to other Authors. The wonders of Nature in these parts are: neere Bachu, a fountaine of oile continually running; and fetched into the farthest parts of Persia: and another neere Shamaky, of Tarie, whereof wee had good vse and prooffe in our ship. Heereabouts you shall haue in the fields, neere to any Village in the night, two or three hundred Foxes howling: Kine they haue like ours, and another sort great boned and leane, as hard-fauoured as those which Pharaoh dreamed of. In Persia groweth great abundance of Bombast cotton: this groweth on a certaine tree or briar, not past the height of a mans waste, with a slender stalke like to a briar or carnation Iuly-flower, with very many branches, bearing on every branch fruit or ood round, which when it commeth to the bignesse of a wall-nut, openeth and sheweth forth the cotton, which groweth still like a fleece of wooll, to the bignesse of a mans fist, and then being loose is gathered: the seeds are flat, and blacke, as bigge as pease, which they sow in their fields and plowed ground in great abundance. The present King Abu (more, as it seemeth, in policie, to secure himselfe of factions, and against the Turke, then conscience) is a great persecutor of that sect of Mah, which followeth the interpretation of Usen and Omar. This hee labours to extirpate and make odious: fasting in vse, once a yecre with great solemnitie to burne publickly (as maie heretikes) the images of Usen and Omar. Then doth hee cause his great men publickly, in forme of their institution, to goe with a flagon of wine, carried by a footman, and at every village, or where they see any assembly of people, to drinke: which himselfe also vseth, not for loue of the wine, but to scandalize the contrary religion. Yet are there of the greatest, exceeding precise Turkes, if they durst shew it.

In a letter of John Ward, written in Tauris, May 14. 1605. this King is blamed for making slaues of poore Armenians, and forcing many to Mahumetisme, pulling downe Churches, and vsing more rigour then the Turke.

I Ward to
M. Haywood.

I had thought I had ended this Chapter and our Persian Expedition; but our good friends the Iesuites would needs entertaine your wearie eies, with reading an exploit of theirs, related by <sup>b</sup> one, sometimes their fellow Catholike, now (I hope) our fellow Christian. For the credit of this honest and loyall (if their honest retaine not with a won off, and loyall with a lie-all) societie, was a French pamphlet by them dispersed (a little before the Powder treason) amongst their Catholike friends in England, reporting the miraculous conversion of the King of Persia by one Campion a Iesuite an Englishman, that had expelled a Deuill out of a possessed partie; and commanded the Deuill in his depature to giue a signe thereof, by striking downe the top of a steeple. Which being effected, the Kings conversion followed, together with many of the Nobilitie, to the Roman faith: libertie also being granted to preach it openly, and to build Churches and Monasteries thorowout the kingdome. This was beleeued in England, especially by a friend of our Authors, vnto whom that pamphlet was sent, who requested him to say Masse in thanksgiuing to God for so great a benefite. But in the end, that Iesuite who sent the Pamphlet, gaue out, that it was but a thing deuised by French Hugonets, to disgrace their societie. Gracious societie! that can sometime cure their lies with a distinction of pie fraudes,<sup>c</sup> sometime couer them with a robe of the new fashion, Equivocation: sometimes can expose their ballards at other mens doores, to shield themselves from shame with laying the blame on others; and haue a mint in their pragmaticall heads of such superfluous inuentions: what are they now disgraced, and that by Hugonets? Euen as truly as the Parliament-house should haue bene blowen vp by Puritans<sup>d</sup> (this also was the Ignatians deuice) or like to that newes of the late Queene, whose Ambassadors were at Rome for the Popes Absolution: or that of Beza's recantation, and Geneuaes submission to the Pope. Blessed Ignatius, (let me also inuocate, or let him deigne to reade in that all-seeing glasse) this poore supplication) infuse some better spirit, or some cleaner and more wittie conuenance at least, into thy new progenie; lest the Protestants grosser wits sent, see, seele the palpableness, and impute the Iesuiticall courses to that Author which said, he would goe out and be a lying spirit in the mouth of all Achabs Prophets, which, <sup>h</sup> when he speaketh a lie, speaketh of his owne, because he is a lier, and the father thereof. Hitherto wee tooke Ignatius for their father, but now we finde a new, of whom they borrow Bankruptcy this, befeeming onely the Merchants of Babylon, disgracing humanitie, defacing dignitie, worthily irauinged amongst the poore pollicies of the Hospitall of the desperate. Since also, Iansonius in his Mercurius Gallobelgicus hath told vs newes of the Kings grant to build a Temple and Monasterie for Christians, himselfe, as he saith, much enclining to that religion: whereupon many haue bene baptized, and not a few through the power of holy-water, <sup>i</sup> haue bene cured. The King hath further sent to the Georgians to vnite them to the Romish Church: and the Armenians also by an embassage to Rome haue protested all obedience to that Sea, as they before had done in the Couent of S. Augustine, which is in the chiefe Citie of Persia. Hee setteth downe the copie of King Abas his letter to the Pope, wherein hee requesteth him to send a Prelate to gouerne at Tres Ecclesia, where the chiefe of the Armenian Christians vsed to reside. The like he writeth in another letter to the King of Spaine: which, if it be so, argueth rather his policie, to obtaine good will and helpe of the Christians against the Turke, then any loue to Christian religion.

CHAP. X.

Vnder the name of Scythia, is contained a very great part of the world: It was diuided into Scythia Europea, and Asiatica. Pliny<sup>a</sup> saith, that this name reacheth vnto the Sarmatians and Germans, and to those farthest Nations, which were vnknowne to other men. And Strabo in his first booke saith, that all knowne regions towards the North were called Scythians or Nomades: and in his eleuenth booke he affirmeth, that that the Greekes called all those Northerne Nations, Scythians, and Celto-Scythians. Those beyond the Adriatique and Pontike Seas, and the Riuer Ister or Danubius, were called Hyperborei, Sauromatz, and Arimaspi: those beyond the Caspian Sea, Sacæ and Massagetz. Some<sup>b</sup> will haue this name to be giuen them and in scythia, which significth to be angry: Others of their Shooting,<sup>c</sup> called still of some of those Nations, and in some other languages, Schieten, of which our word Shoot is deriued: Mela in his third booke and fifth chapter, calleth them all Sagz: and in the fragment which beareth the name of Cato de Origimibus, is mentioned Scythia Saga: this word Saga, Berosus<sup>e</sup> interpreteth a Priest: saying, that Noah left to the Scythian Armenians his rituall books, which only Priests, and that only among Priests, might reade, who were therefore called Saga, as Noah himselfe had beene. These peopled the countries from Armenia to the Bactrians, all which place was called Scythia Saga: ouer which Sabotini reigning in the time of Iupiter Belus, Araxa with his sonne Scythia possessed all from Armenia Westward, to Sarmatia in Europe. The Grecians fable Hercules to be the father of these Nations, begetting<sup>f</sup> Scythes on a monster, whose vpper halfe resembled a Woman, the nether part a Viper. It were an endlesse and boundlesse worke, to seeke and set out the true and proper beginnings and bounds of this so large a Tract of the world, called Scythia: the particular Nations of them would be but harsh to recite out of Pliny, Mela, Sirabo, and others: the multitude whereof he that will may finde in Ortelius his Theſaurus collected together. The Sarmatz, or Sauromatz, are sometime made one peculiar people of the Scythians: and sometimes the names are confounded, Sarmatia also being diuided into Europæa and Asiatica, whereof the one is interpreted by<sup>h</sup> Oliuerus, Polonia, by Ortelius, Russia, and the other Tartaria.

Geropius<sup>i</sup> in his Becceselana admiring his owne language, coniectureth that while Nimrod and his company fell to Babel, or after our pronounciation, Babble at Babel, others, namely, the Cymbrians, or posteritie of Gomer, staid still in Margiana, a country fruitfull of Vines; whither hee imagineth Noah descended out of the Arke, and there abode after the Floud. These hee supposeth, being not at Babel, retained their old and first vniuersall language. But Margiana growing too little for their multiplied numbers, they were forced to send out Colonies. And thus the Saxons, Teutolages, Sauromatz, Getes or Gothes, the Danes, Galles, and other Scythian Nations, the true posteritie of Gomer, and keepers of the first language, as he by Dutch Etymologies gathereth, peopled both Scythia and Sarmatia in Asia, and Europe together with all Germanie, France, England, Norway, Denmarke, and some parts of Asia Minor. He that will be further informed of his Reasons, let him reade his Saxonica Gotodanica, and other Treatises of his Becceselanian Antiquities.

<sup>k</sup> Ptolemy distinguisheth Scythia from Sarmatia: he confineth Sarmatia Europeæ with the Sarmation Ocean, and the land vnkowne on the North: with Vistula on the West: the Easterne border is Tanais: from whence vnto the Hircanian sea Eastward, is Sarmatia Asiatica, on the North abutting on the vnkowne parts of the earth, on the South with the Euxine sea, and a line drawne right from thence to the Caspian sea. Scythia is by<sup>l</sup> him placed to the East of Sarmatia, diuided by the hill Imaus, extending vnto the region called Serica, hauing on the North vnkowne places; on the South, the Sacz, Sogdiana, Margiana and India. But our purpose is to take them heere in their more generall sense, vnderstanding all the North parts of Asia, now Tartaria Asiatica, (for of Europe, sauing wherein the European Scythians agree with the Asian, we are not now to speake:) And of these, first to consider their ancient Scythian rites, and in the next place their later Tartarian appellation and religion.

for the use of wooll they know not. They have thrée times sought the Empire of Asia, never conquered of others. They chased Darius the Persian King out of their coast: they slew Cyrus with all his armie: they overthrew Zopyron a Captaine of Alexander the Great with all his forces. They onely heard of, neuer felt the Roman armes, and themselves founded the Parthian Empire.

That which credulous and fabulous antiquitie hath reported, of the monstrous peoples inhabiting the Northerly and ynnowne parts of Scythia, is not heere to be received, the countries being at this time discovered, and knowne to have no such men, as either by nature are balde and flat nosed, with huge chins; or have but one eye, where there are also Gryphons keepers of their treasures, or men with Goats feet: or other monsters of men, which Pliny, Herodotus and others, have rather mentioned then believed; Masdenil and Munster following them in like relations. Next to these both in place and credit, we may reckon the Hyperboreans, of whom the Delians report that they sent to Delos virgins with sacrifice to Lucina, bound vp in wheat straw: through so many Nations inhabiting betweene. Of the Istedones is reported, that when one dieth, his kindred bring thither beasts, which they kill, and cut, and dresse, and eat together with the flesh of the dead man, whose skull also they keepe an idle, vsing it as an idoll, to which they performe yearly ceremonies: these exequies doth the sonne there performe to his dead father. Generally of the Scythian religion thus. Of the gods, they worship first Vesta, whom they call in their language Tahiti: next of all Iupiter, in their speech Papaus, and the Earth supposing her to be the wife of Iupiter, and call her Apia. In the next place they worship Apollo and Venus, by the names of Oetofyrus, and Artimpasa, and Mars and Hercules. Some of them sacrifice also to Neptune, or Thamima-salus. Images; Altars and Temples, they thinke ought not to be made, except to Mars. Their manner of sacrificing is generally this: The sacrifice is presented with the forehead bound, the Sacrificer, at his backe hauing laid aside his holy vestment, woundeth the same, and while it falleth, calls vpon that god to whom he sacrificeth; and then putteth a halter about the necke, and strangeth it, without kindling any fire, or vowing, or other ceremonie, and slayeth it; the flesh plucked from the bones, he casteth into a great Caldron, the bones he vseth for fewell to seeth the same (for wood the Countrey doth not yeeld.) And if they haue not any such vessell, they put all the flesh with water into the paunch, and so the beast doth seeth it selfe. After it is boyled, he which sacrificeth offereth the libaments, or offerings of the flesh and inwards: their sacrifices are, besides other beasts, especially of horses.

Their Temples to Mars they builde on this manner. They heape together bundles of twigges three furlongs in length and breadth, and aboue on them is made a square plaine, three sides the top of are vpright, the fourth is made slope, and bendingwise thereby to get vp: thither they bring every yeare an hundred and fiftie waines of twigges to supplie the waste of them. Vnderneath this worke is erected an old iron sword, and this is their Image of Mars, to which they offer yearly sacrifices, both of other cattell and of horses: and more to this blade then to other gods. Of their captiues they offer one of an hundred, but after another manner. For after they haue offered wine on their heads, they kill them by a certaine vessell, and after lifting them vpon their heape or Temple, they embrew the Sword-god with the blood. This they do aboue; beneath in the Temple they cut off all the right shoulders of the slaine men, and hurle them vp in the aire together with the hands; wherefoeuer the hand shall fall, there lieth, and the dead bodie apart. When they haue performed all their solemnities they depart. Swine are so odious to them, that they will haue none of them within their Countrey.

There are among them Diuiners, whose rites are these. They bring grease bundles of willow twigges, which they lay on the ground, and vntie, and laying them asunder one by one, diuine. Some of them practise diuination with the leaues of the Teil-tree, which they fold and vnfold in their hands. The King, when at any time he falleth sick, sendeth for three choyce men of those Diuiners; who for the most part name some name vnto him, which hath forsworne himselfe, hauing sworne by the Kings Throne, an oath vsed of the Scythians: presently the man is brought forth, who, if he denieth what their art hath accused him of, the King sendeth for twice the number of Diuiners: and if they by new practise of their art finde him guiltie, his head is cut off, and the first Diuiners share his goods: but if they shall absolue him, more Diuiners are sent for; and the most of them doe absolue him, then those three first are thus done to death. They lade a waine with twiggess, and binding the Diuiners hand and foot, and stopping their mouthes, cast them into the waines, and set all on fire, burning oxen, waine, and men together, vnlesse some of the oxen by the burning of their harnesse escape. This punishment inflict they on their false Prophets. They make their leagues with other Nations in this sort. They powre wine into a great bowle, mixing therewith the blood of them which ioynae in league, cutting some part of the bodie with a knife or sword, and then dip in that bowle or mazer a sword, arrowes, an axe, a dart, and after curse themselves with many words, last of all drinking the wine. Nicephorus Gregorius recounteth the Scythian Customes and Expeditions, and their contempt of gold and ignorance of the vse of it. These on the one side, and the Christians on the other, forced the Turkes, which were also a kind of Scythians, to settle themselves as they could, in the parts of Mesopotamia, Chaldaea, & Assyria, where they left their own, and learned the rites and customes of the Malabarans. Their Kings are buried amongst the Gorbi, with many ceremonies carrying the dead bodie through all the Countries ouer which hee reigned, which cut and shauie themselves; and with him is buried his best beloued Paramour, his Cup-bearer, Cooke, Master of his horse, Waiter, Messenger, Horses, and the first fruits of all other things, and also golden Cups: and then cast on earth, making a very great hill.

When the yeare is gone about, they take fiftie of his principall attendants, which are not slaues, but free-borne Scythians, and strangle them with so many horses of the best, and fasten the dead men on the dead horses with much solemnitie. But to relate all the particulars hereof, and their burials also of priuate men (whose dead bodies are carried about fortie dayes, from one friend to another, entertained euery where with feasts, &c.) would be too tedious. He that would haue a sight of these things, let him resort to Thomaso Porcacchi his Fnerali Antichi, where these things are not only discoursed in words, but described in artificiall pictures.

The Scythians so farre hate forren Rites and Religions, that Anacbaris, a Scythian Philosopher, hauing trauelled through a great part of the world, and vowed to the mother of the gods, if he returned home in safetie, that he would sacrifice to her with such Rites as he had seene obserued in Cyzicus: in the performance of his vow, was slain by King Saulius.

Seyles also being King of the Scythians, when he brought in forren Rites, and obserued the madde Bacchanal solemnities, which he had seene among the Greekes, lost both his kingdome and life. They cut off the noses of men, and imprinted picture in the flesh of women, whom they ouercame: and generally their customes are very bloody: what man soeuer the Scythian first taketh, he drinketh his blood; he offereth to the King all the heads of the men he hath slaine in battell: otherwise he may not share in the spoile: the skinnies of their crownes slayed off, they hang at their bridles: their skinnies they vse to flay for napkins and other vses, and some, for cloathing. Once a yeare the chiefe men haue a solemnitie amongst them, in which they powre wine into a Mazar, of which none may drinke, which hath not slaine an enemy.

These customes were generall to the Scythians in Europe and Asia (for which cause Scythiarum facinora patrare, grew into a proverbe of immane crueltie, and their Land was iustly called a Barbarous): others were more speciall and peculiar to particular Nations Scythian.

Of the Barbarous & crueltie of the Scythians, the sea confining was called Enneus, by the contrary, as the furies were called Enneides, saith Ammianus, because they sacrificed strangers to Diana, whom they worshipped vnder the name of Orslocha, and hanged vp their heads on the walls of their Temples. The Ile Lenax, neere to Tauris, was dedicated to Achilles, where none of his deuout worshippers durst abide in the night-time; for none might spend the night on shore without danger of his life. Arrianus in his Perplus (or sailing about) of the Euxine sea, speaketh of this Island, and the deuotions therein performed to Achilles and Patroclus: that certaine birds keepe the Temple,

Temple, watering and sweeping the same with their wings, & the Goats which feed in the Ile there present themselves for sacrifice, when the price is first paid at the Altar to the contentment of that Deitie, or Diuelt, whose illusion (if not others collusion) it must needs bee: But because this Iland adioyneth to Europe, I must forbear these things till another time. He also describeth the Nations, both in Asia and Europe, which abutt round about that sea. Jornandes bringeth these Scythians bordering from Scythia (so he calleth that Peninsula, which others name, Basilia, Scandia, Scandinavia, &c. Wherein are the Kingdomes of Sweden, Gothland and Norway) and attributeth to the Goths those warres, which the Egyptians and Persians are said to haue made against the Scythians. Neere to Mæotis King Filimer planted himselfe and his followers; in Dacia, Thracia and Mæsia, Zamolxes who was also a great Philosopher. These and the rest were not only a terror to the skirts of Asia, but to the heart of Africa and Europe, in proceesse of time sacking Rome, and shaking that Roman Monarchie almost to the ground. Simocatta in his Maurician History giueth the preeminence of Martial valour, amongst the many many Scythian Nations to the Abares. Chaganus the Scythian King, sent Embassadors to Mauricius, with an Epistle, wherein he stileth himselfe Gouvernor of seuen Nations, and Lord of the seuen Climats of the world. He conquered the Abdelæ or Nephthalites, the Abares (some of which fled to Tangast to the Turkes) and the Ogor-Nation which dwell by the Riuer Til (or Volga) whose ancient Princes were called Var, and Chummi. He conquered also the Prince of Colch, in which warre he slew three hundred thousand people, their carcaffes lying scattered foure dayes journey. He subdued also the Turkes at the hill Icar, which is foure hundred miles distant from the golden mountaine: so they call a mountaine in the East, because of the fertility and store of cattell therein: which alwayes the greatest Chagan amongst the Turkes possesseth. For Chagan is not a proper name, but a Princely title, which in those partes and the Countreies adioyning is still continued: the Tartars calling their Princes Chan (which some, perhaps falsly, write Chen) and the Persians and Turkes distinguishing that title. These Turkes vanted themselves neuer subiect to Earth-quakes or Pestilence. They call their Priest: Taisan, that is, the sonne of God. Their religion I haue before mentioned. They haue a custome that the males neuer weare gold. This Citie was diuided by a streame; which sometimes separated two disagreeing Nations, no lesse distinguished by their diuoynd minds and differing habites, the one wearing blacke, the other red. This Citie, they say, was built by Alexander, when he had overcome the Sogdians and Bactrians. The Kings wiues shining with Iewels, are carried in golden chariots, each drawne with one Bull, the bridles embossed with gold. The Prince (as is said elsewhere) spent the nights with seuen hundred women. Fame attributeth another Citie, not farre hence, to Alexander, called Chubdan, The Prince thereof being dead, his wiues in blacke, with shauen heads, continually mourne, and may neuer forsake the Sepulchre. These haue many Elephants, and traffique with the Indians which dwell Northwards, and make Silke. Thus much I thought worth the adding out of Simocatta, for better knowledge both of the Turkish and of the Tartarian Historie, as well as of the Scythian.

The Maffagæ, famous for the overthrow of Cyrus, esteeme the Sonne alone for God, and offer vnto him a horse. They haue one wife to each man, and yet every one with all his neighbours wife openly, hanging meane while his quier on the waine wheel: The best death, and most happy amongst them, is when they are become old, to be cut in pieces, and to be eaten together with sheepees flesh: hee is naturally, they beleeue, in the earth, as dying a base and beastly death. Their weapons are of brasse, their furniture of gold, of both which they haue much store; little of iron and silver. The Bactrians, when they were old or worne with sicknesse, cast their parents to dogs, which they kept for this purpose, and called Buriall dogs. The Bactrian women are pompous, riding in great state, and lie with their seruants, and with strangers. They haue among them Brachmanes; Zoroastres the Bactrian is accounted first author of the Magi, and of liberall Artes: hee liued twentie yeares in a wilderness which cleue: but others account this another Zoroastres.

etia, and a great part of Armenia; which after of them was called Sacafena, and proceeded vnto Cappadocia, where, in the midst of their feasting, being in the night surpris'd by the Persians, and slaine, they left their name Saca or Sacca, to a yearly festiuitie among the Persians, in memorie of this victorie. Of the Saca, some hold them Saxons to be descended. Dionysius in his Greeke verses giueth them the highest praise for shooting of all other.

The Amazons, of whom is before related, are said to be descended of the Scythians, who vnder the conduct of Plinus and Sarpyrhus, settled themselves by the River Thermodon, and possessed the field of Themiscyra: But when they continued to spoile the adioyning countries, they were by secret conspiracie of those people destroyed. Their wives became warriours both in defence and offence, and did great adventures: their two Queenes, Mithesia and Lampedo: after, Obera and Anisop the daughters of Mithesia, in the time of Hercules designed: then Penthesilea, who in the Trojan warres was slaine. Yet the reliques of that Nation continued vntill Minibia or Thabstia in Alexanders time; and by degrees were out altogether. One of their Queenes instituted the sacrifice to Mars and Diana, called Tauropolium, saith Diodorus, who addeth that they liued not without men, but that they put the men to domestike duties; and exercised the women in the field. Yet doth he no lesse then Strabo raise doubts of these Amazonian, or Vaimanibian Nation: and no lesse of the Hyperboreans, which he thus relateth out of Hecataeus, that they dwell in an Iland in the Ocean neere vnto the Pole; in which Larona was borne, and Apollo was most of all worshipped: and that the Islanders generally are Apollons Priests, euery day chanting Hymns in his praise: they haue also a huge Grove, and a round Temple dedicated to Apollo in whom their Citie is sacred. These and other things fable they of the Hyperboreans, in which Solinus addeth many other, of the clemencie of the ayre, of the innocencie of the men, of their freedom from sickness, and voluntarie seeking for death in the winter of hayes (after they haue made merry, casting themselves from a certaine rocke into the sea) all these pleasures concurring notwithstanding; things contrary both to nature and Nature, except with Goropius we trusted some parts, at least, of this History in an Allegory. He ver historically interpreteth, that they which placed the Hyperboreans beyond the Arimaspi, these beyond the Ixedones, and those also beyond the Scythians, and these againe beyond the Cimmerians intended the Europæan Scythians, on the banks about Adaxia, the Liuonians and Muscouites; the Ixedones to be in Siberia, and all along those frozen or Icie seas, as he proueth by Etimologie of the word North-east, and Eastwards from thence the continent of Asia he placeth the Arimaspi, and in the cunene of America Mexicana he seareth the Hyperboreans: They which list may haue recourse to his learned discoueries of this argument. Ptolemy of some Scythians, which hanged their dead on trees (as the Colchi of old, and some Tartarians are still reported to doe) esteeming it a disgrace to be buried in the earth. The Taurici buried with their Kings some of their best friends. The Derbices buried with the flesh of their kinsmen which were seuentie yeares old: the women at what age they strangled, and after buried. The Caspians straitly imprisoned such as were past that age, and there furnished them wine say they laid them amongst the woods and obserued what became of them; esteeming them (as is said before of the Perfians) highly honored, and next to a canonizing, whom the birds care with their talons in the next degree of happinesse, whom dogges or wilde beasts preyed on: but beyond all these and disaduentures, which could finde neither the one nor the other to come vnto them such enemie friends. The Tibareni crucified those old men which they haue forsquid. The Hercules being sicke or old were placed by their kindred on a pile of wood, and there by another, which was not of that kinne, slaine with a dagger, who being descended, the pile was fired. His wife was forced to hang herself, or else to abide perpetuall infamie. But I am loath to burie you in these heathen Rites.

The Scythians punished no fault more severely then theft. They would make themselves drunken with the smoake of beashes burnt in the fire. They sware by the King throne, by their sword, and by the winds. When they had sacked Athens, and piled a heap

 pany dissuaded burning of them, lest that the Greekes neglecting the Adversus, would burne Martialis. They doubled their numbers at foure, as we doe at ten; through their diligence in numbering. We might proceed further in these colde Scythian narrations, if the deepe snowes, long winters, beastly men, and men-kind beasts, men eaters, and other monstrous adventures in the way, did not make it both perplexed and dangerous. Leaving therefore these hard and vocough nations: the first civill countrey Eastward is the Seres, the quietest and mildest of men; fleeing the commerce and traffique with other Nations, butting yet with such Nations as resort to them; not valuing wares by words, but by their eyes. Among them is reported to be neither theefe nor whore, nor mur-derer, nor bailes, nor pestilence, nor such like plagues. A woman a fierie conception, or in her parturition, is not desired. None eateth nor leane flesh; none knoweth sacrifices, but every one is iudge to himselfe of that which is right. They tell, that they live two hundred years, that the Common-wealth is governed by a Councell of five thousand, every one of whom findeth an Elephant to the Common-wealth. They have this name called the chiefe Citie, by Ptolemy placed in 177.19. and 38.36. This Region lie within on the West with Scythia extra Danubium; on the East with Terra incognita; and likewise on the North (here some place the promontary Tabin, where the Eastern Ocean) on the South with part of India extra Gangem. Our silkes have the name of this Region, where it is made of a most fine wooll, growing on the leaves of trees: Dianf, kind of flowers of the earth: Tam multiplici opere, saith Pliny, *tam longinquo orbe peti-

 River Tanais thirtie foure. The Region betwixt Albania and the Caspian, he attrib-uteth to the Arpaxons. This Seres are supposed to inhabit the countrey now called Cas-shia, which name Niger deriveth from a Scythian Nation, called Chata. They had a law against Idolatrie, and worship of Images. They had no Temples.

CHAP. XI.

Of the Tartarians, and of diuers Nations which they subdued; with their Pristime Rites.

THe names of Scythia and Sarmatia, are now together with those Nations swallowed vp and drowned in that Tartarian deluge, which about foure hundred yeares since, with a sudden torrent ouerwhelmed the greatest part of Asia, that we speake not of Europe, the heart whereof, quaked & trembled with feare of this tempest. Froth Rome did Pope Innocent the fourth send Embassadors, by entreaties to prevent their coming, when as they had already ouer-runne (besides those countries which still beare their name) Russia, Polonia, Slesia, Moravia, Hungaria, even as farre as Austria. So forte was the huge vnwealdy Empire of Alexander, or of the Romans, short of the Tartarian prouinces, that the expedition of some one of the subiects of this Empire, hath pierced as farre into the West, as euer Alexander into the East, and that happily among more resolute courages, then the Persians or Indians, effeminated with wealth & peace, could stand. And Tamerlane alone some ages after (if we credit that historie of his life, translated out of the Arabike) subdued and obtained more (besides his owne inheritance) more all that which the Romans had achieved in thirte eights hundred yeares and vp-wards, wherein their Empire was growing to the full: but of him afterwards.

The name Tartar is proper to a river in Mongul, from whence it was deriued to the people inhabiting neere the same, which after gaue both name and lawes to so great a part of the world. For thus writeth Tommas de Plano Carpini, which was sent Embassadour to the Tartarian Court, from Pope Innocent, An. 1246. There is a countrey in the East part of the world called Mongol: which had sometimes foure sorts of inhabitants: Teka-Mongol, that is, the great Mongols; Saumongol, that is, water-Mongols; these called themselves Tartars, of a river which runneth thow the their countrey, named Tartarus: the third Merkat, the fourth Metrit. These all were alike in person and language, but diuided amongst themselves into severall Prouinces; and vnto severall Princes in the land of Teka-Mongol, was Cingis, who began to be a mightie hunter before the Land for he learned to steale men. He raunged into other countreies, taking as many captiues as he could, and ioyned them vnto himselfe. Also he allured the men of his countrey vnto him, who followed him as their Ring-leader to doe mischief. Then began he to warre vpon the Sumongols or Tartars, and slew their Captaine, and after many conflicts subdued them to himselfe, and brought them all into bondage. Afterward he vsed their helpe against the Merkats, whom also hee vanquished in battell. Proceeding from thence, he fought against the Metrits; and vanquished them also. The Naimans hearing that Cingis was thus exalted, greatly disdayned therat; for they had a great and mightie Emperour, vnto whom all the foresaid Nations payed tribute. Whose sonnes (when he was dead) succeeded him in his Empire. Howbeit, being young and foolish, they knew not how to gouerne the people; but were diuided, and fell in variance amongst themselves. These invaded Cingis his countrey, putting the inhabitants to the sword, but were after ouerthrowing by the Mongols, and euer the same made captiues.

Some fetch the Tartarian pedigree from the ten Tribes of Israel, which Salmansar carried captiues; and in their Maps place hordes of Danites, Nephthalites, &c. in the furthest Northerly and Easterly bounds of Asia; which yet are a great part of the world, not onely from Media (whither those people were conueyed) but from any part of the Assyrian Empire. (The King of Tabor, or Tybur, in these partes, is said to haue come into France, to Francis the French King, about the yeare 1340. and was slaine at Mantua by Charles the Emperour burned, for secret sollicitation of him and other Christian Princes to Iudaisme.) And Opmierus reporteth of that their iourney passing thorow Euphrates, miraculously staying his streame (to wonder at the vanitie of Waters) when they went into a region called Asarich, which was a yeare and a halfe well there to keepe their law; where neuer before had beene any habitation.

M. Paulus k who with his father and vnkle liued many yeares in the Court of the great Chan, about three hundred yeares since, saith, that they dwelled at first (if such wandring may be so called) in the North, where they had no Lord ouer them, but paid tribute to a great Signor (there called Yncam, and here in these countreies Presbyter John) to whom they paid the tenth of their beasts. But this Yncam, or Presbyter John seeing their numbers euery where multiplying, deuised to disperse them through the world: which the Tartars perceiuing, with ioynt consent forsooke their former habitation, and departed thence far off into the North, denying further tribute vnto Yncam.

After they had there continued a certaine time, they chose to their King about the yeare 1162. one which was called Cingis Khan, who ruled them with such modesty and iustice, that they loued and feared him as a god: his fame reducing all the other Tartars in other parts vnder his obedience. He thus strengthened, weary of those desires, commanded them to arme themselves with bowes, and other weapons, and began to invade and conquer Cities and Prouinces to his subiection, the principall inhabitants whereof he caried with him, kindly entertayning them, leauing such discrete Gouernours in the same, that the people were secured in their persons and goods. When he had thus subdued about nine Prouinces, he sent his Embassador to Yncam, to demand his daughter in marriage: which Yncam with much indignation and many threatenings denying, Cingis assembling his forces, marched against him, and by the way enquired of his Astrologers and Diuiners touching his successe. They taking a greene reed, cleaue it asunder, placing the parts thereof a good distance one from another, and writ vpon the one the name of Yncam, and Cingis on the other; telling the King, that whilst they were reading their conjuring charmes, these reeds would fight together, and the victorie should remaine with him whose reede got the better: which accordingly came to passe in the fight of the Army: Cingis his reed ouercomming the other, as after Cingis himselfe himselfe did Kinon, whom he slew in the field, and possessed his daughter and state, wherein he continued sixe yeares conquering Cities and Kingdomes; and at last was wounded at a Castle called Tbaigin, in the knee, whereof he died, and was buried in Mount Altay.

The next Emperour (after his account) was Cin Can; the third, Bayhin Can; the fourth, Alan, the brother of Mangu; Esu Can, the fifth; Mengu Can the sixth; the seventh Cublai Can, who not onely inherited what the former had conquered; but in the fourth yeare of his raigne subdued in a manner the rest of (those partes of) the world. The word Can signifieth Emperour. Wheresoever these Emperours die, they are buried in Altay aforesaid; they which carry him killing all they meete within the way bidding them goe to the other world to serue their Emperour. For this end they also buy the best horses, to serue their dead Lord in another world. When Mangu Can was buried, there were more then ten thousand men slain by the souldiers which conveyed him. In this History of M. Paul, obserue that this catalogue of Emperours is founded for M. de Rubrugui in Bathyrtime, was at the Court of Mengu Can, to whom Bathyr was subiect. Occasion is left out, and Esu put in. The cause of this error seemeth to be the giving of this name Can to the chiefe Dukes, as Bathyr, &c. and the want of exact written Chronicles in those times amongst them.
